

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. MASONICK RECORD.

AN ORATION,

Delivered at Zanesville, Ohio, on the festival of Saint John the Evangelist, December 27, 5810, before the Lodge of Amity. By Brother LEWIS CASS, late Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Ohio, and present Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Michigan.

"For whither thou goest, I will go—thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."—RUTH.

Sweet and soothing to the wounded heart are thy consolations, O! friendship! In prosperity thou givest a zest to every pleasure, and in adversity thou lightenest the burden of every sorrow. Sacred and imperishable be this monument erected to thee—sacred as thy duties, and imperishable as thy virtues!

The glare of conquest and the pomp of war have too long engaged the attention and attracted the admiration of mankind. Those wild and social virtues, which adorn and ennoble the human character, have seldom furnished a theme of panegyric for the poet, or of eulogy for the historian.

The destroyer of thousands, the conqueror of nations, is irradiated with a temporary lustre, which fascinates the imagination and bewilders the judgment of the spectator; but it soon sets in the darkness of the tomb—it is extinguished in that oblivious mansion, which annihilates the spirit of martial glory, and mingles in one promiscuous throng the victorious and the vanquished. But those virtues, which we this day meet to commemorate, shall live when the glory of the warrior and the fame of the conqueror shall have passed away like a dazzling meteor, which is lost in the obscurity of surrounding darkness. They will secure us that happiness, which is independent of wealth and power, and will constitute the pass-word for admittance into that Lodge, whose Tyler is Death, and whose Portal is the Grave.

Upon this sacred and solemn festival, it would be useless, were it possible, to penetrate that mist of obscurity which envelops the origin of our society. Coeval with civilization, and anterior to history, it mocks the inquiries of the curious, and baffles the researches of the antiquarian. But great is our cause of rejoicing and of pride, when we contrast its durations with the fleeting fabrics of man.—Those stupendous works, which excited the wonder of the ancient world, and formed an epoch in history, have ages since mouldered into dust; but this moral edifice, joining the vigour of youth to the maturity of age, has outlived their glory, and now mourns their fall. The lofty and aspiring oak hath yielded to the rude blast of the whirlwind, while the meek and lowly willow, safe in its humility, hath defied the tornado and the tempest. Thus has it fared with the institutions of man. Too proud to seek safety in the vale of obscurity, and too weak to withstand the rude shock of time, they have successively fallen before the mighty destroyer. Few are the works of art, and still fewer of genius, which have escaped the ravages of time and the ruthless attacks of barbarians. So perishable indeed have been the monuments of human industry, that scarcely a shattered column or a broken pilaster now direct the eager eye of the inquiring traveller to the most celebrated scenes of ancient story. The memorials of liberty have been as mutable as the vestiges of slavery, and not a solitary stone now remains of those monuments erected at Marathon & Thermopylae, to commemorate the heroic deeds which secured freedom and independence to Greece, and deathless glory to her history. But far different is the picture which our society presents.—Founded upon the eternal pillars of Charity and Benevolence, its arch has spanned creation, and its walls have encircled the whole family of man. From a weak and feeble beginning, it has arisen to a gigantic stature, unprecedented in the annals of the world. That ray, which once feebly and faintly glimmered in the Porch of the Temple at Jerusalem, has become a glorious and resplendent luminary, cheering with its beams and dazzling with its lustre.

Amid the convulsions which have recently agitated society, and which have unhinged individual as well as national principles, it is rather a source of regret than surprise, that the purity of our doctrines has not preserved us from the effects of that tempest which has desolated the moral world.—Surely when the altar has been prostrated to make room for idolatrous statues, and when the temples of Christianity have been polluted by the unhallowed orgies of infidelity, we had little reason to expect an exemption from the demoralizing calamity. The phantoms of distempered imaginations, and the fables of interested malice, have found advocates and supporters. We too have been charged with wishing to demolish the fabric of government, and to sap the foundations of society. That horror which ought always to be excited by every attempt to shake the pillars of morality, has been transferred to the purest institution which has descended from the wisdom of our forefathers. How unfounded are the suspicions and how unjust the charge, can alone be known by us, who are conversant with its principles and regulations. To those who are ignorant of its aim and object, it is only necessary to recal the memory of those venerable and celebrated men, whose names yet add lustre to our society. Let it ever be recollected, with joy and pride, that Locke, Warren, Franklin and Washington, beautified their columns in the Temple of Masonry; men, to whom the pageantry of wealth and splendour of birth afforded no adventitious ornament. If we are accused of entertaining designs hostile to the peace of society, we unroll our records and point to the name of Locke, a man whose mental eye penetrated the profound abyss of the human mind, and whose luminous writings established the liberties of the world upon a basis never to be undermined by the approaches of tyranny or the attacks of power. The immortal Warren, with a host of revolutionary patriots, upon whom death has served the summons of the Grand Master, upon Bunker's awful mount, sealed with his blood those principles which our society inculcated and he professed. A crowd of virtuous and illustrious men, who are performing their parts with applause upon the great theatre of life, are living witnesses of our purity and innocence. Are we not united to society by the same indissoluble bonds of affection and consanguinity with our fellow-citizens? Is not our country as near and her rights as dear to us, as to those with whom suspicion is proof, and prejudice conviction? Away then with such unfounded suspicions, such injurious surmises—they are fit only to adorn the pages of a venal writer, and to cause alarm where the government is maintained by force, and the people submit through fear.

We have no hesitation in conceding that our principles are more spotless than our practice, and our doctrines purer than our lives; but it surely requires little observation to be convinced that a system and its professors are frequently at variance, and that the conduct of the one furnishes an inaccurate standard by which to appreciate the merits of the other. Those who are most acute to discern and most willing to acknowledge the obligations of morality, are not thereby exempted from the errors and frailties which are incident to humanity. The abuse of a thing is no valid objection to its inherent goodness. There is nothing which the vices of men may not convert to base and unworthy purposes—the gold will become dim, and the most fine gold changed. Even the benign religion of the Prince of Peace has been made the unwilling instrument of the greatest enormities that have stained the pages of history. Under the pretext of propagating the peaceful religion of the lowly Nazarene, has been established the Inquisition, at whose diabolical cruelty humanity starts back with horror. Hark! that piercing groan proclaims the dying agonies of some tortured wretch. Why is yon miserable victim encircled with the instruments of hell and the ministers of death? Why waves that triumphant banner over his devoted head, emblazoned with a splendid Cross, and inscribed with the words Mercy and Justice? Is that the banner Cross of Jesus? Are those the insignia of that religion, to propagate and to establish which its Author left the throne of Omnipotence, and descended upon this terrestrial abode? Are those the ministers of the meek and lowly founder of Christianity, who inculcated the blessings of peace and the duties of humanity? Great indeed must have been the crimes of the suffering victim, and inexpressible his offence. Has he murdered his father? has he poisoned his mother? or has he been guilty of any other crime hitherto unheard of in the black catalogue of human enormities? Far otherwise: He was a man whose morals were pure, and whose life was without reproach. He supplied, with alacrity, the wants of the poor and indigent. But his benevolence was forgotten and his charities disregarded! He was so unfortunate as to deny the infallibility of the Pope, and to reject the doctrinal tenets of the Romish church. For this conscientious adherence to principle, he is condemned to a death the most horrible and excruciating that the malignant heart of man can devise. If then, a religion, whose corner stone is Mercy, has been thus perverted from its original purpose, let it never be the reproach of Masonry that its members have failed to fulfil its duties and obligations.

That veil, which has preserved our traditional secrets, and which will never be withdrawn to gratify an idle or impertinent curiosity, has provoked the fears of the weak and the malice of the wicked. To the good and the virtuous our hearts are open; nor will they ever be detained at the door of the Temple. With joy and with pride will we receive them, till in the East they hail the glories of the rising Sun. We never assumed the impossible task of eradicating the errors or of concealing the imperfections of our brethren. Though we become Masons, yet we remain men. But so curiously is the mind of man moulded, and so finely tuned is that chord which vibrates to the heart, that we are ever prone to reject those advantages which are most obvious, and impatient to seek those which are beyond our control. Place honour, wealth, and fame within our reach, and, like the Macedonian hero, we shall sigh for new worlds upon which to display our feeble talents. Grant us every wish that the most fertile genius could desire, and every power which the arm of man can wield, our soaring imaginations would burst their terrestrial habitations, and exercise their excursive powers in the regions of unbounded space. Display our sacred principles to the gaze of the multitude; reveal those chaacters, which wisdom has established and time rendered sacred, and we destroy at once the distinguishing criterion of our Order. No; wisely has it been directed, that our mystick language should be concealed from the world; and never shall the Masonick veil be rent in twain, nor the glory depart from between the pillars, till the Supreme Grand Master shall close this earthly Lodge and open an eternal Lodge upon the first step of Masonry!

But to be exempted from evil is to us no praise—we aspire to a far different character. The exercise of our principles calls forth the noblest sentiment engrafted upon the corrupt heart of man. Hail! Heaven-born Charity! Along the bleak and dreary waste of life, how few are the flowers that gild the scene! how scattered the spots which are fertile in happiness! To the hapless and benighted traveller thy rays cheer the solitary gloom, and thy smiles enliven the darksome prospect. But that charity, which constitutes the bond of our union, the cement of our edifice, is not circumscribed within the narrow bounds of feeding the hungry and clothing the naked. Its influence in the social circle is far more important and extensive: It teaches us candidly to appreciate the motives of others, and to “record their virtues in brass and their vices in water.” It is of vital consequence, in those collisions of interest and conflicts of opinion which agitate society, by checking the turbulence of ungovernable passions. It is the moral rainbow, which, extending its luminous circle over the social hemisphere, tinges every object with its mild and mellow radiance, at once an attendant on the tempest and a pledge of its departure. It is the Corinthian pillar of our Order—the entablature which adds grace, and strength, and beauty to the fabric of Masonry. Without it, the cedar of Lebanon and the marble of Paros would remain rude unshapen materials in the hands of the artist. Upon this rock of ages we may safely build, and bid defiance to the storms of calumny and detraction which exhaust their feeble rage around us.

To this respected audience I will now disclose the great secret of Masonry—I will reveal the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end of our institution:—It is to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to cherish the disconsolate, and to introduce into the world a spirit of charity, benevolence and humanity—a spirit which can alone strike the red standard of war, and give to the indigent and oppressed competence for poverty, and freedom for slavery. To lighten the burden of life and to refresh the weary pilgrim on his journey, are our noblest duties and our highest pleasures—they form the key-stone in our arch of virtue. Are these designs laudable and these duties pleasant? Ask the way-worn traveller—ask the shipwrecked seaman—ask the wounded soldier.

When the weary wanderer, far removed from family, from friends and home, is ready to sink beneath accumulated woes, and stands aghast at misery's haggard eye, he is then cheered with the consolations of philanthropy and the attentions of friendship—a balm which Gilead never afforded, and a medicine which no physician there could administer.

When the weather-beaten sailor has seen the companions of his misfortunes overwhelmed by the awful tempest, and when only one frail plank preserves him from the untrodden world of spirits, how grateful must be his feelings, and how exquisite his sensations, to discover that the spectator, who surveys his danger from the distant cliff, is a brother—to call upon him in that universal language, which is intelligible in every country, in characters as legible and as impressive as those which announced to the wondering king of Babylon the destruction of his empire, and the termination of his life.

What sayest thou, stranger, is not the remembrance of such an institution pleasant to the sufferer? Yes, more fragrant than Arabian cassia, more precious than the gold of Ophir.

But the triumphant scene of our society yet remains to be displayed. When the miserable victim of savage barbarity is attached to the stake, and the flames are kindled around him; when this world and its enjoyments are fast receding from his view, and the inexorable tyrant approaches in his most horrible form, then is the firmest mind appalled and the most courageous heart will tremble. To be cut off in the flower of manhood, and in the full possession of reason and of health; to be driven into eternity by every torture which savage malignity can invent, and to have the agonies of death prolonged till the feeble frame of man sinks beneath him, is horrible beyond description. Who can contemplate such a picture without emotion? Who could sustain such a scene with firmness?—This is not an idle tale of the imagination: It is a situation in which a man was placed, who sustained a most important part in our revolutionary contest, with honour to himself and advantage to his country. The fate of war had placed him at the disposal of the merciless savage, and preparations were made to immolate him to their fury. He was pinioned to the stake, and his funeral pile was lighted around. He was united to the world by all that can render life pleasant and desirable—by the endearments of conjugal affection—by the charms of parental love—and all about him to be severed by one stroke of the fell destroyer! But when the silver chord was almost loosened, and the golden bowl broken at the fountain, when nothing was seen but implacable enemies, and nothing heard but the savage yell, dread herald of destruction! he gave that mystick signal of distress, which never yet was displayed without cause, nor seen without emotion. The effect was instantaneous: His foes were scattered, his funeral pile was demolished, and himself relieved by an arm, which, till then, had been raised for his destruction!

SCIENCE AND THE ARTS.

SHEEP AND WOOL.

[From the Hampshire (Mass.) Gazette.]

The “Bulletin des Sciences Agricoles,” for July 1827, contains a review of a German work on sheep and wool; by J. C. Ribbe—published at Prague, Bohemia; from which we have translated the following, save what is enclosed in brackets.

The author adopts the opinion of Linnæus, that all the different kinds of sheep which exist are derived from a common stock, the Ovis Argalis, [or the wild sheep which inhabits the rocky mountains of Asia and Greece.] The largest species of sheep in Europe is the breed of Flanders, which the Dutch imported from India, about two centuries ago. The smallest race is that of Scotland. [M. Ribbe refers to the Hebridean sheep—a small breed, which weigh from four to five pounds per quarter when fat, and yield about one pound of wool of various colours. These small animals frequently carry four or six horns. This breed was imported into Scotland from Denmark at a very early period. There is now a race in Denmark which have four horns.] The national sheep of Hungary have, in both sexes, straight horns, from twelve to fourteen inches long. The wool is five or six inches in length, and so coarse, that it is fit for nothing but blankets.

Iceland has two sorts of sheep, one large, the other small. Their wool is brown, and the inhabitants do not shear it, but pull it off—a most cruel operation. The Icelanders make great use of sheep's milk. These animals live all the year exposed to the severity of the weather, and their principal food in winter is the moss called Iceland moss, which they obtain under the snow. The small species live among the steep rocks on the mountains, and sometimes a flock is carried over a precipice into a gulph by an avalanche, where they remain until the warmth of their bodies melts the snow which covers them, and announces to their owners, by the steam which ascends, the place into which they have been carried.

In the Crimea, and some places near the Caspian sea, they have sheep that bear when young short curled wool of a blue, brown, or black colour, which is an object of commerce. That the wool may remain in small curls, the Tartars cover the lambs with a fine linen cloth sewed close around them, which is not taken off until the animal is killed.—[These lamb-skins are celebrated, being damasked, as it were, by clothing the little animal.] In some of the vast forests of Russia, there are sheep which live in a wild state; these animals are so much affected by the sounds of drums and trumpets, that they begin to run, leap and dance, as soon as they hear them; and they continue these motions until overcome by excitement and fatigue, they are no longer able to flee from their enemies.

[The largest breed of sheep in the world, is the fat tailed variety; it is raised in central Asia, China, Persia, Africa, &c. The tail is a mass of fat, and often weighs thirty pounds. Another variety of Asia, is the long tailed breed, with coarse wool; its tail sometimes drags on the ground.]

Europe did not possess any fine woolled sheep until the twelfth century. The Roman writers mention that fine wools and stuffs were imported from Spain, but this only proves that the Spanish sheep were better than those of the rest of Europe. In the twelfth century some African merchants sent to Cadiz a few sheep the wool of which was remarkable for its fineness and whiteness. They were purchased by a Cadiz merchant, and placed on his country estate, where they succeeded, but he found no imitators.

About the year 1350, Peter, king of Castile, having been informed that there was a race of sheep in Barbary, which had precious fleeces, sent several persons into Morocco to buy a great number of bucks. From this epoch commenced the reputation of the wool of Castile. In the 16th century, when Cardinal Ximenes was the Spanish minister, complaints were made to him that the sheep of Castile had deteriorated. To remedy the evil, this minister determined to import a great number from Barbary; but as he could not obtain them by means of negotiation, he kindled a war, and invaded Morocco. The Spanish soldiers had orders to bring away as many sheep as they could; they pillaged the country, and returned to Spain with the precious plunder.

The principal breeds of Spain are those which the monks of the Escorial possess; those of the convents of Guadaloupe, and of Paular; those of the duke d'Infantado, and of the counts of Negretti and Montareo. The sheep of the Escorial have the most beautiful wool; those of Guadaloupe are celebrated for their form and fleece; those of Paular have the head covered with wool, and their neck full of wrinkles; those of Infantado are born with coarse wool, which afterwards becomes very fine, and those of Negretti have a strong and robust body, with fine wool. All these races are called merinoes, and were formerly the travelling flocks of Spain; since the late wars, they have become stationary. All the fine races of sheep now in Europe were derived from the merinoes of Spain.

OF THE CHANGES WHICH LIFE HAS EXPERIENCED ON THE GLOBE.

[From the Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal.]

Fossil remains of the animals which preceded man upon the earth are every day discovered on both continents; and every day are the documents regarding the history and successive changes of the various races that existed before the present, increased by new facts. This is equally the case with the vegetation which embellished the earth at that remote period, and with which those primitive animals were necessarily in close connexion. New animals and vegetables have assumed the place of those that have been destroyed, and whose ancient existence is only revealed to us by their fossil remains. Thus, in the course of the ages that preceded the appearance of man upon the earth, its surface has successively changed its aspect, its verdure and its inhabitants; the seas have nourished other beings, the air has been peopled with other birds.

The remains of these various successions of animals and vegetables attest that they were at first much more uniform. The vegetables of the coal formation, for example, scarcely present any difference, whatever may be the latitude, the longitude or the elevation at which they are found. Europe, Asia, and the two Americas, alike produced elephants, rhinoceroses, mastodons, &c. The differences which vegetables and animals exhibit at the present day, according to the various climates or situations in which they occur, have been gradually established under the predominating influence of a small number of natural causes, and constitute at length the order of distribution which life now presents at the surface of the earth.

Originally life extended from one pole to the other, and animated the whole of this surface. The frozen regions of the North, and the snow-clad summits of the Alps, were covered with the same verdur, and the forms of the pristine animals and vegetables presented either extraordinary types of which we have now no example, or species which belonged to families and genera still existing, but in most cases only between the tropicks. As we approach nearer to the present times, we find in all places remains more and more resembling those of the plants and animals which now live in the same country. At a later period, the original races of animals and vegetables were gradually expelled from the north toward the south, from the summits to the plains in proportion as the uniform mean temperature of the earth's surface yielded to more powerful causes, which brought about the establishment of climates. These gradual variations in the temperature, the lowering of the general level of the seas, the equally successive and gradual diminution of the energy of volcanick phenomena arising from the original igneous state of the earth, as well as of the strength and power of atmospherick phenomena, and of the tides—such were the regular, general and continued natural causes of the modifications which life has undergone, and of almost all the changes that have been produced upon the earth's surface.

The results of these first causes, such as the establishment of local influences over the temperature of the same climate, the formation of a multitude of particular basins, some containing salt, others fresh water; the pouring out of these lakes into one another, and into the great basin of the sea; the partial debacles which thence resulted; the ravages of the sea on the low parts of the continents at first, and then the formation of vast lagoons in the same places; lastly, the establishment of the general system of draining and watering, or of the hydrographick reticulation which covers the globe—such were the irregular, and more or less violent and perturbing secondary causes of the partial vicissitudes experienced by animal and vegetable life. The beings which were unable to resist the influence of these various causes were destroyed and disappeared from the earth, with the circumstances for which they were created; new species appeared with new conditions of existence. But, in examining the series of fossil remains that are found buried in the strata of the globe, there is no where perceived a distinct line of demarcation between the different terms of that series, so as to prove that life has been once or oftener totally renewed on the earth. On the contrary, we discover in it a proof of the successive and gradual change which we have pointed out. Certain primitive types have indeed completely disappeared, but they are found existing at various epochs, and their remains are blended with those of more modern types; along with new species of types still existing, we find some of anterior epochs; certain genera that yet obtain are common to all the terms of the series; and toward the end of the series, we find the remains of some of our present species along with ancient types and extinct species. In consequence of the establishment of climates, life has almost entirely abandoned the polar countries, and the glaciers have usurped, on the high summits, the place of the verdure of primeval times. Palms, date-trees, cocoas, dracæna, pandani, areca, the great reed, and the arborescent ferns, have forsaken our climates, together with the elephants, tigers, panthers, hippopotami, the gigantic tapirs, the rhinoceroses, palæotheria, anaplotheria, mastodons, and other extinct animals, as well as those enormous reptiles whose forms were so extraordinary. Sole masters, in those times, of the countries now subjected to the dominion of man, these animals are either entirely destroyed, or now live only between the tropicks.

Man appears to have arrived upon the earth only after its surface was adapted to receive him, after the establishment of climates, and when a happy equilibrium among the elements had determined the permanency of the present state of things, or at least had rendered its variations almost imperceptible.

Such is a brief view of the changes which life has experienced at the surface of the globe, and of the causes which have produced those changes.—Our theory, which is founded on all the facts that have been established, can not but prevail over the systems hitherto proposed, for it is in harmony with the natural laws of order and permanency which rule the universe, and is, moreover, supported by the most accredited physico-mathematical theories; whereas those symptoms, founded upon perturbations of cataclysms, which science, facts and human reason equally reject, only increase the number of those imaginary conceptions which have been successively published for several centuries.

The above will suffice to show, that there is no subject which, in all points of view, is more worthy to excite the interest and meditations of philosophers, and the investigations of geologists and naturalists.

THE GATHERER.

BEHIND THE CURTAIN.

The difficulties which dramatick authors are doomed to encounter have been often enough complained of. The following whimsical enumeration of the serious annoyances to which the author of a French farce, called Le Petit Maître malgré lui, was exposed, places the matter in an odd light. The author states them in his prefaces.

"After writing and getting the following trifles received and rehearsed, not without much trouble, the day for its performance was announced, but, on the instant of drawing up the curtain, the principal performer running across the stage with thoughtless eagerness, met with the head of a candle-snuffer making his way in an opposite direction, full speed; the concussion stunned and laid both parties on the floor; they were much hurt, and the business of the evening was postponed.

"Being advertised a second time, a fortnight after, the principal actress, a woman not given to excess, became so intoxicated with a cordial, called Parfaite Amour, which had been recommended by an attendant at the theatre for a stomach complaint, that she was neither able to stand or speak.

"On attempting a third representation, things at the commencement seemed to proceed smoothly, but, in an interesting scene between a lover and his mistress, the actors of which had, in fact, once been the characters they represented, the hero, in a transport of passion, inflamed by the part he played, and probably stimulated by a recollection of his former attachment, ventured on a kiss.

"The lady, disgusted at his former inconstancy, or his present indecorum, saluted him with a smart box on the ear, which he repaid with interest; and they proceeded to abuse each other in gross terms, in the face of the audience; after considerable delay, and an apology from the offenders, they were permitted to proceed, and the piece succeeded."

VOLTAIRE.

In 1760, Voltaire was informed that a niece of Corneille's was reduced to a state of the greatest poverty: he immediately afforded her assistance; observing, at the same time, that it was the duty of a soldier to assist the niece of his general!

DR. CHEYNE.

While some one was talking before this acute Scotsman of the excellence of human nature, 'Hoot, hoot, mon,' says he, 'human nature is a rogue and a scoundrel; or why would it perpetually stand in need of laws and of religion?'

DR. YOUNG.

This divine writer was so much in earnest in whatever he was doing, that, preaching one day at the Chapel Royal before George II. and observing him extremely inattentive, he raised his voice very much; and, finding that ineffectual, he burst into tears.

JAMES THOMSON,

Though a man of an active mind, was oppressed with a heavy and sluggish body, and was extremely inactive and indolent. Dr. Burney, the author of the 'History of Music,' visiting him one day at two o'clock in the afternoon, found him in bed, with the curtains closed and the windows shut; and, asking him why he remained so long in bed, was answered by him, in the Scottish accent, 'Why, mon, I had no motive to rise.'

Thomson lived in Kew Lane, Richmond, in a house which is now called Rosedale, and is in the possession of a lady, who, from her rural propensity, is with peculiar propriety destined to retrace the footsteps of the refined and elegant author of the 'Seasons.'

DR. DONNE, DEAN OF ST. PAUL'S.

This learned divine having married a lady of a rich and noble family without the consent of her parents, was treated by them with great asperity. Having been told by the father that he was to expect no money from him, the doctor went home, and wrote the following note to him: 'John Donne: Anne Donne: undone.' This quibble had the desired effect, and the distressed couple were restored to favour.

It was said of Donne, as of Picus de Mirandola, that he was rather born wise than made so by study; yet, as his biographer tells us, 'he left behind him the resultance of fourteen hundred authors, most of them abridged and analyzed with his own hand.'

EXAMPLE OF ORIGINAL IRISH GENIUS.

An English gentleman was writing a letter in a coffee-house, and, perceiving that an Irishman standing behind him was taking that liberty which Parmenio used with his friend Alexander, instead of putting his seal upon the lips of the curious impertinent, the English gentleman thought proper to reprove the Hibernian, if not with delicacy, at least with poetical justice. He concluded writing his letter in these words: 'I would say more, but a damned tall Irishman is reading over my shoulder every word I write.'

'You lie, you scoundrel,' said the self-convicted Hibernian.

HOW TO CHOOSE A RELIGION.

Karamsin, in his history of Russia, relates that when the inhabitants of Livonia were first converted from Paganism to Christianity, they hesitated whether they should adopt the faith of the Russian or German church; at length in their extreme perplexity, they determined to decide their doubts in a most summary manner by casting lots, when chance prevailed in favour of the latter. There are many cases in which this example might be followed very advantageously, thereby saving a great deal of time and vexation to the parties; for instance, it might be very beneficially introduced into the court of chancery, for then let the decision fall out as it might, the suitors would resign themselves to it as the decree of fate, as they must do even in the end after waiting half their lives. If the adage of Bis dat qui cito dat, be true, it is no less certain that he who denies at once, at length gives us something, for he gives us time.

RELIGIOUS BOOKS.

There is an amusing anecdote related of a country curate, who having published a volume of sermons, in which he more particularly pointed out the dangers of a lax morality, and the want of strict religious principles among the higher classes of society, wrote a few weeks afterwards to a friend in town, inquiring in his extreme simplicity, "whether he did not observe any signs of reformation in the fashionable world?" the answer that he obtained may easily be divined. The good man had entirely forgotten that those who most needed his exhortations, were precisely those who would not read them; or who, if they read, would be the last to attend to them. If books could reform the world, it had been reformed long ago; but no disparagement to good books—something else is necessary.

APPEARANCES.

Bourganville, when trading to Otaheite, was accustomed to leave there two of some kind of domestic animals. In his last voyage he had on board a Capuchin and a Franciscan, who differ from each other in the single circumstance of one having the beard shaved and the other wearing it long on the chin. The natives who had successively admired the various animals as they were disembarked, whether bulls and cows, hogs and sows, or he and she goats, shouted with joy at the appearance of the Capuchin, "What a noble animal! what a pity there is not a pair!" scarcely was the wish expressed, when the shaven Franciscan made his appearance, "Huzza, huzza!" exclaimed the savages, "we've got the male and the female."

POPULAR TALES.

THE FORTUNETELLER.

[From "Whimwhams."]

I think Mr. Solomon Logical was the most irascible little old man that ever worsted his antagonist in an argument, or failing to convince and confute, knocked him down by way of coming to a conclusion. He was a short, puffy gentleman of sixty, who had married late in life, to have, as he always said, some one to make gruels and toast cheese for him in his declining years. As a specimen of diminutive obesity, Mr. Logical might claim the first rank among his contemporaries. His figure had a most striking resemblance to the Dutch nut-crackers, I have seen at the toyshops; and, perhaps the comparison might be extended with equal justice to his countenance, which was blown up in his thunder gusts, until it assumed the redness and rotundity which pertains to the mechanical figures before mentioned.

The family of this gentleman consisted of his wife, a daughter of the delightful age of sixteen, and two little sons, who had numbered, the one, five, and the other, six summers. Four children had passed before him to the grave. I do give it as my positive and unalterable opinion, that Julia Logical was the most fascinating creature that ever shattered a heart or a rosebud. I will not do her so much injustice as to attempt a description; but if any of my readers would behold a being bearing a little resemblance to her, let him close his eyes, dream of one of Tom Moore's Peris, and he will be satisfied.

On this daughter, on his pipe, and on an argument, Old Logical doted with childish fondness. "The girl," he used to say, "is a good girl; a good girl deserves a good husband; and d—n me if she shan't have one. She is worth fifty thousand dollars on her wedding day; which she shall never see until a fellow presents himself who can smoke, produce his fifty, and maintain an argument. I know what a husband ought to be.

After an exclamation like this, the old gentleman would puff and simmer like a roasting apple, and finally sputter himself into a great rage; simply because no one ventured to dispute his plans, and argue with him on the subject nearest his heart. This, no person of his own household would venture to do, preferring the minor ebullition of spleen which would attend the neglect, to the tremendous explosion which was sure to follow the display of any opposition to his will. In fact, Old Logical was one of those testy logicians, who are never satisfied with victory or defeat, opposition or submission.

The butterflies in small clothes, who haunted the precincts of his house to obtain a sight of the fair Julia, hated him as they did the prince of darkness. Never had a suitor ventured to intrude his person within old Logical's premises, since he broke his ivory cane over the cranium of a young gentleman in claret inexpressibles, who had called after a party to inquire for the daughter. "The rascal," cried the infuriated parent, "the rascal wore a quizzing glass; no man of sense or property wears a quizzing glass; therefore he must be a penniless puppy!"

After this melancholy catastrophe, no beaux hazarded an intrusion into quarters which were guarded by a dragon so outrageous. Julia Logical pined and faded; why, I pretend not to say, but it surely was not for the deprivation that had been inflicted upon her in the exclusion of her admirer. I am quite sure of countenance from my fair readers, when I assert, that could not have been the cause. Her father appeared to grow fatter and redder, and more argumentative every day; and with his increasing size the venom of his disposition towards the young men of his day deepened in bitterness. He would only allow his daughter to walk in the garden pertaining to his house, and not even there, unless accompanied by himself or her mother.

It was during a fine afternoon in September, that the whole family were collected in an arbour at the lower part of one of the shady walks, enjoying the repose and beauty of an autumnal evening, when a figure was seen advancing down the avenue, preceded by a servant. The domestick in a submissive tone, announced a woman who professed to have skill in fortune telling.

"A fortuneteller!" roared Old Logical.
 "A fortuneteller!" echoed Mrs. Logical.
 "A fortuneteller!" sighed Julia.
 "Fortunetellers are cheats," resumed the master, "this woman is a fortuneteller; therefore, turn her out." "But dear father," said Julia, "I never had my fortune told, and I am so curious; do let me speak to her for a few moments." "Turn her out," shouted the tender parent. "But father, who can tell but she may know where your silver knee-buckles are, that have been missing so long. Fortunetellers know every thing; this woman is a fortuneteller, therefore"—Interest and argument never failed to touch the heart of the opposer, and permission was conceded that the gipsy should advance and be heard.

The form, vesture and appearance of the stranger, were in strict accordance with my ideas of a being supernaturally gifted. Her original stature must have been six feet; but age, and her habitual bending to the earth in search of weeds and roots, had nearly reduced her to an unchangeable incurvation. Her outward garment was a robe, rather than a gown, of dark cloth, thrown carelessly, though not ungracefully around her, and bound about the waist with the dried skin of a serpent. This mantle entirely concealed her figure. The face of this remarkable object was imbrowned by toil and exposure; and the singular brilliancy of her large black eyes, contrasted strangely with her stooping figure and gray hairs, which denoted one whose race was nearly finished.

She advanced slowly towards the family party, stopping occasionally to pluck a weed or a flower; and as she came near, murmured the following incantation to the plants as she gathered them.

Weed, and root, and bud of power,
 When the bright dew gems the trees—
 Ye shall yield, at midnight hour,
 Hidden charms and mysteries:
 Then shall be unrolled the leaf—
 Then disclosed the mystick page—
 Tales of joy—and tales of grief—
 The doom of youth—the fate of age.

Old Logical was somewhat startled, as the sybil placed herself directly before him, and fixed her dazzling eyes on his, seemingly awaiting his commands.

"Very well, my good woman, very well; I thought I might make some inquiry of you, but it is of no consequence; you may go, good woman, you may go."

The debater was completely awed. The object of his address paid no attention to the permission for her departure, but turning slowly to Julia, addressed her nearly in these words—

Follow me where none may listen,
 Where yon sparkling fountains glisten;
 Maiden fair, if thou wouldst borrow
 Knowledge of thy joy or sorrow—
 If despair's cold hand shall press thee,
 Or the smiles of fortune bless thee.

The fair girl immediately arose, and placing her hand within that of the sorceress, led the way to the spot she had designated. They were soon concealed from view by the windings of the path. It was not until they had quite disappeared, that Old Logical recovered from the shock he had experienced in the awe-inspiring presence of the fortuneteller. But when his daughter entirely vanished with the gipsy the disputant was "himself again." He shouted for his servants, rated them for admitting the hag, and bade them pursue, secure, and toss her in a blanket for her presumption. The domesticks dispersed about the garden, but their young mistress and the stranger had disappeared. They searched ineffectually through the town, but no trace of them could be discovered. Night closed in and they were still missing. Old Logical was nearly distracted; he argued the matter in every possible light; cursed divination, conjurers, witches, and his own folly.

Poor Mrs. Logical and the little Logical could only weep. The servants pursued their search, taking excellent care to avoid their master, whose cane made itself intimately acquainted with every menial back which it encountered. Ten o'clock! and no tidings of the lost child. The father had fallen back in his chair, entirely exhausted by the violence of his passion; the mother and brothers were weeping beside him; when the door suddenly opened, and a dashing young midshipman entered, leading the blushing Julia Logical. The father, more rejoiced with the return of his daughter, than astonished at the appearance of her companion, singular as was the presence of a young man in his house, held her for a moment in his arms in speechless joy. It was but for one moment; the next, he seized his cane and leaped fiercely towards the intruder.

"Who the devil are you, Sir?" was the courteous interrogation.

"Your daughter's husband," was the effective and laconic reply.

Had Old Logical, like the inhabitants of the fabled city, been petrified on the spot, he could not have been rendered more completely motionless than he became at the receipt of this intelligence. He stood like a statue, with eyes fixed and jaws distended. Julia went softly up to him, and placing her roguish face close to his, whispered—"Dear father, I never should have consented, had I not been convinced that 'None but the brave deserve the fair;' Henry is very brave—therefore—wont you forgive us?"

Old Logical's features relaxed and softened.

"Come, come, old gentleman," cried the youth, "I will subscribe to your own conditions. I'll smoke with you 'till all's blue; and as you said, the man who possessed your daughter, must be worth fifty thousand dollars, and be able to maintain an argument, why I'll prove to you that I am.

You value your child at a fortune; that child is my wife; man and wife are one; therefore—Eh! father-in-law!"

Old Logical caught the sailor to his heart—They now nightly argue and smoke, and their fiercest disputes are upon this subject—the utility of fortunetellers.

HISTORICAL.

THE RISE OF POPE SIXTUS V.

One of the most extraordinary instances of ambition and hypocrisy in the history of the world is exhibited in the rise of pope Sixtus V. and the manner of his elevation to the papal chair.

He was born of poor parents, in the march of Ancona, at a village called Le Grotte, in the lordship of Montalto. His father, Francis Peretti, who was a common ploughman, could not afford to give him any education, and, when he was nine years old, hired him out to one of his neighbours to look after his sheep and hogs. He did not long continue in this occupation; for, being desired by a Franciscan friar, who had lost his way, to show him the road to Ascoli, he deserted his hogs, and ran before him to the town. The friar, after he had found his road again, desired him several times to return; but the boy refusing to leave him, he at length asked him if he would take upon him the habit of his order, which he described as very austere: to which the boy replied that he would willingly suffer the pains of purgatory if he could be made a scholar. He was accordingly received, with the consent of his parents into the convent of Franciscans at Ascoli, where he made a surprising progress in learning. In his thirteenth year he assumed the habit of that order, but still retained his own name, Felix. He soon distinguished himself at several disputations, and acquired a considerable reputation as a preacher, but at the same time raised himself many enemies by his impetuous disposition. He early discovered a great ambition, and though he was hated by his brother monks, yet by his abilities he acquired the esteem of cardinal Carpi, by whose interest he obtained several promotions; and having ingratiated himself with father Ghislieri, afterwards Pius V. and with the Colonna family, he obtained the office of inquisitor-general at Venice, where, by his overbearing behaviour, he so greatly offended the senate, that, on the death of Paul IV. he was obliged to consult his safety by flight. However, on the election of Pius II. he returned to that city; but at last, being apprehensive of the resentment of the senate, he provided a gondola, by which he made his escape in the night. At his return to Rome he was made consultor of the Inquisition, and soon after went with the legate Campagnon, as chaplain, to Spain. While he was in that kingdom, his friend Ghislieri being chosen pope, he was created general of his order, and afterwards bishop of St. Agatha, and at last, cardinal; and to enable him to support his dignity, the pope assigned him a pension, and, besides, made him a present of a considerable sum of money.

Upon his promotion to the sacred college, which happened in the forty-ninth year of his age, he quite altered his manner of life; and, to conceal his aspiring views, affected a total disregard of all worldly pursuits, and became humble, meek, patient, and affable; which mask of hypocrisy he wore with great perseverance fifteen years. He led a retired life, exercised himself in works of piety, spent much of his time in the confessional chairs, seldom appeared at the consistories, and during the last three years of the pontificate of Gregory affected to be very infirm, so that he was often saluted in a manner that would not have been very agreeable to any one else, "God help you, poor old man, you have almost run your race!"

To this artifice he owed his promotion, for the conclave being divided between opposite parties, it was agreed upon by both to elect one who was too weak to govern, and could not live long. The cardinals, out of contempt, used to call him the Ass of la Motca; so that their astonishment was inexpressible when he threw off his disguise. While they were crowding towards him to congratulate him, he sat coughing and weeping as if some great misfortune had befallen him; but he no sooner perceived, on the scrutiny, that there was a sufficient number of votes to secure his election, than he threw his staff, with which he used to support himself, into the middle of the chapel, stretched himself up, and appeared taller by almost a foot than he had done for several years before. This behaviour alarming the cardinal dean, he called out, "Stay a little, there is a mistake in the scrutiny;" but Montalto, with a stern look, boldly answered, "There is no mistake;" and immediately began himself the Te Deum, in such a strong and audible voice, that the whole conclave were at first struck dumb, but at length accompanied him in a tame and spiritless manner. After the hymn, the master of the ceremonies asked him, according to form, "Whether he was pleased to accept of the papacy?" To which he replied, somewhat sharply, "It is impertinent to ask whether I will accept of what I have already accepted. However, to satisfy any scruple that may arise, I tell you I accept it with great pleasure, and would accept another, if I could get it; for I find myself strong enough, by the divine assistance, to manage two papacies." While the cardinals were putting on his pontifical robes, he stretched out his arms with great vigour and activity; upon which one of them said in a familiar way, "I perceive, holy father, the pontificate is a sovereign medicine, since it can restore youth and health to old sick cardinals." To which he replied in a grave and majestic manner, "So I find it." After cardinal Farnese had performed the ceremony of adoration, he said to him, "Your holiness seems quite a different sort of a man from what you was a few hours ago."—"Yes," said he; "I was then looking for the keys of paradise, which obliged me to stoop a little; but now I have found them, it is time to look upwards, as I am arrived at the summit of all human glory, and can climb no higher in this world." In his passage from the conclave to St. Peter's, the people, who at first would not believe that he was the same person with the old decrepit cardinal Montalto, cried out, "Long live the pope!" and added, according to custom, "Plenty, holy father! plenty and justice!" To which he replied, "Pray to God for plenty, and I will give you justice."

Soon after his coronation, he sent for his sister Camilla, with her daughter, two grandsons, and her niece, the daughter of his deceased brother, who, upon their approach to Rome, were met by three cardinals, who dressed them in magnificent habits, and conducted them to the Vatican. But Sixtus disdaining in such a trifling matter to be obliged to the cardinals, pretended not to know his sister till she had resumed her former dress; then he received her kindly, and declared that nobody should make a princess of her but himself. He assigned her a considerable revenue, and gave her one of his palaces for her residence, at the same time advising her to conduct herself with that sober modesty which became the meanness of her birth, and the gravity of those who were related to the papal chair: he conferred the dignity of a cardinal on the eldest of her grandsons, Alexander Peretti, who was then about eighteen years of age, and afterwards distinguished himself by his learning and abilities. The king of Spain and the grand duke of Tuscany offered to confer titles of honour on his sister, which Sixtus refused; however, he expressed his satisfaction with the behaviour of the Venetians, who ordered public rejoicings upon his exaltation, and admitted the family of Peretti to the honour of nobility in their state, being afraid of his resentment for their treatment of him when he was inquisitor at Venice.

When Sixtus in his youth resided at Macerata, he went one day to a shoemaker's shop to buy a pair of shoes. After some dispute about the price the shoemaker told him that he would take no less than seven julios, or three shillings and sixpence. Montalto offered him six julios, which was all the money he had, and said, "Perhaps I shall be able to give you the seventh some time or other."—"Some time or other!" replied the shoemaker; "but when will that be? when you come to be pope."—"Yes," said Montalto, "that I will with all my heart, and pay you interest for your money too."—"Well, then," answered the shoemaker, "since I see you are not without hopes of being pope, you shall even have them upon those terms." Montalto having asked him his name, and noted the transaction in his diary, after his promotion sent to Macerata, to know if the shoemaker was alive; and being informed that he was, ordered the governor of that place to send him directly to Rome, guarded by one of his officers. The poor shoemaker was extremely frightened; and having entirely forgot the transaction with the young friar, which had happened forty years before, began to recall to his mind all the sins that he had committed in his life, considering for which of them he could be cited to appear before his holiness. Upon his arrival at Rome, Sixtus asked him if he had ever seen him at Macerata? The shoemaker, trembling, told him no. The pope again asked him if he ever remembered to have sold a pair of shoes to a young friar, and to have given him credit for a julio; but he protesting that he knew nothing at all of the matter, Sixtus related to him the agreement they had formerly made, and ordered his steward to pay him the julio, with the interest for forty years, which amounted to two julios more. The shoemaker went away very much dissatisfied, loudly complaining to every one he met, that the pope had put him to the expense of forty crowns, to come from Macerata to Rome to receive three julios. Sixtus being informed of his behaviour by his spies, ordered him to return, and demanded of him if he had a son. The shoemaker answering—"Yes, and that he was an honest priest of the order of Servi," the pope sent for him to Rome, and, before the departure of his father, conferred on him a bishoprick in the kingdom of Naples.

But he served an Augustine monk, called father Salviati, still better, and this story is more humorous than the former. In 1564, Montalto left the general chapter of his order at Florence, without the leave of his superiour, who sent orders to all the convents that were under him on the road from that city, to stop the fugitive. Montalto was aware of this, and therefore he lodged in a house belonging to his own order. He lay one night in a small convent of Augustines, where father Salviati, then a young man, was prior. He treated the stranger with great civility, and the next morning lent him four crowns on his note, which, however, Montalto gave him in a fictitious hand and counterfeited name. Sixtus, when he became pope, on meeting with this circumstance in his journal, ordered the general of the Augustines to send father Salviati to Rome, as he wanted to speak to him. The prior at that time was engaged in a contest with his bishop, and the prelate had made a complaint against him to the congregation of cardinals. The general thought that his holiness had sent for Salviati to reprimand him upon this account; and what confirmed him in his opinion was the grave manner in which the pope communicated his orders. Accordingly, that he might give complete satisfaction, he gave orders that Salviati should be conducted to Rome under a guard of four brothers. The bishop, when he heard how Salviati was taken to Rome by order of the pope, was wonderfully pleased, and talked in a high strain to his chapter: "Tis necessary," says he, "to mortify these insolent monks, that they may learn the respect due to their prelates."

As soon as Salviati came to Rome, he was brought into the presence of the pope, who began to interrogate him very severely upon his conduct in office. Salviati, concluding that it was the affair between him and the bishop that the pope meant, began to make the best defence he could. His holiness, who had never heard any thing of the matter, replied—"I am sure you are in the wrong, and have been wanting in respect to your bishop, who is a man of worth; but it was another business that I sent for you about: you are accused of misemploying the revenues of your convent, and I must call you to account for it." Salviati began now to pluck up his spirits, as he was conscious that an inquiry into this part of his conduct would be to his credit. He replied to the pope, that "he submitted freely to any punishment his holiness should inflict, if any mal-administration of the society's revenue should be proved against him." Sixtus answered, "Have a care what you say; for I have in my hand proofs sufficient to convince you." Salviati being well assured of his innocence, shrugged up his shoulders, and was silent while the pope went on: "Is it not true, that in 1564, when you were prior, a Franciscan monk lodged at your house, to whom you gave four crowns! and should you, I desire to know, have disposed of the publick money so?" Salviati now recollecting the thing, but not imagining that Sixtus was the man he had lent the money to, said, "It is true, most holy father, and I should have let him had more if he had asked it, because he looked like an honest man; but I have since found him a cheating rogue, for having signed a feigned name, whereby I never have been able to discover him or to get the money." At this the pope fell a laughing, and said, "Don't trouble yourself about looking after him any farther, as you will not find him; but he ordered me to pay the debt, and return you thanks. Are you not satisfied with my taking his place, and becoming your debtor?" By this time Salviati began to think that his holiness bore some resemblance to the man whom he had called a cheat, and though the last words were encouraging enough, yet the poor man was sadly disturbed how to excuse the affront he had put upon him. Sixtus, however, did not leave him in suspense, but said, "It's time now to give you my thanks, as I am the brother you were so kind to; and, as you gave me half your cell, it is but reasonable that I should give you a lodging." Accordingly he gave him handsome apartments in his palace, and sometime afterwards promoted him to a considerable bishoprick, which occasioned the following sarcasm from Pasquin: "Bishopricks are now four crowns a-piece."

CELEBRATED PERSONS.

When the famous Cornelia, daughter of the great Scipio, was importuned by a lady of her acquaintance to show her toilette, she deferred satisfying her curiosity till her children, who were the famous Gracchi, came from school, and then said, "En! hæc ornamenta mea sunt."—"These are my ornaments."

Cyneas, the minister of Pyrrhus, asked the king (before their expedition into Italy) what he proposed to do when he had subdued the Romans? He answered, "Pass into Sicily." "What then?" said the minister. "Conquer the Carthaginians," replied the king. "And what follows that?" says the minister. "Be sovereign of Greece, and then enjoy ourselves," said the king. "And why," replied the sensible minister, "can we not do this last now?"

The emperors Nerva, Trajan, Antoninus, and Aurelius sold their palaces, their gold and silver plate, their valuable furniture, and other superfluities, heaped up by their predecessors, and banished from their tables all expensive delicacies. These princes, together with Vespasian, Pertinax, Alexander Severus, Claudius the Second, and Tacitus, who were raised to the empire by their merit, and whom all ages have admired as the greatest and the best of princes, were always fond of the greatest plainness in their apparel, furniture, and outward appearance.

Cortez, the conqueror of Mexico, who lived unknown and disgraced in Spain, was scarcely able to obtain an audience of his master Charles V.; and when the king asked who was the fellow that was so clamorous to speak to him, he cried out, "I am one who have got your majesty more provinces than your father left towns."

Camoens, the famous Portuguese poet, was unfortunately shipwrecked at the mouth of the river Meco, on the coast of Camboja, and lost his whole property; however, he saved his life and his poems, which he bore through the waves in one hand, whilst he swam ashore with the other. It is said, that his black servant, a native of Java, who had been his companion for many years, begged in the streets of Lisbon for the support of his master, who died in 1579. His death, it is supposed, was accelerated by the anguish with which he foresaw the ruin impending over his country. In one of his letters he uses these remarkable expressions: "I am ending the course of my life; the world will witness how I have loved my country. I have returned not only to die in her bosom, but to die with her."

Henrietta, daughter of Henry IV. of France, and wife of Charles I. of England, was reduced to the utmost poverty; and her daughter, afterwards married to a brother of Louis XIV., is said to have lain in bed for want of coals to keep her warm. Pen-nant relates a melancholy fact of fallen majesty in the person of Mary d'Este, the unhappy queen of James II., who, flying with her infant prince from the ruin impending over their house, after crossing the Thames from abdicated Whitehall, took shelter beneath the ancient walls of Lambeth church a whole hour, from the rain of the inclement night of December 6th, 1688. Here she waited with aggravated misery till a common coach, procured from the next inn, arrived, and conveyed her to Gravesend, from whence she sailed, and bid adieu to the kingdom.

Pascal, one of the greatest geniuses and best men that ever lived, entertained a notion that God made men miserable here in order to their being happy hereafter; and in consequence of this notion he imposed upon himself the most painful mortification. He even ordered a wall to be built before a window in his study, which afforded him too agreeable a prospect. He had also a girdle full of sharp points next his skin; and while he was eating or drinking any thing that was grateful to his palate, he was constantly pricking himself, that he might not be sensible of any pleasure. The virtuous Fanelon submitted without reserve to the arbitrary sentence of the pope, when he condemned a book which he had published, and even preached in condemnation of his own book, forbidding his friends to defend it. "What gross and humiliating superstitions (says their biographer) have been manifested by men, in other respects of sound and clear understandings, and of upright, honest hearts."

In the churchyard of St. Ann's, Soho, says Pen-nant, is a marble, erected near the grave of that remarkable personage, Theodore Antony Newhoff, king of Corsica, who died in this parish in 1756, immediately after leaving the king's bench prison, by the benefit of the act of insolvency. The marble was erected, and the epitaph written, by the honourable Horace Walpole:—

"The grave, great teacher, to a leval brings Heroes and beggars, galley slaves and kings;
But Theodore this moral learned ere dead—
Fate poured its lesson on his living head,
Bestowed a kingdom, and denied him bread."

He registered his kingdom of Corsica for the use of his creditors. His biographer says, "He was a man whose claim to royalty was as indisputable as the most ancient titles to any monarchy can pretend to be; that is, the choice of his subjects, the voluntary election of an injured people, who had the common right of mankind to freedom, and the uncommon resolution of determining to be free."

VITZIPUTZLI.

The chief deity of the Mexicans. The Mexicans ascribed their settlement in that country to the direction of Vitziputzli. The first inhabitants were a set of savages, and were subdued by the Mexicans under the conduct of Mexi, their captain and law-giver. These latter were a northern people, and undertook this expedition at the command of their God, who promised them success.

Mexi marched at the head of those adventurers, and four priests carried Vitziputzli in a trunk or chest made of reeds. Whenever they encamped they entered a tabernacle in the midst of the camp, and placed the little chest or ark upon an altar. They never marched nor encamped without first consulting the idol, and implicitly receiving his orders. Being at last arrived at the promised land, the god appeared to a priest in a dream, and commanded him to settle in that part of the lake where an eagle should be found sitting on a fig tree growing out of a rock. The place being found by the signs pre-appointed, they there laid the foundations of Mexico. This celebrated city was divided into four quarters or districts, and in the middle was placed the tabernacle of Vitziputzli, till a proper temple should be built to receive him. This story of the first coming of the Mexicans into Mexico agrees, in many circumstances, with that of the entrance of the Israelites into the land of Canaan: whence this should happen is not easy to conjecture.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1828.

☞ The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of New-York, will commence its annual session at the Masonick Hall in this city, on Tuesday next.

☞ The Title Page and Index of the first volume of the Record and Magazine, we shall endeavour to furnish as early as Saturday next. To our mail subscribers it will be sent with the paper of that day.

☞ Such of our subscribers as are in arrears, will render us an especial favour by forwarding the amount due. The many expenses attendant upon our establishment, make it absolutely necessary that we should call upon our delinquent subscribers to assist us.

☞ Post masters and secretaries of chapters and lodges, are requested to act as agents for the Record and Magazine.

☞ We have on hand the results of several masonick elections, all of which shall be published in due time.

☞ We would call the attention of persons using wood cuts, to the advertisement of Mr. John H. Hall, in to-day's Record. The head on our first page was engraved by him.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD, and ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

The first number of the second volume of this work is this day presented to the public; and the publication will be continued regularly every Saturday. The volume will be printed in the quarto form, and with an entire new type.

Its columns are devoted to Freemasonry, the Arts and Sciences, Selections from works of recent Travellers and writers upon the works of Nature, Sketches of the Lives and Characters of Eminent Individuals, Essays on various subjects, Tales, Sketches of Fancy, Scraps of Sentiment and Humour, Anecdotes, Poetry, Foreign and Domestic News, Literary News, &c. &c. &c.

The Masonick department contains Essays, Orations, Addresses, Odes, Hymns, Songs, accounts of Elections, Calendar of Regular Communications, and all other Information touching the interests of the Ancient and Honourable Fraternity.

Such portions of the Miscellaneous Departments as are not occupied by Original matter, are devoted to Selections from choice and valuable works. The editor has entered into arrangements by which he receives from Europe, regular files of several periodical publications of the first respectability in that country, and which have been thought eminently entitled to the confidence of the American Reader; and he trusts, that, by making liberal expenses to enrich the columns of the RECORD and MAGAZINE, he will entitle himself to a share of the public confidence.

TO PATRONS AND READERS. As this number commences a new volume of our journal we are aware that it is the most becoming course we can take to salute our patrons with our best respects, and every other fashionable demonstration of gratitude;—fashionable, we say, because such expressions have become so common, that their character is interwoven with all the thousand insincerities included under the term etiquette. Ours we leave to our patrons to judge whether they are the spontaneous effusions of the heart or the head.

Our humble quarto, maculated with the bright and the dark of every topic on which it delighteth us to comment, or which it behooveth us to transcribe, has now thrown off its ink-beaten, ball-worn dress; and, as a new hat elateth that inmate of our graphick regions, whose title it is not meet to pronounce "before so much good company," so does the tout ensemble of engraved box-wood, full-faced capitals, and platoon columns of Bourgeois, Brevier, &c., all bright and shining, impart to our pages a power of gladness. We would be glad to extend our improvements, but must defer the pursuit for a short time; for we do intend to make the present volume of the Record equal to any thing of the kind in the world. Such may be called a random promise; yet if access to the best sources of scientific and literary information, constant and intense application to the duties which devolve on us, and, above all, that candour and rectitude which shrinks not from the scrutiny of the ALL-SEEING EYE, have any influence on the spirit of a public journal, the task becomes easier than at once imagined.

We do not believe that we were called by a Special Providence to build up and extend the principles of freemasonry, because we know that Providence has more efficient supporters of those principles,—their own intrinsic merit and their salutary influence upon the world. But if any doubt the soundness of these principles, and yet have impartiality enough to institute an inquiry for their own satisfaction, they need only compare our columns, where they are defended, with the most candid of all the disinterested revilers of our order. Such a course, whatever impious and mercenary cavillers may boast, will elicit the doubt whether Providence ever established a press to demolish the fabrick of freemasonry!

In a literary and scientific point of relation, we stand more upon an equal ground with the rest of the world. To these branches of our duty we shall not be inattentive; their productions occupying more than two thirds of our paper. To the female part of the reading community we are not without our devotion. Though the repugnancy of the female opinion to our order has become almost proverbial, we have nevertheless the satisfaction of returning our thanks to a few who have patronized us, and to many who have perused our paper with the most flattering tokens of approbation. This is an encouragement for us to persevere in our endeavours to please; and let the other sex be ever so virulent against our institutions, or our editorial labours, we shall ever be proud to maintain a pacifick demeanour towards the fair, and always hope to deserve their applause.

Our friends who have so liberally tendered their aid to promote the circulation of the Record will accept our warmest thanks; our readiness to reciprocate such favours need only the test of opportunity.

It is perhaps unnecessary for us to repeat our obligations to our correspondents. To those who have contributed to our columns, our thanks have repeatedly been tendered; to those who would have done it, they are none the less due. We are not however so anxious to crowd our columns with original matter, as to preclude the resolution of publishing none which would not reflect more honour on their authors, than on our paper. We are ever ready to encourage incipient talent, but we should be guilty of injustice towards our friends and ourselves, to lavish praise on such productions as are evidently inclined to mislead the judgement, and nourish a foolish conceit in the minds of youthful aspirants for literary fame. Flattery is always more dangerous than detraction; and it is believed that the glory of Byron owed its brilliancy more to the illiberal scrutiny of invidious critics, than to any fostering of his natural pride by flattery.

In political controversy no one can expect us to take a part. We shall however seize on such gems as are the common property of all parties, and if we can make any thing of them worth the attention of our patrons, they shall be served up in our best style. In religion we are prohibited in the same degree from favouring any sect or creed. But so far as we can express our private views, so as to accord with the common tenets of our brethren, we shall do it; but with moderation. Our politics shall be our country; our faith, that on which are founded the pillars of our order.

To those who shall happen to differ with us, if they prefer us such as we have to give, they shall have the same in return: to wit, candour. No other article of exchange will be taken or given. It shall however, be our study to avoid any thing of the disputative nature; with respectable journals we wish to retain better mutual feelings; with those who are not respectable we shall make no intimacy at all. These are the principles we have adhered to, and they will form our rule of conduct for the future. Under these sentiments we feel a confidence that the publick will continue to us the very liberal patronage we have received, with the same charity for our errors, and the same applause when we are so fortunate as to deserve it.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Whinwhams." A work under this title has lately appeared in Boston, composed of original matter, and edited "by Four of Us." It is a work of much merit, nearly in the style of Hood's "Whims and Oddities," and is deservedly well received by the literary world. The tale in this day's Record, and the song on our last page, commencing "It is not in morning's rosy hour, &c." are from the work. For shrewdness and point, we have seen few miscellaneous collections equal to it.

The twenty-ninth number of the New-York Mirror is embellished with the miniature portraits of nine eminent native American writers; Percival, Washington Irving, Halleck, Bryant, Pinckney, Brooks, Sprague, Pierpont, and Woodworth. They are all taken from original portraits expressly for the purpose, and engraved by J. Eddy.

The Manuscript, No. 7, for January, has been issued from the press. It contains two tales: The Reward of Avarice, and The Church Prisoner. This is a monthly periodical published at New-York, and well worthy of patronage.

FOREIGN. By the Phoebe Ann, lately arrived in New-York, from Smyrna, we learn that negotiations had been entered into with the European ambassadors. The Greeks are attacking the castle of Scio, which it was expected would fall soon. They have twenty-seven vessels blockading the port. There can be no doubt that the freedom of Greece is gained; if she can now slip from the yoke of the legimitates, she may take a place among the nations of Europe; but we fear that her chains will be but fastened in another way. The chance cannot however be for the worse.

NEWS AND TRIMMINGS.

Nine Esquimaux dogs, belonging to capt. Lyon, dragged 1611 lbs, one mile, in nine minutes, and worked in the same manner seven or eight hours a day.—Peter the Great at the tomb of cardinal Richelieu, in Paris, exclaimed, "There lies a man to whom I would gladly have given half my dominion, if he would have taught me to govern the other.—An ignorant plebeian having entered the apartment in which Bonaparte was shaving himself, and mistaking him for a servant, said,—I want to see your great emperor; what are you to him?" Napoleon answered, "I shave him."—A patient is said to have taken so much argentum nitrat. in solution, for the gravel that he became blue. [Other chymical preparations have been known to make a man blue as a razor, in a very short time.]—Clipped half dollars are said to be in circulation, from some of which the value of 6 1-4 cents have been shaved.—There lately appeared an extraordinary visiter at Portland, Maine; a mammoth oppossum, who in despite of the laws of civilization, obtruded himself, well-fatted and clumsy, upon the notice of the wondering citizens. By the agility of a youngster he was caught by the tail when it was too late to "back out," like some modern politicians, who sadly experience the consequences of their crooked ways.—At Charleston, South Carolina, on the fourth of January, the thermometer was 72 in the shade; but on being exposed to the sun, in five minutes it rose to 116.—The Savannah market is said to be plentifully supplied with shad!—At Macon, in Georgia, water-melons were exposed in market on Christmas day.—An extraordinary phenomenon lately occurred upon the Kentish coast; the tides, within two hours, rose and fell three times, and at one time higher than the ordinary bounds of the spring tides.

—Within the limits of Baltimore there were 4536 persons vaccinated during the year 1827.—In a company of cavalry, organized in Chautauque county in this state, they have elected a lieutenant named Walkup! [What a misnomer! If we had such a name, and belonged to the cavalry too, we would forthwith make application to the legislature to have it altered to Rideup.]—According to a paper printed in Westchester county, we learn that more convicts are wanted to labour on the new state prison in that county. To encourage applicants, the same paper adds that the situation is healthy, and that there are 428 cells and only 235 inmates. [A fine opportunity for young men out of employ.]—In 1827, a list of the shipping built in New-York gives 15 ships, 7 brigs, and 6 smaller craft, during the year 1827, making a tonnage of 8000.—There were in the port of New-Orleans on the 10th of December last, 205 sail of vessels, comprising 85 ships, 70 brigs, 22 schrs., 8 sloops, and 46 steam-boats.—

40.—20.—45.—43.—37.—30.

are the drawn numbers for the New-York Consolidated Lottery as decided on Wednesday last.—A committee of the legislature of Maine have reported in favour of locating the seat of government at Augusta.—Mrs. Royall visited our city this week, on her way to the south. The good old lady was prevented from visiting her editorial friends as usual, in consequence of a sprained ankle.—The friends of general Jackson belonging to both houses of the legislature, to the number of 109, met at the capital on Thursday evening last, and made a nomination. Many members were absent. It is presumed that nearly three fourths of the whole legislature are friendly to the election of the general.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Saturday, Jan. 26. In senate, a communication was received from the commissioners appointed by the act concerning the territorial limits of this state and the state of New-Jersey, read, and ordered to be laid on the table. The canal commissioners transmitted a report on the subject of the surplus waters of the Erie canal: ordered printed. The bill from the assembly to divide the town of Holland, Erie county, was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, a report was received from the surveyor general, relative to lands granted to actual settlers in the counties of Franklin and Essex, under a law of 1822: ordered printed. Mr. Wardwell offered several resolutions, recommending to congress a revision of the tariff, so as to afford a sufficient protection to the growers of wool, &c. &c. Bills read a third time and passed: to incorporate the New-York Beneficial society; to prevent the destruction of fish in Beech pond; extending the time to build a boat at a ferry across Cayuga lake; amending the act authorizing William Johnstone to maintain a ferry across the St. Lawrence; to divide the town of Orwell; to reduce the capital of the Franklin Insurance Company in New-York; same of the Jefferson Insurance Company in New-York; and to designate and fix the location of the publick buildings in the county of St. Lawrence.

Monday, Jan. 28. In senate, in committee of the whole, the bill from the assembly to facilitate the publication of a map and atlas of this state, was considered; and the first section rejected 9 to 14.

In assembly, the speaker asked leave of absence for twelve days. Leave was granted, and Mr. Bucklin was elected speaker pro tem. The bill to incorporate the Otisville Turnpike Company, was read a third time and passed.

Tuesday, Jan. 29. In Senate, the bill to incorporate the Hudson Horticultural Society was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, the annual reports of the superintendent of common schools; of the superintendent and inspector of the Onondaga salt works; and relative to the Brothertown and Stockbridge Indians, were received and ordered to be printed. Bills read a third time and passed: to enable George Whitney to build a dam across the Chenango river; and to alter the time of annual town meetings in the towns of Truxton and Clay.

Wednesday, Jan. 30. In Senate, the resolutions of the two houses on the tariff, elicited much debate, of a character, though truly interesting to political men, not exactly calculated to add to the interest of our columns. These resolutions occupied the attention of the senate during the day.

In assembly, the bill appropriating the surplus poor funds of the town of Gouverneur to the support of common schools, was read a third time and passed. The tariff question was also for some time before the house, when the resolutions brought in by Mr. Wardwell were passed, 97 to 3. [We shall speak of these resolutions hereafter, as their importance seems to require.]

Thursday, Jan. 31. In senate, the resolutions relating to the tariff were adopted, 21 to 9. The importance of these resolutions brought on a long, and, in some instances a warm debate, which occupied the attention of the senate during the day.

In assembly, Mr. Edgerton submitted a joint resolution, that the legislature will, on Monday the 4th day of February next, at noon, proceed to the choice of a treasurer of this state; and at the same time, elect a committee of the legislature, pursuant to the provisions of the revised statutes, to examine the accounts and vouchers of the treasurer in the month of December next. A report was received from the attorney general, in compliance with a resolution of the house, giving his opinion, that there is no constitutional objection to the establishment of a superior court in the city of New-York, nor to any of the provisions of the bill laid before him, providing for the establishment of such a court: ordered printed. It was resolved that the commissary general report to this house a statement of the regiments of artillery that are supplied with field pieces, and to what extent, and also of those not provided; and that he submit an estimate of the amount of appropriation necessary for the purchase and mounting of field ordnance, required to equip each regiment complete.

Friday, Feb. 1. In senate, several petitions were presented and referred; some progress was made on the unfinished business, but nothing of an abstract nature decided. The same may be said of the assembly; considerable progress was made on the variety of subjects before the house, but nothing decided which it is necessary for us to report.

MARRIED,

On the 24th ult., Mr. BRIGHAM SCOVILLE, to Miss JANE, daughter of Gen. John Stilwell, all of this city.

DIED,

On the 30th ult., Mr. TÖBIAS V. CUYLER, late publisher of the Albany Directory.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to the late firm of R. STARR & Co. in the above Foundry, continue to execute orders for Plain and Ornamental Type, Brass Rule, and Metal Cuts. Also, for Presses and Ink, Chases, composing Sticks, Cases and Stands, Galleys, and printing materials of every description, at short notice, and on terms as liberal as those of other Foundries.

Many new articles have been added to this Foundry within the last year—among which are new founts of Small Pica and Bourgeois. Also, Small Pica, Brevier and Minion full face capitals for captions, and full face two line letter of all the different sizes from Pica to Pearl. Likewise Canon, Double Great Primer, Double Pica, Great Primer and Pica Antiques, with lower case to each, and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil antique capitals. Also, many elegant Borders and Newspaper Ornaments, none of which are stereotyped from wood cuts or type, as is usual at most other foundries, but all are cut on steel and cast in copper matrices, and are warranted to work clear. Printers will at once perceive the superiority of those cast in copper matrices, the lines not being filled up and the edges rounded, as is the case with those stereotyped. The large job letter and cuts are all cast in moulds and matrices, on metal bodies, and with the exactness of the smaller type.

Have also cut a new and very beautiful English Script, on inclined body, orders for which can be executed by the first of April. By being cast on inclined body, the face is not exposed as on square body, where most of the letters are kerned; and the mould in which it is cast having a notch or shoulder in the side the type are kept perfectly in line. No expense has been spared, and it is confidently believed, that this Script will be found the most elegant type ever cast in this country, or in Europe.

Type cast at this foundry is warranted equal at least in hardness and durability, to any cast in this country. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the founts regularly put up. It is intended to keep such a supply on hand as to be able to furnish orders without the usual delay. Orders by mail, or left at the Foundry, No. 8. Liberty street, will receive prompt attention. STARR & LITTLE.

POETRY.

THE BROKEN HEART.

BY MRS. HALE.

Life hath its scenes of lofty wo,—
To tell of these,
Proud bards will bid their numbers flow,
And while the solemn harpings slow
Die on the breeze,
Admiring crowds applaud and sigh
O'er griefs breathed thus melodiously.

My lyre hath no such harmony
To wake the tear;
And yet the heart of sympathy
Perchance may give one throb to me,
And pity hear
The sad and simple tale I tell—
A scene, alas! remembered well.

'Twas on a lovely summer morn,
When earth was fair;
The wild bee wound his mellow horn;
The farmer eyed his thriving corn,
And on the air
Came mingled sounds of toil and mirth,
And gave the mind's best feelings birth.

And all were glad save one—she leaned
Beside a tree;
The boughs her features partly screened,
And lawn and garden intervened
'Twixt her and me—
A garden fair, a lovely lawn,
And yet to her my glance was drawn.

And to her faded bosom pressed
A babe she bore,
And oft and fondly she caressed—
I knew her well—she had been blessed—
But that was o'er;
And now she only came to gaze
On scenes she loved in happier days.

There had she dwelt in bliss—and there
Her soul dwelt yet:
Oh, there be ties we can not tear—
The heart must hold them or despair—
Could she forget
The home to which she came a bride?
The home in which her husband died?

But strangers now were there—and she—
Her home was heaven—
And when she heard the sounds of glee,
That seemed to mock her misery,
Her heart was riven;—
She sunk, and ere I reached her side,
She kissed her babe's bright cheek, and died!

And this the giddy world will hear,
Nor laugh the less;
The world reserves its selfish tear,
To sparkle on the costly bier;
And crowds will press
To see the mighty laid in dust—
And slaves will eulogize the worst:—

But sorrow unattended goes
To her last home;
There's none the humble sufferer knows—
And yet I call her blessed to those—
For her the tomb
Is peace—no sighs to earth are given—
Her friend, her treasure is in heaven!

SONG.

It is not in morning's rosy hour,
Nor under the sunset hue,
But beneath the leafy moonlit bower,
That lovers should bid "adieu!"

It is not in friendship's social hall,
Where faith hath linked the few—
But where the feet of the fairies fall,
That lover's should bid "adieu!"

It is not with smiles, to the joyous dear,
When pleasures seem ever new—
'Tis with plaintive sighs, and the falling tear,
That lovers should bid "adieu!"

I WAS A BOY.

IN IMITATION OF WORDSWORTH.

"———Passing sweet
Are the domains of tender memory."—Wordsworth.

I was a boy; and she was fair
As you are when you smile,
And her voice came forth like the summer air,
With a tone that did beguile,
And her two blue eyes refreshing were
As two trees on an Indian isle.

Her dancing shape I cannot tell,
But never may forget;
The heart remembers all too well—
Sweet girl! I see her yet;
But I was hers by a holier spell
In the soul's deep cavern set.

Ah me! what blissful rambles then,
Children in childhood's band,
Had we through many a lonesome glen,
And many a faery strand!
Now these scenes are fading! we busy men
Are travelling from that land.

A little shepherdess by birth,
An orphan on that plain,
She drank the beauties of the earth,
And never knew of pain—
But the breezy song of her maiden mirth
Shall ne'er be heard again.

Oh! can it be that she should lie
In a grave of cold, cold clay,
Whom I have known as fluttering high
As a new-born thrush in May,
And yet as quiet as the sky
In the morn of a summer day!

With fairest maidens I have been,
And they were lovely things,
When they danced upon yon hidden green,
Like Fairies in their rings;
But a fairer still my heart hath seen
In its lone imaginings.

Nay, Chloris! 'twas a boyish love,
And desolated soon—
A longer life hath the woodland dove,
Longer the rose of June!
And now she's gone, far, far above
Or sun, or stars, or moon!

Chloris! I'm thine; yea, by those eyes,
So soft, so bright, I swear!
Yet sometimes will a thought arise
Of one that was as fair;
Yes, my heart is thine, though from the skies,
An angel visit there!

THE ANTIQUE URN.

Poor shattered mould of simple clay,
Once for most solemn use designed!
Art thou again restored to day
To point the moral to mankind?—
How worthless, brief, and frail is fame!
When Rome's imperial eagles flew,
And spread o'er half the world her reign,
This distant land her notice drew;
Her warriors braved the stormy main
To win a glorious deathless name!

One hero left that lovely land,
Where science dwelt, where beauty smiled;
Hither he brought a chosen band
To war against a nation, wild,
Untamed, but noble—they were free;
Their rocks—their forests were their own,
Their richest robes the grim wolf's hide;
They bowed before no tyrant's throne,
Their wealth the scorn of splendid pride,
Their isle the home of Liberty.

The hero toiled, the hero fought,
Whilst blood and rapine marked his way;
A proud imperial car he sought,—
Death sternly smiling o'er his prey,
Said, "do thy task and then be mine!"
The laurel wreath—the captive train—
A nation's loud applauding hail—
Where are they?—where all pride is vain,

The hero sinks, cold, stiff, and pale,
On his last couch—funeral pine!

That form whose spirit could aspire
Britannia's sons as slaves to turn,
Then slowly smouldered on the fire,
Till scarce its ashes filled this urn,
Now broken by a peasant's spade:
Tells not imperial Rome his deeds
Whose tombs and temples brave the skies?
Midst noxious plants o'ergrown with weeds,
Imperial Rome in ruin lies,
To all the earth a warning made.

All of the warrior that remains
Is but this thymy scarce raised mound;
Where the lone nightingale complains,
Where earliest field flowers yet are found
By the light hearted shepherd boy;
The rude stone chest in which it lay,
Now placed to catch the scanty stream—
This urn—fast mouldering in decay—
And an unnoted minstrel's dream,
That to the lute hath sung this toy!

THE COAT AND THE PILLOW.

A FABLE.

It chanced that the coat of a very fine fellow
Had been thrown on a bed, and lay close to the pillow.
With that ease which high company gives, (for the coat
Had been much in the world and in circles of note,)
"Friend Pillow," says he, "why that look of distress?
By your tumbled condition, you've slept ill I guess!
Or perhaps that your master is gone you are sorry:
He's a very fine fellow; if so I feel for ye.
I'm always delighted to go where he goes
And mix in the mirth that around him he throws.
Gay, wealthy, and, witty, and wanton, and young,
Made for conquest his form, for persuasion his tongue,
On whom nature her presents so lavishly showers,
What mortal so blessed as this master of ours?
'Twould delight you to see with what grateful composure,
He throws down his guineas, or stakes an enclosure.
'Tother night 'twas at what that Sir Somebody blundered,
And lost him, I think 'twasn't less than a hundred,
To see him, my friend, you'd conclude he had won.
Such an easy good tempered sweet smile he put on.
What with dancing, and singing, and laughing, and drinking,
You'd wonder what time he had left him for thinking;
If he wins, if he loses, he's glad, and still glad;
I can not believe he knows how to be sad.
With such mental control, and a heart so at ease,
Sure never was found a man so to please."

"And now," says the Pillow, "its my turn to speak;
If I let you alone you'll go on for a week.
Since you say that with you he's as light as a feather,
Pray keep him, or come to bed always together;
For the moment you're off, such a trade then commences,
You'd think he was fairly bereft of his senses;
Such complaining, such sorrow, repentance, and hate,
Such cursing his fortune, such damning his fate,
That, taking in bedlam, there is not in town,
A pillow whose state I'd not change with my own.
The night that Sir Somebody lost him a hundred,
As soon as he laid himself down, how he thundered!
I never was in such a fright in my life;
He could not worse treat me if I were his wife.
He thinks, I believe, he can't use me too rough;
I am sometimes too high, sometimes not high enough;
Then such knocking, and thumping, and squeezing, but still
I can't give content, do whatever I will.
To complete my misfortune, sometimes in a sally,
He throws me as hard as he can at his valet,
Who ventures to give him his scurvy advice,
To have nothing to do with those villainous dice.
'Tother night he declared he would do for himself,
And took down a pistol which lay on the shelf,
But after he'd held it some time to his head,
He thought better on't and bethumped me instead.
If this is the way with your very fine fellows,
'Twere better be any thing else than their pillows."

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ORATION,

Delivered at Zanesville, Ohio, on the festival of Saint John the Evangelist, December 27, 1810, before the Lodge of Amity. By Brother LEWIS CASS, late Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Ohio, and present Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Michigan.

(Concluded.)

Such are the effects of our society, such the illustration of its principles. Nor does its moral tendency yield to its practical consequences: the mild spirit of toleration which it breathes, is the more precious when contrasted with the intolerance and bigotry which have been so universally prevalent in the world. Nations have forgotten that the object of political institutions is to protect natural rights, and every government has connected its religious opinions with its civil establishments; liturgies and creeds, articles of faith and rules of discipline stain the rubrick page of history, and speculative points of doctrine have occasioned more misery in the world than all those natural evils by which nations are punished for their crimes and recalled to their duty. Every country has been the sport of contending opinions, and martyrs have as readily been found as persecutors. Vindictive in prosperity, and resigned in adversity as the vicissitudes of circumstances has alternately given to hostile sects the victory, they have celebrated their triumph in persecution, and their defeat in martyrdom. Deriving no wisdom from a retrospect of the past, and no mercy from a contemplation of the future, they have resolved to indulge the malevolence of bigotry and the ferocity of vengeance in the gratification of the present.

This fortunate country first exhibited to the world the rational but novel spectacle of a people forming their government independent of their religion, and requiring no test of the one as a condition for enjoying the privileges of the other. Almost eighteen centuries had elapsed after the divine author of christianity sacrificed his life upon the shrine of intolerance, before the mild tenets of his religion were acknowledged and thus practically enforced.

While this darkness pervaded the world, our predecessors were faithful to the principles of the order, and their successors have neither been unmindful of their precepts nor heedless of their example. We arraign no man's political opinions, we interfere not with his religious creed—to his country and himself we leave the one, to his conscience and his God we commit the other. Inhabitants of hostile countries, men separated from the land of their nativity by intervening oceans, assemble at our festive meetings, and present their votive offerings upon the altar of masonry. All their prejudices and opinions, which might disturb the peace or interrupt the harmony of the lodge, are left as useless incumbrances at its door. They loose the sandals from their feet, for the ground whereon they stand is holy. They re-enter the world better prepared for its duties and avocations, and more fitted for the cultivation and attainment of those qualities, without which the comforts of life and the refinements of society would yield to savage and barbarous pursuits. The christian returns to his temple; the Jew to his Synagogue; the Mahometan to his Mosque, and the Indian to his Pagoda, more suitably impressed with reverence for the Great Architect of all things, by the solemn and imposing ceremonies they have witnessed.

The natural, moral, and political blessings we enjoy, render us almost insensible to the distress and desolation which afflict the world. If from this happy land we cast our eyes upon the ancient continent, we shall find the spirit of hatred and animosity inflaming her people, and embattled armies arrayed for slaughter. The tempest of war and destruction overshadows her prospects, and the crimson standard of ambition rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm. Her publick faith, her social institutions, her peace and happiness will soon exist only upon the canvass of history, leaving the inhabitants in that state of moral depravity and mental darkness which succeeded the splendid era of ancient literature. Happy would it be for mankind, thrice happy for the generations which will follow us, if a mound could be raised to stem this furious torrent which threatens to inundate the social world; if an institution could be devised to restrain the spirit of ambition, to check the love of domination, and to give charity and forbearance to individuals, justice and integrity to governments, peace and concord to nations.

"Come, enter with me the door of masonry. I stand as the herald at the porch of the temple, to announce its beauties and exhibit its glories." You will there find an order, whose object is to curb intemperate passions, and to reconcile conflicting interests—to extend to nations those principles of humanity and benevolence, which should actuate individuals—to destroy the pride of conquest and the pomp of war—to annihilate local prejudices and unreasonable partialities—to banish from the world every source of enmity and hostility, and to introduce those social feelings which are better calculated to preserve peace and good order than penal laws or political regulations. If these objects are of importance to humanity, then is this society important—if these blessings can be attained in this imperfect state, then may we hope to attain them.

If wisdom be desirable in your plans, strength in their foundation, and beauty in their execution, come to these pillars of wisdom, strength, and beauty, and you may erect a temple more durable than heathen superstition ever dedicated to fear, and more useful than mistaken zeal ever devoted to piety;—and with hope to discern, with faith to believe, and with charity to merit, you may look forward through the dim twilight of time to that lodge not made with hands, where every upright mason may expect to find a leader and a friend, where the doubts and difficulties, which now obscure the moral firmament, shall be lost in cloudless effulgence before Him "whose body is truth, and whose shadow is light."

Respected Officers and Brethren—On this natal day of him whose life formed a bright constellation of masonic virtues, we are assembled to commemorate the institution of our order, and to pay the tribute of fraternal affection to our brethren, who have merited it by the purity of their lives and the benevolence of their deeds. The love of virtuous fame is the gem of noble sentiments, and the spring of glorious actions. Coeval with reason, it ceases to operate with its extinguishment only—co-extensive with society, its influence is felt and acknowledged from the cottage to the palace. It gives an energy to our minds, which enables them to resist the pressure of untoward events, and furnishes us with a powerful motive for virtuous pursuits, not bounded by that goal which terminates every other terrestrial prospect—to sail down the tide of time till it is lost in the ocean of Eternity, to be enrolled on the same page of history with the sages and patriots of ancient and of modern days, and to be embalmed in the memory of the wise and virtuous, is a full compensation for the ills of poverty, the troubles of adversity, and the numberless evils which chequer the variegated scene of life.

Let, therefore, the wisdom of Solomon, the fidelity of Hiram, and the virtues of Saint John, become memorable examples, to conduct us through the perilous journey of life, and finally to bring us to that pure and perfect light, where past misfortunes will be obliterated in the fulness of perfect beatitude.

Let the valour of Warren, the philanthropy of Franklin, and the patriotism of Washington, this day fill every heart, and dwell on every tongue. May the cassia bloom perennial over their graves, for they have gone down cloudless in the west, ripe in years, and full of virtue.

Warriours and conquerors, how light is the pageantry of your triumphs, when weighed in the balance of a nation's love! How trivial your fame, when compared with the memory of these benefactors of mankind, these friends of millions! The glory of heroes has become cheap and common. Every age and almost every nation have been fertile in sanguinary despots, who have waded through death and desolation to a short-lived fame. They thicken their numbers, they multiply their ranks, as we view them through the long telescope of history, till they become almost as undistinguished as the soldiers whom they led to slaughter. Mankind, recalled to reason by a recollection of their sufferings, have at length resolved to bestow their gratitude and esteem upon their friends and benefactors only, and titled robbers, whose power is too great to dread the stroke of justice or the lash of satire, will find a sure though tardy punishment in the execration of that posterity, from whose judgement there is no appeal. But the fame of these our departed brethren, resembles a beacon erected on a dangerous coast to guide the weary mariner to his long sought port. Amid the howlings of the storm and the obscurity of the night, it darts its rays athwart the ocean, shining with radiant splendour upon the interminable darkness, cheering the desponding seamen, and conducting their shattered bark to the haven of rest, the land of security.

Nor is all our sensibility due to departed worth: Living virtue also claims its share. Let us still recollect, that however unjustly the world will confound our doctrines with our practice, and will judge of our principles by the purity of our lives—it, therefore becomes us to test our actions by the square of integrity, and to restrain our desires by the compass of duty. Let us not build on a sandy foundation, nor daub with untempered mortar. Carry into the world the recollection of those obligations, which are designed to make us moral men and quiet citizens, to improve the manners, and meliorate the heart. In the asperity of political discussions, in the warmth of religious disputes, in the numberless controversies which embitter the peace of society, recollect the principles they inculcate and enjoin. Be ever ready to extend to others that charity you have a right to expect. Remember the forgotten, attend to the neglected, visit the forsaken. Bear prosperity with equanimity, and adversity with fortitude; never forgetting, as it was your fate to meet on the level, so it is your duty to part on the square. You will thus find refreshment in the south and your reward in the west. And when the wealth and honour, and pomp and power of this world shall fall before the mighty destroyer; when the shadows of life shall be dissolved in the realities of futurity, and when the morning of eternity shall dawn, ye will be admitted into that Lodge, where knowledge and virtue and happiness shall continue progressively to increase; when the proudest monuments of human industry, and this stupendous work of the Omnipotent Architect, shall have passed away, "and like the baseless fabric of a vision left not a wreck behind."—So may it be.

SOUTH-CAROLINA.

Ceremony of laying the corner stone of the Charleston College.

An invitation having been extended to the masonic fraternity, by the trustees of the Charleston college, to officiate in the laying of the cornerstone of the new edifice, the Grand Lodge with its officers and the members of the subordinate lodges in the city, on the 12th of January last, performed this most interesting ceremony in ample form. In pursuance of previous arrangements, the procession of the masonic body formed at Seyle's in Meeting-street, and passed down Meeting, Chalmers, Church and Broad-streets, to the City Hall, where the president and wardens, the trustees, professors and students of the college, the professors and students of the medical college, the different societies, and the citizens generally were in readiness to receive them. The whole procession then moved through Broad, King, George, and St. Philip's streets, to the north gate of the college yard, through which it entered. The masonic body having passed under the arch erected for the occasion, filed off to the right and left and formed a square around the platform, erected at the north-east corner for the Grand Master B. F. HUNT, and his principal grand officers, and the intendent of the city. Other platforms had also been erected for the accommodation of the ladies and the orator of the day. On ascending the platform, the intendent addressed the Grand Master signifying the wish of the trustees, that the Grand Lodge would officiate in laying the corner stone of the college, with which the Grand Master complied. Upon which a prayer was offered by the Rev. Brother JOSEPH BROWN, officiating as Grand Chaplain, and the Grand Master then proceeded to lay the stone according to ancient form. As the stone was lowered, an ode adapted to the music of Pleyel's Hymn was sung, with the accompaniment of appropriate music. Immediately previous to laying the stone, the Grand Treasurer MOSES HOLBROOK, by command of the Grand Master had deposited upon the under stone in niches prepared for each, specimens of every American coin of the present day in circulation.

After these ceremonies, the Grand Master presented the principal Architect with the plumb, square, and level, with a suitable address.

After which, CHARLES FRASER, Esq. delivered an oration, agreeably with the appointment of the Trustees of the College—and the Masonick Body returned in procession to their Hall, when they were dismissed.

The concourse of ladies and citizens notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, was numerous highly and respectable, and the ceremonies of the occasion splendid and imposing. The various addresses, the prayer, and the oration, are spoken of in terms of high commendation, and it is expected will be given for publication.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

INTERNAL ENEMIES OF HUMAN LIFE.

Extracted from a paper communicated by Doct. Van Rensselaer to Silliman's Journal.

It is a well established fact, that animals have issued from various parts of the human frame, however much the idea may have been ridiculed. But skepticism in science is daily yielding to observation, and the investigations of practical men are clearing away much of the rubbish that popular belief and prejudice have placed in the way of naturalists. Facts, well authenticated and indisputable, are now received as scientific records, which a few years ago would have startled the best informed minds of the day; whence we are led to hope that science will continue to advance, and unfold to us more of those hidden operations of nature, which are yet mysteries to us, and seem now inexplicable.

Man, wonderfully and fearfully made, is heir to ills unknown to most of us—among which may be enumerated those arising from punitive insects, that "bore into his flesh, descend into his stomach and viscera, derange his whole system, and thus often occasion his death,"—of which several instances are related in the work above mentioned. I am convinced that many of those village tales that excite derision at the moment in most but the unfortunate sufferer, would if thoroughly investigated, and plainly recorded, shed light, when properly collected and compared, on many of the mysteries that now perplex us.

Abundant evidence has been adduced, says Messrs. Kirby and Spence, to establish the fact beyond all controversy, that the meal worm, (Tenebrio Molitor L.) whose usual food is flour, has frequently been voided by human beings and in one instance is stated to have caused death. How these grubs got into the stomach, unless the eggs were swallowed in some preparation of flour, it is difficult to say. But that the animal should be able to sustain the heat of this organ, so far exceeding the temperature to which it is usually accustomed, is the most extraordinary fact of all.

Dr. Martin Lister, so well known to geologists, was also, it seems, an attentive observer in his profession, and has recorded the case of a girl who voided three hexapod larvæ similar to what are found in the carcasses of birds.

In the German Ephemerides, is related the case of a girl, from an abscess in the calf of whose leg crept black worms resembling beetles.

The larvæ of some beetle, it seems, have been ejected from the lungs. Four, of which the largest was three fourths of an inch long, were discovered in the mucus expelled after a severe fit of coughing by a lady afflicted with a pulmonary disease; and similar larvæ of a smaller size were once afterwards discharged in the same way.

No one would suppose that caterpillars which feed upon vegetable substances, could be found alive in the stomach. But a case is recorded in the Phil. Trans. by Lister, of a boy who vomited up several, which had sixteen legs. The eggs, it is observed, might have been eaten with salad, and enough of the vegetable might have been retained to support them when hatched.

Linnæus mentions that the caterpillar of a moth (Cranibus Pinguinalis F.) has also been found in the stomach. A case is related by Angelinus and Alsarius, who give the figure, of a caterpillar of great length, said to have been voided from the nostrils of a young man long afflicted with dreadful pains in the head.

It is well known that the gad-fly, (Astrus L.) solely annoys cattle and other quadrupeds—but it is not generally known that there is a species appropriated to man. Its existence has been unnoticed by entomologists, at least in books, since Gmelin's edition of the Systema Naturæ, until Humboldt and Bonpland mentioned, that, to the myriads of muscetoës, which render uninhabitable a great and beautiful portion of the torrid zone, may be added the astrus hominis, which deposits its eggs in the skin of man, and causes tumors. Gmelin mentions it on the authority of the younger Linnæus, and says that it remains beneath the skin of the abdomen six months, penetrating deeper, if disturbed, and sometimes occasioning death. Even the gad-fly of the ox, leaving its proper food, has been known to deposit its eggs in the jaw of a woman, and the bots produced from the eggs finally caused her death.

Other flies of various kinds thus penetrate into us, either preying upon our flesh, or getting into our intestines. Lewenhock mentions the case of a woman whose leg had been enlarged with glandular bodies for some years. Her surgeon gave him one he had cut from it, in which were several maggots;—these he fed with flesh till they assumed the pupa, when they produced a fly as large as the flesh-fly.

Azara mentions that in Paraguay he has known instances of persons, who, after having bled from the nose in their sleep, were attacked with the most violent head-aches; and only receive relief when several maggots, the offspring of the flesh-fly, issued from their nostrils.

In Jamaica a large blue fly hovers around the sick, and is with difficulty prevented by nurses from depositing eggs in the nose, mouth, and gums of the invalids. Lempriere records the case of a lady, who after recovering from fever, fell a victim to the maggots of this fly, which from the nose, found their way through the os cribriforme into the cavity of the skull, and afterwards into the brain.

Bonnet relates that he had seen the certificate of an English physician, stating that a girl, who had by prescription of a quack, swallowed some saw bugs alive, threw up a prodigious number of them, of all sizes, which must have bred in her stomach.

FOGS.

To the Editor of the London Courier.

Sir,—Dr. Davy, the brother of Sir Humphrey Davy, was, I believe, the first person, who broadly laid it down, that Fogs arise whenever the air becomes colder than the water. From this principle we can draw the following conclusions:—

1. Fogs, will be most frequent in autumn, after the earth has been heated during the summer, the air cooling faster than the earth.

2. Fogs will be greater after the hottest summer.

3. Fogs show that the air has become suddenly colder, and therefore is a Sign of Snow.

4. Fogs will be rare in hot climates, where the air is usually very hot.

5. Fogs will be very frequent in the Arctic regions where the sudden depressions of temperature are enormously below the mean temperature.

6. Fogs will be most frequent over shallow water, which sooner partakes of the temperature of the bottom than the deeper water. The end of the deep water is known near the Banks of Newfoundland, by the sudden commencement of the Fogs. The thick Fogs which appeared during Captain Franklin's last expedition, prove that the seas are very shallow, and the mean temperature not very low, upon that part of the arctic coast.

7. If the London Fogs have increased during the late years, it will prove either that the mean temperature has increased, or that the variations of temperature have increased, or that a disproportion of temperature between the water and the air has increased, or that the Thames has diminished in depth.

It is my belief that the last has occurred, partly from the natural rise of all embanked river beds, and partly from the effect of Waterloo Bridge. This bridge is unhappily placed near a bend of the River, and it is to be feared that the alignment of the Arches of the other bridges, and the course of the current has not been duly considered. The only remedy is to narrow the channel, so as to increase its depth, upon some such plan as Col. Torren's. The Quays of the insignificant Seine are open, the Thames is inaccessible. It is however, very dubious whether that great work would pay as a commercial speculation.

MEDICAL.

THE LIVERWORT.

To the Editors of the National Intelligencer.

Gentlemen: You have frequently served the cause of suffering humanity, by giving circulation to important discoveries made in the healing art. I beg your indulgence to state, for the good of the public, that, since the winter of 1824-5, I have had three violent attacks of an inflammation of the liver, each subsequent attack worse than the former; that I have thrice undergone salivation, to the manifest injury of my constitution; that soon after the effect of the third salivation was wearing off, I had an addition to my afflictions, of the most painful kind, viz. bleeding from the lungs; to check the progress of which, the first remedy resorted to, was that recommended by the immortal Dr. Rush—I swallowed as much fine salt as my situation would admit of. This generally checked the bleeding for a season. I also had recourse to blood letting from the arm, to the application of leeches on my breast, and to cupping, all of which, I know by experience, to be serviceable for a time. I have also submitted to blistering, which afforded me some relief. In fine, from my first attack, till recently, I was under the full impression that the breast or lung consumption had taken fast hold on me, notwithstanding my family physician, Doctor Jones, assured me to the contrary, repeatedly, to whose opinion I now gladly assent.

As soon as I saw Dr. Hereford's publication of the beneficial effects produced by the drinking of the Liverwort tea, I determined to give the Liverwort a fair trial in my case, and accordingly procured a supply, which I have used for near three months as my only drink, nourishing liquids excepted. Since I commenced drinking the Liverwort tea, I have had no return of spitting of blood, and my strength has rapidly improved. When I call to mind my former situation, as before described, under the operation of salivation, blistering, the use of the lancet, and all the accompanying attendants on a debilitated constitution, not the least of which was the danger of strangling, from the great quantity of blood issuing from the lungs—to relieve me of which thirty leeches have been applied to my breast at one time, and thirty-nine incisions made on my breast for the use of the cupping instruments—having experienced all this distress, and infinitely more than I can describe during the past Spring and Summer, (as often as twice in one month the distress arising from bleeding at the lungs,) and now to find myself free from this alarming visitor, and all the other evils brought in its train, such as leeches, cupping, &c.—the whole benefit resulting from the use of the Liverwort tea, (for a period but little over two months,) with my health and strength improved; imparts to me a felicity truly gratifying, and which I desire to make known, for the benefit of all who may be similarly affected. All such I exhort to give the Liverwort tea a fair trial, and be attentive to their diet; for I have the best ground for believing that it was reserved for the Liverwort, through the blessing of Divine Providence, to do for me what all other expedients had failed to effect. And, from the experience I have had of this healing plant, I am of the opinion that all those afflicted with that distressing complaint, the obstruction of the urinal passages, should drink freely of the Liverwort tea; for it acts powerfully on the kidneys and those passages. They certainly would find it to their advantage. In conclusion, I would observe, that I have, for the last sixteen months rigidly adhered to a milk diet. I have drank the Liverwort tea in its cold state, as advised by Dr. Hereford and have abstained from all teas and coffees in a warm state, and all other stimulating draughts of every kind.

JOHN CONNELL.

Washington, January 10th, 1828.

P. S. Directions for preparing the Tea, &c. A double handful of the Liverwort after washing it clean, is to be put into a sauce-pan, and half a gallon of boiling water poured on the same; let the pan then remain on the hot embers, or stove, and simmer for about an hour and a half; then pour the whole into a proper vessel to drink out of. When cold, it may be drunk as often as the thirst or state of the stomach will admit. The keeping the leaves in the vessel while using the tea, is necessary, to keep the same limpid.

THE GATHERER.

SUPERSTITION.

In a little manual of piety, composed, in 1712, for the young ladies who were then pensioners at the monastery of St. Augustin, at Bruges, we have been surprised into frequent smiles by the scrupulous watchfulness with which the ghostly writer followed the lady-pensioners (though with pious fancy only) to the very sacred of sacreds! He was not contented with directing them concerning the prayers which he believed proper to be used when they assumed, or laid aside, their respective garments, but even directed them what to do before they attempted to close an eye on the softness of their pillows! Prayers are specified by this zealous pastor for the following curious occasions:—

- In putting on your petticoat.
- In putting on your night-gown.
- In dressing your head.
- In putting on your manteau.

In regard to the ceremony of laying aside these memorials of the weakness of Eve, our general mother, there is a prayer to be offered "whilst you undress yourself;" and the ladies are strictly enjoined, before they "get into bed, to take holy water." The writer concludes this part of his instructions by saying, "when you are in bed, write the name of Jesus on your forehead with your thumb!"

HOSPITAL FOR THE DUMB.

The Banian hospital at Surat is a most remarkable institution; it consists of a large plot of ground, enclosed with high walls, divided into several courts or wards, for the accommodation of animals; in sickness they are attended with the tenderest care, and find a peaceful asylum for the infirmities of age. When an animal breaks a limb, or is otherwise disabled from serving his master, he carries him to the hospital, and indifferent to what nation or caste the owner may belong, the patient is never refused admittance. If he recover, he cannot be reclaimed, but must remain in the hospital for life, subject to the duty of drawing water for those pensioners debilitated by age or disease from procuring it for themselves. At my visit, the hospital contained horses, mules, oxen, sheep, goats, monkeys, poultry, pigeons, and a variety of birds, with an aged tortoise, who was known to have been there for seventy-five years. The most extraordinary ward was that appropriated to rats, mice, bugs, and other noxious vermin. The overseers of the hospital frequently hire beggars from the streets, for a stipulated sum, to pass a night among the fleas, lice, and bugs, on the express condition of suffering them to enjoy their feast without molestation.

[Forbes's Oriental Memoirs.]

THE PHILOSOPHER AND THE FOOL.

Two men, the one a philosopher and the other a fool, were in the service of the same master, and slept in the same bed; the philosopher lay on the outside. One morning, having overslept themselves, the master, coming in with a whip, flogged the philosopher, who happened to be nearest on his entrance into the room. "This I will avoid another time," said the philosopher to himself; on the next night, therefore, he changed sides with the fool. In the morning they again transgressed, and the master came to chastise them; but reflecting that he had before whipped the man that was nearest, he thought it but just the other should feel his displeasure likewise; accordingly he went to the other side of the bed, and his blows fell again on the poor philosopher: thus confirming, by this example, the grand truth, "the wisest cannot avoid their fate."

RELIGION IN AMERICA.

Whatever the hypocrites of the Quarterly Review may cant about the want of an established church in the United States, we have always felt that the truly religious must rejoice in the better prospects which religion enjoys in that republic, owing to the absence of a contaminating mixture with politics and sordid temptations. In this opinion we are confirmed by the Edinburgh Theological Magazine, a publication which no one can suspect of a lack of zeal in the cause it espouses. "Splendid," says that periodical, "as are the prospects of America in a civil point of view; rapid as her career has been in science and war, in numerical strength and political distinction, and mighty as her resources in consequence are, for good or for evil, in the great commonwealth of nations, there is no aspect in which the philanthropist will delight so much to regard her as in that of a Christian people, fitted to act a conspicuous and efficient part in promoting universally the interests of mankind, of justice, and of true religion. It is delightful to observe, that the spirit of Christian enterprise and philanthropy is progressive in that part of the world. The contributions last year, to the various public funds for religious purposes, exhibit a large pecuniary increase." [London paper.]

ORDEALS.

Four kinds of ordeals were chiefly used by our German ancestors:—1. "The Kampf fight," or combat; during which the spectators were to be silent and quiet, on pain of losing an arm or leg; an executioner with a sharp axe. 2. "The fire ordeal," in which the accused might clear his innocence by holding red-hot iron in his hands, or by walking blind-fold amidst fiery ploughshares. 3. "The hot water ordeal," much of the nature as the last. 4. "The cold-water ordeal;" this need not be explained, since it is looked on as supreme when a witch is in question. The cross ordeal was reserved for the clergy. These, if accused, might prove their innocence by swallowing two consecrated morsels taken from the altar after proper prayers. If these fragments stuck in the priest's throat he stood ipse facto—condemned; but we have no record of condemnation.

DONATELLO.

The enthusiasm of ardent and of forcible minds appears madness to those who are dull and phlegmatic. The pleasure it inspires is the greatest and most independent remuneration that men of genius receive for their efforts and exertions. Donatello, the great Florentine sculptor, had been long working at his statue of Judith; and, on giving the last stroke of the chisel to it, he was heard to exclaim, "Parla! speak now, I am sure you can!"

GOLD.

The powers of gold are thus forcibly described by old Cornelius Agrippa. "The jealous husband is appeased with gold, the inexorable rival mollified with gold, the most strict and watchful keepers and guardians are corrupted with gold: there is no door, no gate, but opens to gold; no bedchamber, but gives entrance to gold; bars, stone walls, and the indissoluble bonds of wedlock, all yield to the force of gold: and what wonder if virgins, widows, matrons, vestal virgins, are sold and bought for gold, when Christ himself was sold for silver?"

In the "Marrow of Compliment," (London, 1654,) is the following song in praise of tobacco:

To feed men fat as swine;
But he's a frugal man indeed,
That with a leaf can dine.
He needs no napkin for his hands,
His fingers end to wipe,
That hath his kitchen in his box,
His roast meat in a pipe.

Horace Walpole, called Lord Bacon "the prophet of unborn science, which Newton was afterwards sent to reveal;" and Cowley, enlarging upon this idea, says of him—

"Bacon, like Moses, led us forth at last,
The barren wilderness he passed,
Did on the very border stand
Of the blessed promised land,
And from the mountain top of his exalted wit,
Saw it himself, and showed us it."
Much meat doth gluttony process,

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

THE ORIGINAL STORY.

Jamie hadna been awa a twelvemonth and a day
When my father brak his arm, and our cow was stown away;
My mither she fell sick, and my Jamie at the sea,
When Auld Robin Gray cam a courting me.
My father coudna work, and my mither coudna spin;
I toiled day and night, but their bread I coudna win:
Auld Robin maintained them baith, and, wi' tears in his ee,
Said, Jeanie, for their sakes, O marry me! [Ballad]

Jeanie Grahame was aone of the blithest, bonniest lasses to be seen in the auncient kingdom of Fife, from the Loch Leven to the Bay of St. Andrews; at least she was (speaking of her as I first saw her) happy as a summer mavis, and bright as a June rose. What she afterwards saw and underwent was enouch to have wasted and withered a' the beauty that was e'er bequeathed from heaven to woman.

The affairs of auld Walter Grahame had been lang back-going, and were now come to a poor pass. It would, indeed, be difficult preceesely to point out the cause; but the guid and gear, collected by the grandfather, Wattie o' the strong back (so called from his being famous at putting the stane), had begun to dwindle in the days of his son, Alexander, who succeeded him in the farm of Rowan-brae; and so great was the confusion to which things had been allowed to run, that Walter, the second of the name, and Jeanie's father, might be said to have fallen to a fruitless inheritance, and to have been left warstling in a sea of troubles.

Being the head of a family, and come to that time of life when moving about the world has muckle mair of incumbrance than pleasure in't, Walter struggled hard to better his lot. He was up early, and lay down late,—drove his ain cart to the market,—toiled in the fields,—hedged and ditched,—and submitted to every drudgery along with the maist menial o' his warkmen. All, however, wadna do. It seemed as if the bow of Providence was bent against him,—that he was a doomed man,—and that naething was destined to thrive in his unfortunate hands.

His wife and he had foregathered in their better days, and if it may be said he bore up wi' a stronger fortitude, it maun be confessed, that on she tholed ill the deprivations to which their straitened means compelled them. When a high speerited, careless young lassie, she had married for love (as the saying is), against the will o' her relations, that were a' wealthy and well to do in the world; and, when she could afford to keep up her degree, and brush by them in a gown of French silk, to the full as guid as their ain, every thing was weil enouch. It was otherwise, however, when, year by year, obleeed her to dispense with some wee bit article o' accustomed finery, and a back-going fortune estranged faces that had often smiled around her mair plentiful table. True it is, that with the changes o' life so we change; and that with the turns o' fortune we are our apt to turn. Her temper began to sour; she took to liking an ill tale against her neighbour; and as the family purse began to grow lighter, so in proportion did her wounded pride begin to show itself. Wad she petition her friends for help? Wad she condescend to bow down before them that had sae lang treated her as an outcast frae their family? Na—na—that wad have been as much as owning she had been in error, and they in the right. Sooner wad she perish of cauld and hunger; or be forced away into stranger districts, to beg, from door to door, a crust o' bread, and a drink o' water, from the hands of the charitable.

Oh, but Jeanie Grahame, the dochter, was a dear, sweet, bonny lassie! I was half in love wi' her mysell; and that is muckle for a douce married man to confess. Her behaviour to her parents, during all the time of their backgoing and misfortunes, was most pattern-like,—a sight to see as guid as a sermon to hear. She was the very heart and soul o' their howshold, and seemed to shed a glint of true pleasure oore the hame of honest poverty. Educated to the best o' the means that even their most prosperous days allowed them, she submitted to every accumulating little want without a murmur. Still she was the same innocent, contented, cheerfu' lassie; still she was the light o' her father's ee, the pride o' her mother's heart. With them beside her, she seemed to fear nae evil, and to despise every hardship; her duty seemed aboon a'. She soothed all their misfortunes,—checked all their vain repinings,—cheered with the smiles o' her sweet face,—and seemed aye that, to a stranger, had nae cause for tears in this world; but, for a' that, she sometimes grat to hersell in secret.

Auld Robin Gray, the Laird of Stanedykes, I mind him weil. He was a tall, lour-shouthered carle, a guid way up in his sixties at the time; wi' strong, hard-set features, and a brown, three-story wig. His face was remarkable for naething but his rough, bushy ee-bree, that, grizzled wi' years, lookit like snawy arches thrown oore a pair o' grey sparkling een. Mony and mony a time, when a callant, passing that road, have I seen him, standing at the bit parapet wa' before his house, with his hands in his pepper-and-salt coat pockets, his staff aneath his oxter, and his blue bonnet on his pow, looking at the folk passing on the road frae Wemyss to Dysart, or glinting his ee oore his braid fields, surrounded wi' fine auld trees, where the cows stood chewing the cud of fatness, and his whistling ploughlads turned up the mools wi' the glittering share; proud nae doubt a' the time to ken himsell the laird o' sic a rich inheritance. Except for his keen hawk's ee, aye could scarcely have fand him out; however, there are surer ways of discovering a man's heart, than from the cut of his coat, or his bodily looks; and where was the neibour that ever had occasion to lend him a guid word, or the beggar that e'er departed frae his gate muttering a blessing?

The lang and the short of the story is, that auld Robin was a doure, hardhearted, selfish man,—the king of misers; scraping and scraping frae a' corners from day to day, and from year to year; screwing what he could by all lawful shifts out o' others; and denying himsell amaiest the necessities of life. In the early pairt of his youth, he married a cousin of his ain, a dochter of the Laird of Lowth; who, after living wi' him six or seven miserable years, took farewell o' this world it is to be houpit for a better, the latter pairt o' her life having been waur than purgatory,—a dull, broken-hearted creature, that left him the father of an only son and heir.

In the course of years and nature, the son, Jamie, grew up a bonny, black-haired laddie, fu' of the milk of human kindness, funny and frolicsome; and seemingly determined to mak up, in the eyes o' the world, for the sourness of his father's disposition, by the sweetness of his ain. In all games and exercises he was the foremost; and no a lass in the parishes of Dysart or Kirkaldy wad have scrupled to have set her cap at him.

Many a girn, and mony a bitter word did the laird gie; yet the outbreaks of youth were borne by the gruff auld carle better than could have been expectit. Whether, however, as he grew aulder, the father's temper grew mair fractious, or his affection to his callant grew mair canld, was hard to discover; but it becam visible to all, from the usage he underwent, and the drudgeries to which he was made to yield, that the matter wad soon be past the endurance of a proud-hearted, free-speerited lad,—and so it happened; for, in a fit of resentment and sorrow, he betook himsell to a vessel setting sail frae Leith to the West Indies; leaving to the doure, gruff, auld miser, and to his housekeeper, sand-blind Nancy, to mak a kirk and a mill of the pleasureless domicile and property of Stanedykes.

On the night before Jamie set off there was a grievous parting between him and Jeanie Grahame. They seemed made for ane anither; and if, as some suppose, Nature formed human creatures in pairs, these were the twa that it meant to meet. From the years in which the heart first opens to love, they had loved each ither like brother and sister; but with feelings still more warmly kindled, and more deeply rooted. Neither had ever been in love before—it was first love, full to the overflowing wi' passion and power,—to which a' the ither loves of life (if man can really and truly love twice) are but as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. Sair, sair, did Jeanie greet, and beg o' him no to gang away; lang did she hing upon his neck, while her burning tears drappit down on his hands; but na—his purpose was fixed,—fixed by an oath, as if he had been an auld Mede or Persian; so, after explaining to her the absurdity of his remaining at a hame where he could never better himself; and of his submitting to a state of miserable and slavish dependence, he said he was only about trying to push his ain way in the world, and to get into a situation that would not render their coming together a thing, as it now was, altogether hopeless. "No—no," he said, "Jeanie," taking a farewell kiss from her lips, "you maunna cry,—it cannot be otherwise. It were cruel to you, as weil as mysell, to stay where I now am. I must—must leave you, Jeanie, and mind this,—if I get on in the world you will see me soon, if not, try to forget what has passed; and my dear, dear, Jeanie, mind that I leave you a free creature,—as free in promise as God's daylight,—as free as before I saw ye:—and, when I am far away oore the sea, and forgotten, refuse not a good offer for the sake of the foolish, silly, thoughtless memory o' what has passed betwixt us. So, may be, when I come hame—if ever it be my fortune to come hame,—a crazy, weather-beaten, broken-down, auld man, I may see ye surrounded wi' yere bonnie bairns, and yere proud gudeman—No, hang me, I wad be sooner shot thro' the head, like a dog, than see the mon that daured, in my hearing, to ca' Jeanie Grahame his wife!"

When the auld miser fand that his son had taen his will in his ain hands, and had decampit, he had a grievous contention wi' the bitterness and blackness of his ain speerit, and he vowed that, only son as he was of his, he wad cut him off wi' a shilling; come what liket of the guid, gear, and chattels, he lamentit he could na carry to the grave with him. Naething wad mak him relax in his purpose, his determination was as fixed as the whunstone rock; and the friends that were sae forward as to presume offering a word o' advice, fand that they were only rivetting the nail of hatred more firmly in the laird's bosom.

Considering the ties o' nature, aye wad have thocht, that the course of time must have blunted his wrath, and reconcealed him to Jamie; but far otherwise. His speerit had got a bend that coudna be straightened; so, instead of relenting, every day appeared to make him mair inveterately cruel. Twa summers had passed oore, when the laird received a letter from his son, in which Jamie lamented the step he had taken, and the way they had partied, hoping that, when he saw him again,—as he shortly expectit to do,—a' the past wad be forgotten.

The auld neerdoweel had scarcely patience to read the letter thro', ere he tore it into a thousand tatters, and strampt them below his feet. "Come hame when ye like, my man," cried the unnatural father, in the bitterness of his doure rage, "come hame when ye like, ye've never mair be son of mine. Ye have brewed the cup o' wilful disobedience, and ye maun drink it to the dregs—deevil cares hoo bitter the dregs may be. Forgie ye! faith lad, ye little ken me. I'm no the willow whand to be bowed to your purpose. Do ye hear that?" added he, tapping sand-blind Nancy, his housekeeper, on the shouther, an auld, withered looking witch-wife, that deserved a tar-barrel on the top o' Lo-mond hill, far better than mony that suffered there; "do ye hear that? Our bonnie son Jamie is thinking of paying us a veesit soon. Do you hear what I'm saying?"

"Nonsense, laird, nonsense. Jamie coming hame!" answered clootie's dochter, wi' a grin that showed her blackened stumps. "Ou, ay, he'll be coming to marry his bit bonny sweetheart, oore by, Wattie Grahame's dochter, ye understand, laird."

This was setting fire to tinder. The laird lookit first black and then blue; glowered in Nancy's withered face for a minute without speaking, like a man lost within himsell, then gieing his head a shake, and screwing his mouth up to a whistle, like a man that has, after muckle trouble, seen his way thro' a puzzie, he clappit his bonnet on his pow, and away down the road to Rowan-brae.

At Walter's every thing was looking dowie and mair dowie, gloomier and glomier. The cattle, aye after anither, had been sold to pay the landlord his rent. The barn yard was threshed out and empty. Sheriff-offishers frae Edinburgh were seen like wild cats in the gloaming, prowling about his bounds wi' docketed accounts in their side pockets, threatening poinding and horning; while, to crown a', Walter himsell, by a tumble frae his cart shaft in the dark, had gotten his arm broken.

It was a hame o' cauldrie poverty and wretchedness. Misfortune after misfortune showing down upon them, had at length soured Walter's heart, and broken down his speerit. His wife, wha could have tholed her puir fate better had she been among strangers, began to sink under a pride so mortally wounded, and she grew every day mair crabbit and ill-tempered, as she harpit oure the thocht o' their afflictions affording a cause of crowing to her neglectful relations. The warst of all, however, was, that they were neither o' them sae young as they once were; the snaws of auld age had begun to gather round their brows; and they hadna the warm hopes of youth, to see bright days amid winter to come. Jeanie, puir thing, bore up wonderfully, and tho' doing every thing for the best, she took hard words, and crabbit looks, without a murmur; exerted hersell frae morning till night in managing the howshold concerns; and lookit like a stray sunbeam let into a dwelling of darkness.

Ane might naturally ask,—had she nae consolation which helpit her to oppose this brave speerit to the storm? had she nae secret help? nae kind letter? nae blithe tidings? Nane—nane; frae the night of the parting she had heard not a syllable from or about him. She kent from his own lips that he was awf to the West Indies, and she had heard from ithers that the West Indies is the European's grave!

(Conclusion next week.)

NATIONAL CHARACTER.

THE GREEKS.

The delightful country of Greece, once the finest in the world, is inhabited by a bold and intelligent race of men; whose noble struggles to rescue themselves from an odious servitude has rendered them objects of our esteem and admiration. For more than five years has this unfortunate land been the scene of continual warfare and desolation; and though the attempts of the Turks have been many and great, they have notwithstanding entirely failed in their design,—that of exterminating the Greeks.

The Greeks are of the same religion as the Russians, and, like that nation, have monks and nuns; Great decorum is visible in their churches, the females being excluded from the sight of the males by means of lattices. Their bishops lead a life of great simplicity, as will be seen from the following account of a dinner given by the bishop of Salona to Mr. Dodwell:—"There was nothing to eat except rice and bad cheese; the wine was execrable, and so impregnated with resin, that it almost took the skin from our lips. Before sitting down to dinner; as well as afterwards, we had to perform the ceremony of the cheironipton, or washing of the hands. We dined at a round table of copper tinned, supported upon one leg, and sat on cushions placed on the floor. The bishop insisted upon my Greek servant sitting at table with us; and on my observing that it was contrary to our custom, he answered, that he could not bear such ridiculous distinctions in his house. It was with difficulty I obtained the privilege of drinking out of my own glass, instead of out of the large goblet, which served for the whole party. The Greeks seldom drink till they have dined. After dinner, strong thick coffee, without sugar was handed round." The strictest frugality is observable in all the meals of these people. The higher orders live principally on fish and rice, and the common people on olives, honey, and onions. The food of the Levantine sailors, according to the Hon. Mr. Douglass, consists entirely of salted olives, called by the Greeks columbades. They dress mutton in a singular manner, it being stewed with honey. In a very rare work, published in 1686, entitled, "The Present State of the Morea," is the following account of their manner of threshing corn—"They have no barns, but threshing-floors, which are situated on high grounds, and open to the winds. Here they tread it out with horses, which are made fast to a post; round which the corn is put; the horses trampling upon it make great despatch; they then cleanse it with the wind, and send it home."

The houses of the Greeks are generally built of brick, made of clay and chopped straw; those at Napoli di Romania are considered among the best, and are spacious and convenient. The stranger, on entering, is struck with the singular appearance they present, the lower story being set apart for the horses, while not a bell is visible in any part of the building. When the attendance of a servant is required, it is signified by the master clapping his hands. Most of the houses in the villages have very pretty gardens, with walks round them covered with vines. The Greeks are remarkable for their love of dancing, particularly the Romaika, which is thus described by the Hon. Mr. Douglass:—"I never shall forget the first time I saw this dance; I had landed on a fine Sunday evening in the island of Scio, after three months spent amidst Turkish despotism, and I found most of the poorer inhabitants of the town strolling upon the shore, and the rich absent at their farms; but in riding three miles along the coast, I saw above thirty parties engaged in dancing the Romaika upon the sand; in some of these groups, the girl who led them chased the retreating wave, and it was in vain that her followers hurried their steps; some of them were generally caught by the returning sea, and all would court the laugh rather than break the indissoluble chain. Near each party was seated a group of parents and elder friends, who rekindled the last spark of their expiring gayety and vigour in the happiness they saw around them."

Though the Greeks are an oppressed nation, yet, as Sir William Gell testifies, they cannot be called uncleanly in their habits. The bath is in constant use among them, and a Greek peasant would on no account retire to rest without having previously washed his feet. The females, generally speaking, are kept very secluded from society, and it is seldom that their marriages are founded on mutual love or attachment. The conduct of the married women in Greece is deserving of our highest praise, both for their great virtue and goodness of heart, while instances of divorce are extremely rare.

The burial-places of the Greeks are situated without the walls of their towns, and round the tombs are a variety of plants, (principally parsley,) which they take great care to keep alive. Numerous ceremonies are observed at their funerals; but the most interesting scene is the last. "Before the body is covered with earth, the relations approach in turn, and lifting the corpse in their arms, indulge in the full pleasure of their grief, while they call in vain on the friend they have lost, or curse the fate by which that loss has been occasioned." The Greeks, when occasion requires it, make use of flowers to express their thoughts. Thus for instance, if a lover wishes to convey any private intelligence to his mistress, he has only to make a selection of certain flowers, the signification of which is perfectly understood if once seen by the object of his love. The manners of the Greeks in many cases bear a striking resemblance to those of the Turks. Like that nation, they smoke with long pipes, and write with the left hand. The inhabitants of Napoli di Romania have still further imitated their oppressors by wearing the turban trimmed with white, together with the red papouches, or slippers. The costume of the Greek soldiers is thus described by the author of "Letters from the East:—"The costume of these soldiers was light and graceful; a thin vest, sash, and a loose pantaloon, which fell just below the knee. The head was covered with a small and ugly cap. They had most of them pistols and muskets, to which many added sabres or ataghans." The dress of the females is very elegant; over the head is worn a veil, called macrama, and between the eyelid and the pupil is inserted a black powder, named surme, which, according to the Hon. Mr. Douglas, gives a pleasing expression to the countenance. Their hair (generally of a beautiful auburn) they bestow great pains, adorning it with a variety of ornaments, and suffering it to hang down in long tresses or ringlets, which present a most graceful appearance. In stature the men are tall and well made; but their countenances, though expressive, have generally an air of dejection, which no change of time or circumstances has power to remove. The Greek women are very beautiful, and remarkable for vivacity and intelligence of mind.

The character of the Greeks consists of a singular mixture of good and bad qualities. They are vain, fickle, treacherous, and turbulent; but on the other hand, are industrious, bold, polite, moderate in their living, with a lively and ingenious disposition. If it be asserted that they are in some cases too much given to wine, it may be replied to in the words of Cicero, Necessitas crimen est, non voluntatis. When we consider that from the earliest age, they are accustomed to witness among the Turks the most disgusting scenes of profligacy and villany, that, like wandering pilgrims, they have no fixed abode, and are continually subject to all the miseries attendant on war and poverty, can it be wondered if in their character we find something worthy of reprehension.

MISCELLANY.

SUNRISE AT MOUNT ÆTNA.

Of a sunrise at Mount Ætna, an acute traveller remarks, no imagination can form an idea of this glorious and magnificent scene. Neither is there on the surface of this globe any one point that unites so many awful and sublime objects:—the immense elevation from the surface of the earth, drawn as it were to a single apex, without any neighbouring mountain for the senses and imagination to rest upon, and recover from their astonishment in their way down to the world—and this point, or pinnacle raised on the brink of a bottomless gulf, often discharging rivers of fire, and throwing out burning rocks, with a noise that shakes the whole island. Add to this, the unbounded extent of the prospect, comprehending the greatest diversity, and the most beautiful scenery in nature; with the rising sun advancing in the east to illuminate the wondrous scene. The whole atmosphere by degrees kindled up, and showed dimly and faintly the boundless prospect around. Both sea and land looked dark and confused, as if only emerging from their original chaos: and light and darkness seemed still undivided, till the morning by degrees advancing, completed the separation. The stars are extinguished, and the shades disappear. The forest, which but now seemed black and bottomless gulfs, from whence no ray was reflected to show their form or colours, appear a new creation rising to the sight, catching life and beauty from every increasing beam. The scene still enlarges, and the horizon seems to widen and expand itself on all sides; till the sun appears in the east, and with his plastick ray completes the mighty scene. All appears enchantment; and it is with difficulty we can believe we are still on earth. The senses, unaccustomed to such objects, are bewildered and confounded; and it is not till after some time that they are capable of separating and judging of them. The body of the sun is seen rising from the ocean, immense tracks both of sea and land intervening; various islands appear under your feet; and you look down on the whole of Sicily on a map, and can trace every river through all its windings, from its source to its mouth. The view is absolutely boundless on every side; nor is there any one object within the circle of vision to interrupt it; so that the sight is every where lost in the immensity; and there is little doubt, that were it not for the imperfection of our organs, the coasts of Africa, and even of Greece, would be discovered, as they are certainly above the horizon.

MELANCHOLY FATE OF A PEASANT.

This unfortunate mountaineer, in the course of an excursion on those stupendous mountains, by chance discovered the vein of a mine containing particles of gold. Delighted at this unexpected treasure, he hastened to his wife, and disclosed the secret, under an injunction that she should not divulge it, lest he should be taken up by order of government. He visited his mine daily, and at first only brought away small quantities of ore, which his wife disposed of at Genoa. His wealth at length accumulated sufficiently to enable him to purchase a spot of land, whereon he built a hut, and continued his exertions, at the hazard of his life, till he had obtained enough to render his situation easy and comfortable.

The only method by which he could gain access to the mine was that of laying himself on his belly, and pushing himself on through an opening formed between the strata of the rock, which was scarcely wide enough to admit his body: when he had procured the ore, he slid back in the same way. But, unfortunately, one evening, during that operation, a stone detached itself from the interior of the cave, and dropped on his shoulders, though not with sufficient force to occasion instant death, but enough to prevent his extricating himself either one way or the other; and he was left to perish in this horrible situation!

His wife, not seeing her husband return at the accustomed hour, took with her a friend, who had long had a suspicion of these mysterious excursions, and proceeded to the fatal spot, on approaching towards which she imperfectly heard the groans and lamentations issuing from the dreadful cavern—the inevitable tomb of her wretched husband! Every endeavour to extricate him was tried in vain—and he lived in this deplorable situation five days! The unfortunate woman's grief was beyond description. When dead, his body was forced to be taken from the rock limb by limb: his remains were collected, and buried near his hut, and a wooden cross erected over his grave.

Having died without confession, according to the custom of the country, numberless masses have been said for his soul; and the weary traveller often turns aside out of his way to prostrate himself on the stone which covers him, and drop a tear to his memory and his misfortune!

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1828.

Such of our subscribers as are in arrears, will render us an especial favour by forwarding the amount due. The many expenses attendant upon our establishment, make it absolutely necessary that we should call upon our delinquent subscribers to assist us.

Post masters and secretaries of chapters and lodges, are requested to act as agents for the Record and Magazine.

The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of New-York, commenced its annual session at the Masonick Hall in this city on Tuesday last, and adjourned on Thursday evening. The chapters throughout the state were very generally represented, and the business of the session conducted with the greatest good feeling. The following are the officers elected for the ensuing year:—

M. E. Asa Fitch, of Washington county, Grand High Priest.

M. E. Richard Pennel, of the city of New-York, Deputy Grand High Priest.

E. Orville Hungerford, of Jefferson county, Grand King.

E. Benjamin Enos, of Cortland county, Grand Scribe.

E. John O. Cole, of the city of Aleany, Grand Secretary.

E. Gernt L. Dox, of the city of Albany, Grand Treasurer.

E. and Rev. Joseph Prentiss, of Catskill, Grand Chaplain.

W. John Bull, jr., of New Lebanon, Grand Marshal.

W. Jesse P. Mitchell, of the city of Albany, Grand Sentinel.

POLITICKS. There is nothing more amusing to a disinterested spectator, than to behold the clumsy quirks, and unseemly amalgamations, brought about among the sovereign people, in relation to that never-sufficiently-to-be-talked-about subject, yclept Politics. Were it not that we are averse to being personal, we could particularize many beautiful specimens of amalgamation, which have recently been carried on in the political alembick; but such is not our present design. It is only to inform the reader that we have had serious intentions of setting up a masonick candidate for the presidency, and of addressing, as the fanatics of the west say was done in the case of Morgan, a "circular to all the chapters and lodges within three hundred miles" of us, calling on them for their co-operation! In every country village, an election for the meanest office cannot be conducted without a reference to what is called, by common consent, the presidential question; and next to this, the sentiments of the parties belligerent, in relation to Morgan and Masonry, must be distinctly ascertained and considered. Our thought has been, that this is the proper time to "draw the lines," and we are quite sure that we have but to do this, and the mysterious star of masonry will rise the ascendant! We are the more sure of this from the fact, that the country is divided father against son, and son against father, in relation to the contending candidates for that office; and a "brother of the mystick tie" has but to be proposed to the brethren of the craft, "and they are bound by the most tremendous oath" (vide Morgan's revelations,) to yield him their support, as neither of the candidates now before the nation, if we are to believe the reports of interested partizans, belong to the ancient and honourable order of free-masons. As before said, we have had serious notions of bringing this paper out in favour of a masonick candidate; but upon mature deliberation, we have at last concluded to maintain our neutrality on this never-enough-to-be-considered question, only reserving to ourselves the privilege of laughing at both parties as often as we choose, as well as the means they use to put their idols in the high places of the nation.

As for political honesty and consistency, it is all moonshine! The regina pecunia, possesses an unbounded influence, be the clime monarchical, according to the views of legitimacy, or republican, after the school of Jefferson, and in both it confers, equally, the genus et formum. What politician electioneers for his friends, without expecting, if they should triumph, to receive payment? We answer without hesitancy—no one: and we are constrained to add, if he did otherwise, he would be a fool for his pains, and deserve the name with which partizans stigmatize their opponents. Where is the man who holds an office, who would not hold it as long as he can, and make it a sinecure, if he could? We are not fond of calling names, but if there be any such, we should certainly consider him the greatest booby in the world.

Should the present presidential incumbent be reluctantly compelled to descend from his elevation, the person who will succeed, has never raised the inquiry, whether he be better qualified to discharge the duties of the office, than he; his object will be to make as much of the office, and keep it as long as he can, and no sensible person can find in his heart to blame him, for every such person, is doubtless looking out for the next best place. Well, success to them all; and it grieves us excessively, that there are not more fat salary offices to be distributed, and withal, higher salaries; for we cannot make up our mind to rush into the mêlée, without better prospects of success than any person can have at present!

We are further induced to remain neutral, because we could never make up our mind, between the "two evils, to choose the least." Mr. Adams, we are told from every quarter is totally unfit for the office he has held with some ability for the last three years; and General Jackson, we are assured on the best authority, "kicks the kiver off" of every thing that comes in his way! These we believe are some of the most formidable objections against the parties in question;—and to these it may be added, that Mr. Adams is the son of his father—while Gen. Jackson is a soldier and has defended his country in times of peril. If we shall hereafter be able to sever this gordian knot, and be convinced that the welfare of the country will be promoted by the retirement of the one, or endangered by the elevation of the other, our readers shall be sure to hear of it, through the medium hereof.

NEWS AND TRIMMINGS.

A society of ladies has been formed in Maine, "for the purpose of improving the manners of the gentlemen." [So good, and so good! For mercy's sake, ladies, let there be a branch established in Albany; or, if possible, make the field of your labours rather more universal, both in extent and design. Would it not be proper to have their plan embrace the morals as well as manners of their subjects?—The space occupied by the dash in the following epigram might be filled with the name of more towns than one, within our knowledge. Then by the substitution of various fancy names, the result, though not exactly in rhyme, would have, as Ben Jonson said, "a deal of truth in it."—

"Two lovely ladies dwell at ———
And each a charching goes;
Emma goes there to close her eyes,
And Jane to eye her clothes!"

—An extremely interesting ancient medal had been found by some workmen in York, England, and is now in possession of a watchmaker in that city. It is one of the larger brass of Vespasian, struck to commemorate the total subjugation of the Jews, and the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus, A.D. 70. Obverse,—the emperor's head, to the left lineated. Reverse,—a palm tree, as a symbol of Judea, at the foot of which stands a Jew with his hands bound behind him, to denote the state of captivity to which they were reduced. The inscriptions are, Vespasianus Rom. Im. Aug. and, Judea Capta, S. C.—An individual at Lloyd's Coffee-House, in London, who was in the habit of arriving at about 12 o'clock, and taking his stand before one of the fires, which post he invariably occupied till 4, was lately cured of his troublesome averseness to locomotion. A wag wrote on a slip of paper,—"hot joints from 12 to 4," and fastened it to a button of his coat behind. The gentleman, on leaving the room to go home, was rendered the object of general laughter, the joke being most enjoyed by those who had experienced the chilling effects of this human fire-screen.

A marriage was lately announced in one of the New-York papers, which turned out to be "a failure." It seems that the intended bride was a young widow, who, by the magick of a languishing black eye, had enkindled a certain nameless flame in the bosom of a neighbour, whose "blank grey" had long since crowned his brows like the frosty mountain top, and whose ripened comeliness had, with the aid of sundry golden accomplishments, inspired a reciprocal blaze in her own. The jointure &c. was made, and the wedding day appointed; the license and the parson had arrived; the bridal company were arranged around the hall; and Hymen was just hovering over their heads with the design of resting his pinion,—when the lady enhanced her demands on the intended groom's estate, thinking, perhaps, that he could not retreat at so tender an hour. But he at once shook off the blandishments of passion, and instead of dancing at his wedding, marched off to the tune of "Over the hills and far away."—The Bachelors of New-York intend to give their annual ball on the 14th, at the city hotel. The room is to be decorated in beautiful style, and a splendid supper is to be prepared for the whole company.—The Augusta Courier says that the editor of that paper has raised potatoes 19 inches long, and weighing 7 1-2 pounds each.—A Montreal paper states that a cucumber was raised in the nursery at Blink Bonny, which measured 4 feet 2 inches in length.—The king of England has granted a charter to establish a college at York, Upper Canada, to be called King's College.—It is said there is a church in Norfolk, England, called "Little Snoring Church!" It would be edifying to know by what sleepy accident it had acquired the name.—Nothing is more common than the absurd practice among the "big bugs," of lending their names to puff into notice any thing that offers,—books, razor straps, jugs of blacking, itch ointment, &c. and if the following story be not substantially true, it is no more than a fair picture of hundreds that do actually happen. A country schoolmaster, after having wearied out several districts with his skill in teaching, from each of which he had received the customary certificates of approbation, took a journey to an eastern sea-port, and offered himself with his credentials to the contracting committee of a vacant school. They offered him five hundred dollars a year, with the promise, if they liked him, to pay him two hundred more at the expiration of the year. It is very natural to conclude that they would not like him, as a bare predilection was to cost them a considerable sum, and our Yankee prepared forthwith to change the field of his pedagogick labours. In order to mollify his wounded feelings, they very generously made out a note of recommendation, heartily acknowledging their entire confidence in the bearer, as a teacher, and their full satisfaction with him while engaged among them, signed and attested by the committee, parson, and principal inhabitants of the district. "Very well," said the knight of the ferula and fool's-cap, when he had secured the paper, "I'll just trouble you for them 'ere t'other two hundred dollars."—The funds of the American Society for the promotion of Temperance now amount to about $14000.—It is said that the explosive force of gunpowder may be nearly trebled by mixing it with the sawdust of any soft wood.—An elm tree, recently blown down at Bury, near Amberley castle, and containing 40 feet of timber, was sawed through the middle, when the nest of a tomit was discovered, in a perfect state, in which were five eggs, as fair to the eye as if deposited but a few days. The solid mass of timber which enveloped this curiosity must have been the growth of many years, it being five or six inches in the thinnest part, and no mark could be traced of the original entrance.—The Charleston Observer says, that a subscriber stopped his paper in consequence of the following paragraph:—"A person lately accompanied his advance subscription to our paper with this sensible and judicious hint,—'How to read a newspaper with a good conscience,—pay for it in advance.'—A counsellor being questioned by a judge to know "for whom he was concerned," replied, "I am concerned, Sir, for the plaintiff, but I am employed for the defendant."—The only blacksmith in a small village was once under sentence of death, for murder. Some of the chief peasants begged of the judge that the blacksmith might be released, as he was of such vital importance to the neighbourhood, and suggested that, if justice could not be otherwise satisfied, one of the weavers should be executed in his stead, as there were two in the village, and one might be very conveniently spared.—Since the advertisement of the "anti-masonick almanack," a shrewd western editor says,—"we may expect soon to hear of anti-masonick pig-troughs, anti-masonick jew's-harps, and anti-masonick itch ointment."—The eccentric author of Lacon, the Rev. C. C. Colton, who has for some years past been appearing and disappearing, in a mysterious manner, in every part both of Europe and America, and in fact, impressing the publick with a vivid idea of his ubiquity, has returned to his vicarage of Kew and Petersham, in England. The living would have lapsed on the very day he appeared and took possession.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Saturday, Feb. 2. In senate, the bill to provide for the erection of a fire proof clerk's office in the county of Yates, and the bill to divide the town of Orwell in Oswego county, were read a third time and passed.

In assembly, Mr. Edgerton called for the consideration of the concurrent resolution submitted by him, that the legislature will, on Monday next, at twelve o'clock, proceed to the appointment of a state treasurer, and a committee of the legislature to audit accounts: which was considered and passed. Bills, to amend the act relative to fisheries, as it respects the Salmon river; and to authorize Jonathan Hubbard to continue a dam across the west branch of Chenango river,—were read a third time and passed.

Monday, Feb. 4. In senate, Mr. Jordan, from the joint committee, to which was referred so much of the governor's message as relates to the state road, reported, and brought in a bill to provide for laying out and constructing a state road, from lake Erie to the Hudson river. The senate concurred in a resolution from the assembly, appointing a time for proceeding to the choice of a treasurer, on Tuesday the 5th inst. at noon.

In assembly, a discussion took place on a proposition made to the house, that the bills for the incorporation of banks, and the reports of committees relating to them should be printed at the expense of the applicants. The motion was lost, only six rising in favour of it. Mr. Granger made some very judicious remarks in opposition to the motion. He said every year there was more money lost in time spent in debating on this question than the printing would amount to. He thought the proposition did not go far enough, if gentlemen supposed the publick had no interest in these applications and that they were solely for the benefit of the applicants; for in that case, the applicants should be required not only to print at their own expense, but to pay the members whilst employed on those subjects three dollars each, per day, besides finding them in wood and tobacco. He wished that no papers be laid on the table, but such as are printed at the expense of the state.

Tuesday, Feb. 5. In senate the bill for the relief of Elisha C. Hickox, was read a third time and passed. It was resolved, that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of allowing a bounty on Onondaga salt, when transported to Albany and New-York, and that the said committee report their opinion thereon. The committee was ordered to consist of the senators from the seventh district. The senate agreeably to a concurrent resolution of both houses proceeded openly to nominate a treasurer of this state, when Abraham Keyser was unanimously nominated. This nomination agreeing with that made by the assembly, ABRAHAM KEYSER was pronounced duly elected.

In assembly, the annual report of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in the city of New-York was received and ordered printed. Bills read a third time and passed: an act to divide the town of Kirkland; and an act to amend the act to incorporate the Madison and Mohawk Rail Road company.

ABRAHAM KEYSER, the present treasurer, was unanimously re-nominated, according to the concurrent resolution of both houses.

Wednesday, Feb. 6. In senate, the bill from the assembly for the relief of William Bunyan and James Bunyan, was read a third time and laid upon the table. The remainder of the day was spent in committee of the whole on the revision.

In assembly, returns from the Commercial bank in this city; and the Utica bank were received. The attention of the house was taken up for the remainder of the day, with the revision of the laws. Considerable progress was made, but on subjects of very little abstract interest to our readers.

Thursday, Feb. 7. In senate, on motion of Mr. Spencer it was resolved, if the senate concur that the state printer cause to be published in the state paper, three times at least, article 4, of title 4, of chapter V. of the first part of the revised statutes, for the information of the inhabitants of those towns, which have been or may be divided, during the present session of the legislature. The remainder of the day was spent in committee of the whole, on the bill to incorporate the Black Rock Canal company.

In assembly, a report was received from the commissioners appointed to make a survey of the Port Kent and Hopkinton road, which was ordered to be printed. The justices' court law, and the bill for the Monroe Bank were again under consideration, and occupied the remainder of the day.

Friday, Feb. 8. In senate, Mr. Jordan renewed his motion of yesterday, that the state road bill be made the special order of the day for Wednesday next. The motion prevailed fourteen to eleven. Considerable debating ensued on the bill to incorporate the Black River Canal company, in committee of the whole. Without taking any question the committee rose and reported. After the consideration of executive business the senate adjourned.

In assembly it was resolved that the comptroller make a report to the house of the valuation of real and personal estates, in the several cities and counties of the state. A resolution was also adopted instructing the committee of ways and means to inquire into the expediency of erecting a dwelling house, as the residence of the governor of this state. A return was received from the bank of Geneva, in pursuance to the resolution of the house. The house, in committee of the whole, spent some time in the consideration of the justices' court law. A communication was received from the governor, transmitting certain proceedings of the Rensselaer school at Troy, offering the gratuitous use of the school to the state for the purpose of educating teachers in the application of the experimental sciences to agriculture and other useful arts. Referred to the committee on literature.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

By the packet ships John Jay from Liverpool and Queen Mab from Havre, papers and letters have been received at New-York to the 9th of December.

The John Jay sailed in company with the Pacific on board of which is the bank robber, Snelson, who was apprehended, with the greater part of the money embezzled from the bank at Petersburg in his possession. He is said to be insane.

In France the elections have been nearly brought to a close; and the defeat of the ministry placed beyond all doubt. M. Peyronnet, the keeper of the seals; M. de Chabral, Minister of Marine; M. Frayssinous, Minister for Ecclesiastical Affairs, are stated to have sent in their resignations.

[From the N. Y. American.]

To a commercial friend we are indebted for the following highly important letter of 4th December, from Paris, (later than any other intelligence from there,) written by an intelligent man, and entitled therefore to the greatest consideration.

Paris, 4th Dec. 1827. I wrote you by the Queen Mab, which sailed yesterday. I take the chance of this reaching Liverpool in time for the packet to communicate to you the important news which has since been received here. The Grand Sultan has absolutely refused all terms proposed by the three allied powers, and even gone so far as to make the most extravagant demands of them. The consequence is like to be an immediate war. The bombardment of Constantinople by the combined fleets of the three powers, and the passing of the Pruth by the Russian army, may soon be expected.

P. S. There is every appearance to-day that a change will take place in the ministry here, and that even M. Villele will be obliged to leave it.

The river is now open, and the navigation is again uninterrupted between this city and New-York.

Appointment of Mr. Duer confirmed. Letters from Washington state that the senate have unanimously confirmed the appointment of JOHN DUER, District Attorney of the United States court for this district, in the place of Mr. Tilton, resigned.

The annual discourse before the Medical Society of the State of New-York, was delivered agreeably to announcement, on Thursday last, in the assembly chamber, by T. ROBERTSON BECK, M. D. before a numerous and respectable audience, consisting of members of the society and of the profession, members of the legislature, and citizens. The address was a performance every way worthy of the high reputation of the author, evincing erudition in his profession, and containing many suggestions, valuable not only to the medical faculty, but to the community in general. He took a rapid view of the circumstances and objects for which physicians are usually called to give evidence before coroners' juries, and courts of justice, in cases of violent death, and enforced the necessity of caution and deliberation in making examinations on those occasions; he adverted to the nature of medical evidence in cases of infanticide and lunacy, and congratulated the profession on the certainty which had been thrown upon several branches of the medical science by the sister sciences of physiology and pathology; and concluded by a brief notice of the medical annals of the state, since its last anniversary. We forbear a more minute notice of this performance at this time, as it will doubtless be laid before the publick, with the doings of the society. [Argus.]

DIED.

In this city, on the 24th ult, Capt. ANGUS M'DONALD, in the 55th year of his age.

At Baltimore, Maryland, on Tuesday night, 29th ult. after an illness of several months, the most reverend AMBROSIO MARECHAL, Archbishop of Baltimore. By the death of this prelate, society has sustained the loss of an amiable and accomplished member, and the church of a pious and learned pastor.

In Kingston, Ulster county, Mr. ANDREW FARLING, formerly of Ithaca, aged 53.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to the late firm of R. STARR & Co. in the above Foundry, continue to execute orders for Plain and Ornamental Type, Brass Rule, and Metal Cuts. Also, for Presses and Ink, Chases, composing Sticks, Cases and Stands, Galleys, and printing materials of every description, at short notice, and on terms as liberal as those of other Foundries.

Many new articles have been added to this Foundry within the last year—among which are new founts of Small Pica and Bourgeois. Also, Small Pica, Brevier and Minion full face capitals for captions, and full face two line letter of all the different sizes from Pica to Pearl. Likewise Canon, Double Great Primer, Double Pica, Great Primer and Pica Antiques, with lower case to each, and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil antique capitals. Also, many elegant Borders and Newspaper Ornaments, none of which are stereotyped from wood cuts or type, as is usual at most other foundries, but all are cut on steel and cast in copper matrices, and are warranted to work clear. Printers will at once perceive the superiority of those cast in copper matrices, the lines not being filled up and the edges rounded, as is the case with those stereotyped. The large job letter and cuts are all cast in moulds and matrices, on metal bodies, and with the exactness of the smaller type.

Have also cut a new and very beautiful English Script, on inclined body, orders for which can be executed by the first of April. By being cast on inclined body, the face is not exposed as on square body, where most of the letters are kerned; and the mould in which it is cast having a notch or shoulder in the side the type are kept perfectly in line. No expense has been spared, and it is confidently believed, that this Script will be found the most elegant type ever cast in this country, or in Europe.

Type cast at this foundry is warranted equal at least in hardness and durability, to any cast in this country. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the founts regularly put up. It is intended to keep such a supply on hand as to be able to furnish orders without the usual delay. Orders by mail, or left at the Foundry, No. 8, Liberty-street, will receive prompt attention. STARR & LITTLE Feb. 2. 10

POETRY.

A SAILOR'S APOLOGY FOR BOW-LEGS.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

There's some is born with their straight legs by natur—
 And some is born with bow-legs from the first—
 And some that should have growed a good deal straighter,
 But they were badly nursed,
 And set, you see, like Bacchus, with their pegs
 Astride of casks and kegs.
 I've got myself a sort of bow to larboard,
 And starboard,
 And this is what it was that warped my legs—
 'Twas all along of Poll, as I may say,
 That fouled my cable when I ought to slip;
 But on the tenth of May,
 When I gets under weigh,
 Down there in Hartfordshire to join my ship,
 I sees the mail
 Get under sail,
 The only one there was to make the trip—
 Well—I gives chase,
 But as she run
 Two knots to one,
 There warn't no use in keeping on the race!
 Well—casting round about what next to try on,
 And how to spin,
 I spies an ensign with a bloody lion,
 And bears away to leeward for the inn,
 Beats round the gable,
 And fetches up before the coach horse stable.
 Well—there they stand four kickers in a row,
 And so
 I just makes free to cut a brown'un's cable.
 But riding isn't in a seaman natur—
 So I whips up a toughish end of yarn,
 And gets a kind of sort of a land waiter
 To splice me heel to heel,
 Under the she-mare's keel,
 And off I goes, and leaves the inn a-starn!

My eyes! how she did pitch!
 And wouldn't keep her own to go in no line,
 Though I kept bowing, bowing at her bow line,
 But always making lee-way to the ditch,
 And yawed her head about all sorts of ways.
 The devil sink the craft!
 And wasn't she tremendous slack in stays?
 We couldn't, no how, keep the inn abaft!
 Well—I suppose
 We had n't run a knot—or much beyond—
 (What will you have on it!)—but off she goes,
 Up to her bends in a fresh water pond!

There I am!—all aback!
 So I looks forward for her bridle gears,
 To heave her head around on the t'other tack;
 But when I starts
 The leather parts,
 And goes away right over by the ears!

What could a fellow do,
 Whose legs, like mine, you know, were in the bilboes,
 But trim himself upright for bringing to,
 And square his yard-arms and brace up his elbows,
 In rig all snug and clever,
 Just while his craft was taking in her water?
 I did not like my birth though howsomedever,
 Because the yarn, you see, was getting taugter,—
 Says I—I wish this job was rayther shorter!

The chase had gained a mile
 A-head, and still the she-mare stood a drinkings;
 Now, all the while
 Her body did n't take of course to shrinking.
 Says I—she's letting out her reefs, I'm thinking—
 And so she swelled, and swelled,
 And yet the tackle held,
 Till both my legs began to bend like winkin.
 My eyes! but she took in enough to founde!
 And there's my timbers straining every bit,
 Ready to split,
 And her tarnation hull a-growing rounder!

Well, there—off Hartford Ness,
 We lay both lashed and water-logged together,
 And can't contrive a signal of distress;
 Thinks I, we must ride out this here foul weather,

Though sick of riding out—and nothing less;
 When looking round, I sees a man a-starn:—
 Hollo! says I, come underneath her quarter,—
 And hands him out my knife to cut the yarn.
 So I gets off, and lands upon the road,
 And leaves the she-mare to her own consarn,
 A-standing by the water.
 If I get on another I'll be blowed!
 And that's the way, you see, my legs got bowed!

THE SONG OF SIR JAMES.

BY ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

The grass of Flodden's ruby red,
 That late so greenly grew;
 The sweet lark's foot is wet with blood
 Instead of silver dew.
 For Howard's arrow flight has flown,
 And in their fleet career
 His steeds have trod o'er Scotland's strength,
 And broke her deadly spear.

I sing, and while I sing I sigh!
 For had these gallant men,
 Whose life's blood stains the river red,
 Whose bodies choke the glen,
 Been sagely ruled as bravely led,
 Yon moon above us hung
 Another sight had seen, and I
 A happier song had sung.

The sword has smote, the shaft has flown,
 The victor's cry is cried;
 More sad is he who basely lives,
 Than he who bravely died.
 I'd rather lie like Lindsay sped,
 Have Douglass' bloody brow,
 Or share stout Maxwell's grassy bed,
 Than be as I am now.

I fought where Surrey's shafts flew thick,
 Where rose fierce Selby's cry,
 Where Dacre rushed and Stanley charged,
 And yet I could not die.
 Farewell to Scotland's pleasant land,
 And to its lovely dames!
 To lordly lance and knightly brand,
 So sings he, said Sir James.

THE FOLLOWERS OF CHRIST.

BY BISHOP REBER.

The Son of God is gone to war,
 A kingly crown to gain;
 His blood red banner streams afar;
 Who follows in his train?
 Who best can drink his cup of wo,
 Triumphant over pain;
 Who boldest bears his cross below,—
 Who follows in his train?

The martyr first, whose eagle eye,
 Could pierce beyond the grave,
 Who saw his Master in the sky,
 And called on him to save.
 Like Him, with pardon on his tongue
 In midst of mortal pain,
 He prayed for them that did the wrong,
 —Who follows in his train?

A glorious band, the chosen few,
 On whom the Spirit came—
 Twelve valiant saints; the truth they knew,
 And braved the cross and shame:
 They met the tyrant's brandished steel,
 The lion's gory mane;
 They bowed their necks the death to feel;
 —Who follows in their train?

A noble army, men and boys,
 The matron and the maid,
 Around their Saviour's throne rejoice,
 In robes of light arrayed;
 They climbed the dizzy steep of heaven,
 Through peril, toil and pain:—
 Oh, God! to us may grace be given
 To follow in their train.

THE PAST YEAR.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

Fleethly hath passed the year. The seasons came Duly as they are wont—the gentle Spring,
 And the delicious Summer, and the cool
 Rich Autumn, with the nodding of the grain,
 And Winter, like an old and hoary man
 Frosty and stiff—and so are chronicled.

We have read gladness in the new green leaf,
 And in the first blown violets; we have drank
 Cool water of the rock, and in the shade
 Sunk to the noon tide slumber; we have eat
 The mellow fruitage of the bending tree,
 And girded to our pleasant wanderings
 When the cool wind came freshly from the hills;
 And when the tinting of the Autumn leaves
 Had faded from its glory, we have sate
 By the good fires of Winter, and rejoiced
 Over the fullness of the gathered sheaf.

“God hath been very good!” ’Tis He whose hand
 Moulded the sunny hills, and hollowed out
 The shelter of the valleys, and doth keep
 The fountains in their secret places cool;
 And it is He who leadeth up the sun,
 And ordereth the starry influences,
 And tempereth the keenness of the frost—
 And therefore, in the plenty of the feast,
 And in the lifting of the cup, let Him
 Have praises for the well completed year.

DRINKING SONG.

WRITTEN IN 1566.

I cannot eat but little meat,
 My stomach is not good;
 But sure I think that I can drink
 With him that wears a hood.
 Though I go bare, take ye no care,
 I am nothing a cold,
 I stuff my skin so full within
 Of jolly good ale and old.
 Back and side go bare, go bare,
 Both foot and hand go cold;
 But, belly, God send thee good ale enough,
 Whether it be new or old.

I have no roast but a nut-brown toast,
 And a crab laid in the fire;
 A little bread shall do me stead,—
 Much bread I not desire.
 No frost, no snow, no wind, I trow,
 Can hurt me if I wold,
 I am so wrapped, and thoroughly lapped
 Of jolly good ale and old.
 Back and side go bare, &c.

And Tib, my wife, that as her life
 Loveth well good ale to seek,
 Full oft drinks she, till ye may see
 The tears run down her cheek:
 Then doth she troll to me the bowl,
 Even as a malt-worm should,
 And saith, “Sweetheart, I took my part
 Of this jolly good ale and old.”
 Back and side go bare, &c.

Now let them drink till they nod and wink,
 Even as good fellows should do;
 They shall not miss to have the bliss
 Good ale doth bring men to:
 And all poor souls that have scoured bowls,
 Or have them lustily troubled,
 God save the lives of them and their wives,
 Whether they be young or old.
 Back and side go bare, &c.

ORDO AB CHAO.

VIRTUS JUNXIT, MORS NON SEPARABIT.

The Grand Council of Princes of Jerusalem, an account of the origin and history of which was published in this paper at the time of its last convention in 1827, commenced its annual session on the 4th of February inst. at the Masonick Hall in this city.

Present JOHN KEYES PAIGE, and GILES F. YATES, esqrs. Past Grand Sovereigns, and the following lodges by their representatives, as follows:—

Sublime G. Lodge of Perfection, No. 1, by John W. Bay, T. P. G. M.

Jerusalem Lodge of Perfection, No. 2, John G. Van Dusen.

Mount Sion Lodge of Perfection, No. 3, Alinos Matthews. Oriental Lodge of Perfection, No. 4, Dwight F. Lawton, and D. D. Benedict, G. S. W.

Adoniram Lodge of Perfection, No. 5, George Stratton and Eli Savage, G. Wardens.

Yates Lodge of Perfection, No. 6, James M. Allen, proxy for Killian H. Van Rensselaer, G. S. W.

Lodge of Perfection, No. 7, J. M. Allen.

The following princes were elected to the offices set opposite to their respective names for the current year: to wit:—

John W. Bay, M. D. of Albany, M. Eq. G. Sovereign.

James M. Allen, M. D. of Skeneateles, Eq. Sub. G. Sovereign.

John G. Van Dusen, of Palatine, G. Warden.

Dwight F. Lawton, of Saratoga, G. Counsellor.

THE PRINCIPLES OF MASONRY.

An Address on the Principles of Masonry, delivered in the Church at Frankfort, Kentucky, on the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist, June 24, A. L. 5828, at the request of Hiram Lodge. No. 4:

BY AMOS KENDALL.

Brethren and Friends:—

The occasion of this assemblage is the anniversary festival of St. John, the Baptist. He was an eminent patron of masonry and the herald of Christianity. The purity of his life, and the sublimity of his principles, were only surpassed by those of the Saviour whom he announced. As an example for the imitation of masons and christians, he is perhaps the best which the Bible presents. To attain to the exalted character of the Saviour, man can never hope; for the depravity of his nature bars him from perfection. But John the Baptist presents us a model which is entirely within our reach; because he was a man subject to all our passions and liable to all our infirmities. But we could say nothing which would place that man's character in a light more illustrious than that in which it is presented by a few strong outlines in the Holy Evangelists. Let us rather briefly consider those sublime principles which he practised and which we profess.

What is masonry? Have you who witness its ceremonies, or even all of you who wear its livery, ever directed your thoughts to its author, its principles and its objects? I fear that the world in general, as well as many of those who are called masons, content themselves with the mere outside shew and conveniencies of masonry, without an effort to ascend to that sublime height to which all our symbols point. Those principles which constitute the basis of the Masonick edifice, have their origin with the Omnipotent Creator of all worlds. No man who denies the existence of God, can be a mason in theory or in fact. To Him as the pure source, we trace all those streams of order, beauty and harmony which masonry recognizes in the works of nature and attempts to diffuse through all the labours and relations of the social state.—The productions of the Almighty Architect, are perfect specimens of wisdom, skill and sublimity. Who poises it on nothing and hurls it around the sun? Who created this fair world? Who gives us regular returns of night and day, of summer and winter? Who has divided our earth into continents and oceans, spread out the plains, reared the mountains and taught the rivers where to run?—Who covers it with the beauties of spring, forms the leaf, paints the rose, gives the apple its beautiful shape, teaches the feeble blade of grass to grow, and lifts the huge oak above the mountain's top? Who rolls the clouds along the sky, breathes in the zephyr and speaks in the thunder? All here is order, beauty and sublimity. This is masonry—it is the perfect work of the mason's and the christian's God, the Omnipotent and Everlasting I AM.

But this is only the threshold of that temple which the Great Invisible has built, not of trees and stones, but of suns and worlds. Order and beauty extend beyond man's knowledge, and are limited only in his imagination. Who made the sun? Who gave him his dazzling splendour, made him the source of light and heat, and placed him as the radiant centre of revolving worlds? Who created and rolls around him the beautiful planets, and assigned them their regular distances and periods? Who has studded the heavens with unnumbered stars, to a distance which the eye cannot reach, whose substance or use science cannot explore, and of which all that is known is their order and beauty? Who regulates and controuls the comets, those fiery messengers, which to the eye of man, sail through the universe without order or use? All this is the perfect work of God—it is masonry. This is the author of the principles of our order, and these are the channels through which he teaches man to admire and imitate the sublime principles and beautiful proportions which are every where exhibited through his boundless temple.

But what can humble man do compared with these stupendous works? What is his power, what his mind, compared with those of the Almighty Architect, who built and sustains all worlds? Have you seen the tiny ant, scarcely visible to man's eye, climbing the pillars of a lofty mansion? His power, his strength, and his importance, are inconceivably greater when compared with man's, than man's are compared with Omnipotence. What are you, proud, assuming mortal, displaying your pigmy form and glorying in fancied power, compared even with this vile earth on which you tread? A mere atom, scarcely visible for a mile, while this despised earth, almost too mean for you to walk upon, shines in mild glory to distant worlds. Yet, what is earth compared with all those planets that wheel round the sun? A bright speck in heaven, which, were it annihilated, none but the curious in distant worlds would ever miss. What are the earth and all the planets, compared with the huge sun which balances them all upon his mighty centre? But sparks around a globe of flame. What are the earth, the planets, and the sun himself, compared with the universe? No more than the least star that feebly twinkles on the brow of night, and were they all annihilated, would be no more missed from the system of the Great Supreme. Angels and beings of other systems might carelessly say, one star has disappeared from heaven; while millions, still left, would shine in unfading splendour. What then is man? What his distance from his great Creator, what his insignificance? Think what you are, my friends, what creation and what God is, and you will learn humility. If He notices you, how can you thoughtlessly tread upon the meanest worm that crawls—especially, how can you look with contempt and pride upon the poorest and most ignorant of your own species? Learn to think rightly, and you will know and feel, that man cannot be sunk too low to be your equal; that you can be degraded only by associating with vice.

Man cannot make principles, nor can he imitate the forms moulded by Omnipotence, except upon the humblest scale. How vain would be his efforts to make even a little world; how useless have been all his studies in attempting to discover the principles of that perpetual motion, which keeps the universe in harmony! God has made matter, and impressed on it the principles of order, proportion and beauty. Man's feeble hands mould the stone or the tree into form by those principles, and it is called beautiful. Our houses and furniture, our public monuments and improvements, do not derive the principles of their beauty or order, from the hands of the architect; he merely moulds their shapes and arranges their proportions, according to principles which he finds impressed upon matter by the Creator's hand. He studies nature's Trestle-Board, and fills up the designs drawn by the hand of the Grand Master, who presides above. Be not proud, O man, when you see beauty springing up under your hand, nor think yourself its maker. Rather let it turn your heart in humble adoration to Him who created the principle which you have discovered, and induced you with capacity to understand it, and skill to mould a stone or tree according to your just conceptions. But when you and your works perish, beauty does not perish; but other stones, moulded by other hands into the same forms, will have, in every age and every land, the same beauty.

Solomon, our first Grand Master, built a Temple of exact proportions, unrivalled splendour, and colossal strength. Where is it now? Where are the strength of its pillars and walls, the harmony of its proportions, and the splendour of its ornaments? Not one stone is left upon another. But have the principles which gave it splendour and beauty perished with it? No; they have survived the wreck of man's highest efforts, and will remain unchanged and unchangeable, until matter, released from nature's laws, sinks again to chaos.

What are all the works of human masonry, compared with those of the Divine Architect, who has not only prescribed all the laws of order and proportion; but has given us specimens of skill, which excite the admiration and baffle the inquiries of men and angels. The Egyptian pyramids and Grecian monuments, are hastening to decay; Babylon and Tyre are buried beneath the rubbish of ages; the site of glorious Carthage is scarcely known; and conquering Rome herself, is but a monument half buried in its own crumbling ruins. These are the masonry of man. His cities, his temples, his monuments and his tombs, all perish and lose the imprint of his highest skill. But look around you. This is the same earth at whose creation angels sung. This is the same sun which shone in mild radiance upon the newly created form of our first parent. The stars that gild our night, are the same which twinkled in inexpressible beauty above the trees of paradise. In pristine order and beauty, they all roll on through unnumbered ages, the undecaying temple of God's own presence. These are the masonry of God. He prescribed the principle and gave the form; in grandeur inimitable, he has built himself a house with worlds balanced on worlds; nor shall the ravages of time, nor the rage of men, move the least stone in the mighty fabric or dim the lustre of its feeblest ornament, until his Omnipotent Hand shakes the adamant pillars of creation, and tumbles the whole into chaos and flame.

But masonry is more conversant with the moral than the physical world. Experience has taught her how vain it is to think of giving lasting beauty to wood and stone. If Solomon with armies and nations at his command, could not erect a temple which would withstand the rage of man and the assaults of time, what can we, single, weak, unaided masons of this day, hope to perform? We can admire the labours of our ancient brethren, and mourn over their ruins. We can exult in the perennial beauty of God's own temple, and adore the Almighty Architect. We can cultivate in the moral world, those principles of beauty and harmony which delight us in the great creation.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

To the friends of internal improvement, and particularly to those who are interested in the improvement of canal and river navigation, a particular attention to the following article is respectfully recommended.

FOR THE RECORD AND MAGAZINE.

FLOATING EXCAVATOR.

The attention of the public is respectfully invited to this simple, yet highly important and useful machine. It is constructed by attaching a scraper to a boat or scow, similar to that in common use for ferrying purposes. The rear end or handles of the scraper rest upon a roller which passes from side to side of the scow, and is confined thereon by means of iron bolts. The forward end of the scraper is then let down through the bottom of the boat to reach the earth designed for excavation. The bolt in the bottom of the boat is curled around sufficiently high to prevent the water from flowing into the boat. The scraper is lowered by means of a windlass, placed near the forward end, and directly over the scraper, resting upon the top of an upright post on each side of the curb, and sufficiently high to admit the scraper to be raised clear of the water. From this windlass descend ropes, or chains, and attach to the sides of the scraper. By this windlass, and these ropes, the scraper is let down to any distance required. Then to fill the bosom of the scraper with earth, the boat is propelled forward in any way most convenient. In most cases, however, it will be found expedient to do this by means of a capstan in front of the boat; which capstan may be turned by horse power and erected on any floating craft of sufficient dimensions to admit the length of lever necessary for one or more horses to propel the machine. This craft to which the capstan is attached, may be anchored or otherwise confined in any place where the use of the floating Excavator may be required. The scraper when filled is then raised above the surface of the water, by the windlass directly over it, and the earth taken therefrom, when the scraper again returns to the bottom for another load. The design of this Excavator is to clear out docks and harbours; to remove earth or bars in the bottom of canals or navigable streams, for the improvement in the navigation of the same; and in short to excavate any earth where the water cannot be easily removed from its surface. It is now in operation on the Erie canal, near Lockport, and the subscriber having obtained a patent therefor would inform the public, and all who may be interested, that he will pay immediate attention, either by himself or agent, to any communication addressed to him at Lockport, Niagara county, New-York.

H. W. CAMPBELL.

Printers favourable to the promotion of arts, will manifest the same by giving the above a few insertions in their respective papers and confer an acknowledged favour on the Patentee.

SUBSTITUTE FOR HEMP AND FLAX.

At a recent meeting of the Philadelphia Society for promoting Agriculture, a communication was read from Signor Barbieri, Curator of the Botanical Garden of Mantua, Italy, on the Hibiscus Roseus Thore, a plant which grows abundantly in the marshes of Italy, and reaches to the height of from 7 to 12 feet. It is, says a Philadelphia paper, perennial produces many stems from each root, and beautiful blossoms from 18 to 22 inches in circumference. It is applicable to all the uses of hemp and flax. A specimen of cord and paper made from it, accompanied by a quantity of the seeds of the plant, were sent by Mr. Barbieri. The seeds germinate easily, and the plants may be multiplied by dividing the roots. The thready fibres of the stalks, it is said, separate rapidly by maceration in water, or by being passed through channelled rollers. The common brake would doubtless answer this object. If the stalks be cut when in full blossom, they produce fibres almost as fine as silk, and very strong. As this plant requires neither the annual sowing, nor the same degree of attention, or expense for manure, as hemp or flax, it may lay claim to some exclusive advantages over these vegetables. Experiments can alone determine their comparative merits.

There are ten native and three foreign species of genus hibiscus in the United States; the h. roseus is not among either; but it appears from the publication of Signor Barbieri, that it is a variety of the h. palustris which grows abundantly in the lower part of New-Jersey, the farmers of which state have long since found it, when macerated and prepared, a good and cheap substitute for hemp, for cord, plough lines, &c. The hibiscus has, from remote time, been known in Italy. The classical student will at once call to mind the two places in which it is mentioned by the agricultural poet of Mantua.

"Hædorum que gregem viridi compellere hibisco." Ecl. 2.

And—

"Dum sedet, et gracili fuscillam textit hibisco." Ecl. 10.

It is highly probable that the plant alluded to was the hibiscus roseus. The ancients, we see, used it as a rod, and to make baskets, its application to the purposes of hemp and flax is a recent discovery, for which Italy is indebted to Signor Barbieri. Our countrymen have, however, anticipated him in the knowledge of the utility of one of the family, as a substitute for some of the objects to which these vegetables are applied. Whether the native plant possesses the fine fibre of its Italian relation, upon which Signor Barbieri dwells, remains to be ascertained.

PORCUPINE MEN.

The following remarkable example of the occurrence of a singular organick peculiarity, and of its hereditary transmission, afforded by the English family of Porcupine Men, is extracted from Mr. Lawrence's Lecture on the origin and transmission of varieties in form:—

The family of Porcupine Men derived that name from the greater part of the body being covered by hard dark coloured excrescencies of a horny nature. The whole surface, excepting the head and face, the palms and soles, is occupied by this unnatural kind of integument. The first account of this family is found in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 424, and consists of the description of a boy, named Edward Lambert, 14 years old, born in Suffolk, and exhibited to the Royal Society in 1791, by Mr. Machin, one of the Secretaries. "It was not easy to think of any sort of skin or natural integument that exactly resembled it. Some compared it to the bark of a tree; others thought it looked like seal skin; others like the skin of an elephant, or the skin about the legs of a rhinoceros; and some took it to be a great wart, or number of warts uniting and overspreading the whole body. The bristly parts, which were chiefly about the belly and flanks, looked and rustled like the bristles or quills of a hedgehog shorn off within an inch of the skin." These productions were hard, callous and insensible. Other children of the same parents were naturally formed.

In a subsequent account, presented to the society 25 years afterwards by Mr. H. Baker, and illustrated with a figure of the hands, this man is said to continue in the same state. He was a good looking person, and enjoyed good health: every thing connected with his excretions was natural; and he derived no inconvenience from the state of his skin, except that it would crack and bleed after work. He had now been shown in London, under the name of Porcupine Man. "The covering," says Mr. Baker, "seemed most nearly to resemble an innumerable company of warts, of a dark brown colour, and a cylindrical figure, rising to a like height (an inch at their full size) and growing as close as possible to one another, but so stiff and elastick, that when the hand is drawn over them, they make a rustling noise."

They are shed annually, in the autumn or winter, and succeeded by a fresh growth, which at first are of a paler brown. "He has had the small pox and been twice salivated, in hopes of getting rid of this disagreeable covering; during which disorders the warts came off and his skin appeared white and smooth, like that of other people, but, on his recovery, it soon became as it was before. His health at other times has been very good during his whole life." "He has had six children, all with the same rugged covering as himself; the first appearance whereof in them, as well as in him, came in about nine weeks after the birth. Only one of them is living, a very pretty boy, eight years of age, whom I saw and examined with his father, and who is exactly in the same condition."

Two brothers, John Lambert, aged twenty-two, and Richard, aged fourteen, who must have been grandsons of the original porcupine man, Edward Lambert, were shown in Germany, and had the outaneous incrustation already described. A minute account of them was published by Dr. W. G. Tilesius.

Let us suppose that the porcupine family had been exiled from the human society, and been obliged to take up their abode in some solitary spot or desert island. By matching with each other, a race would have been produced, more widely different in external appearance than the negro. If they had been discovered at some remote period, our philosophers would have explained to us how the soil, air, or climate, had produced so strange an organization; or would have demonstrated that they must have sprung from an originally different race; for who would acknowledge such bristly beings for brothers.

SHEEP AND WOOL.

Sweden was the first nation that imported merino sheep from Spain. The earliest attempts to improve the native breeds were unfortunate, but in 1715, the efforts of the Swedish minister were successful.

Merinos were introduced into Saxony in 1765. The number first purchased was 229. Saxony has attained to a greater degree of perfection in this branch of industry than any other nation. In 1775, Maria-Theresa bought 500 merinos in Spain; these were the first that appeared in Austria. The attempts of Prussia to introduce merinos were not successful until 1816; when the king made large purchases in France. The French government purchased 367 merinos in Spain in 1786, and placed them at Rambouillet. They have since spread over the kingdom. It was not until 1790 that merinos were imported into England. They had many prejudices and much opposition to encounter; they have not been extensively propagated in that country. The English love fat mutton, and prefer those breeds which will furnish them with the finest meat. They import merino wool from Spain and Saxony. Italy has never attempted to improve her native breeds.

M. Ribbe endeavours to prove that there is a greater profit in crossing native sheep with merinos, than in forming flocks entirely of the latter.

[According to the experiments of Dr. Parry, a merino cultivator in England, the fifth cross brings the wool of the progeny to the same fineness as that of the merinos.]

The various sorts of wool are coarse or fine, long or short, hard or soft, elastick or brittle, round or flat, crised or not crised. The fleece should be thick, and if it be well filled with oil, it is a sign of its excellence. The hairs or fibres of merino and Saxony wool should be round, even, bright, pliant, not breaking easily, and of suitable length. When wool unites these qualities, it is called in Saxony, Electoral wool.

[The wool of sheep is nothing but crised hair; in some varieties it resembles the hair of oxen, and in others the hair and wool are mixed.]

The filaments of merino wool should be well crised or waved; the fineness of the fleece may be determined from the number of these curls, and from their smallness. Wool of a superiour quality has commonly twenty of these little bends. If merino sheep are not sheared, the wool continues to grow several years, but its growth diminishes every year, when the extremities perish and become brown. The small races of sheep produce more and better wool than the large ones. Sheep with broad heads do not yield so fine wool as those with slender heads. Merinoes at their birth, are covered with little locks or tufts of curled wool, about as large as a grain of barley; the smaller these locks are, the finer the fleece will be; the closer they are together, the more abundant will be the wool.

MARKING INK.

Moisten the linen to be marked with one ounce and a half of prepared soda, and the same quantity of gum-arabick, dissolved in four ounces of water; and when dry, write the characters with fifty grains of lunar caustick, one drachm of gum-arabick, and fifty grains of lampblack, dissolved in half an ounce of water. The above composition will resist every effort to remove it.

THE GATHERER.

[From the Daily Albany Argus, Feb. 13.]

Lowly upon the bier
The mighty fallen, lay;
Let genius, virtue, now come near,
In funeral array.

Gaze on the honoured dead—
For 'tis your farewell gaze;
He shall go down to "the narrow bed,"
And who shall fill his place?

There are, whose eyes are dim,
Whom glory cannot quell;
Who shuddering hear the triumph hymn
For one they loved so well!

When shall they mourn him less,—
When cease to speak his name,—
Will time e'er bring forgetfulness
While grief is fed by fame?

Tears fall for all who die;
They gem the humblest tomb;
But nations heave the funeral sigh
When genius meets his doom.

And sorrow's holiest sigh
Is breathed, when falls the brave;
And gallant plumes come waving by,
To find his hallowed grave.

He conquered regions wide
From nature's stern domain,
And Erie's meek submissive tide
Is subject to his reign!

The stubborn hills around,
O'er which the bark is sent,
While freemen's voice shall there be found,
Shall be his monument.

His deeds, on the bright page
Of glorious fame, belong;
And mighty bards, in every age,
Shall swell his tribute song.

And CLINTON! thus enshrined
Thy life, thy fame shall be,
When sweeping time shall have left behind
All that was great of thee!

And at the fireside hearth
Thy name shall be a sound
That deep remembrance pours to worth,
As gathering years go round. W. P. M. W.

FELLOW FEELING.

It is told of a certain worthy and wealthy citizen, who has acquired the reputation of being a considerable consumer of the good things of the table, and has been "widened at the expense of the corporation," that on coming out of a tavern, after a turtle feast, a poor boy begged charity of him—"For mercy's sake, sir, I am so very hungry!" "Hungry!—hungry!—hey!—what!—complain of being hungry!—why I never heard the like!—complain of being hungry!—Prodigious!!—why I'd give a guinea to be hungry!!—why, a hungry man (with a good dinner before him) is the happiest fellow in the world!—There, (giving the boy half-a-crown,) there, I don't want you to take my word for it; run along, my fine fellow, and make the experiment yourself."

TAKING PHYSICK.

David Hartley eat two hundred pounds weight of soap to cure the stone, but died of that disease. Bishop Berkeley drank a butt of tar-water. Meyer, in a course of chemical neutralization, swallowed 1200 pounds of crabs' eyes. In the German Ephemerides, the case of a person is described who had taken so much elixir of vitriol, that his keys were rusted in his pocket by the transudation of the acid through the pores of his skin; another patient is said to have taken argentum nitratum in solution till he became blue. Throw physick to the dogs.

DOUBLE DEALING.

Commercial morality is an unaccountable kind of thing. In the report of a recent trial for the robbery of a watch, it is stated that—

"Mr. Beauchamp identified the watch. He was sure that it was not sold; he knew that circumstance from his books; and also because he had the watch for four years, not being able to recommend it; he would not have shown it to a lady, but he would have been glad to have sold it to a gentleman. There was a private mark put on it which meant nine guineas."

There is honour, it is said, among thieves. Is there gallantry in imposition?

A MATCH FOR A BAILIFF.

Two sheriff's officers were recently sent to execute a writ against a Quaker well known in the city. On arriving at his house, they saw his wife, who, in reply to their inquiries whether her husband was at home, replied in the affirmative, at the same time requesting they would be seated, and he should speedily see them. The officers waited patiently for some time, but he did not make his appearance; and the fair Quakeress coming into the room, they reminded her of her promise that they should see her husband. "Nay friends replied she, 'I promised that he should see thee: he hath seen thee—he doth not like thy looks; and therefore hath avoided thy path and quitted his house by another road.'"

TWELVE GOLDEN RULES OF CHARLES I.

1. Profane no divine ordinances. 2. Touch no state matters. 3. Urge no healths. 4. Pick no quarrels. 5. Maintain no ill opinions. 6. Encourage no vice. 7. Repeat no grievances. 8. Reveal no secrets. 9. Make no comparisons. 10. Keep no bad company. 11. Make no long meals.—12. Lay no wagers.

PERVERSENESSE OF FOREIGNERS.

"What a rum language they talk in this place!" said an English sailor the other day to his companion, who arrived a few days later than the speaker himself had done at Rochefort—"Why, they call a cabbage a shoe—(choux!)" "They are a d—d set!" was the reply, "why can't they call it a cabbage!"

A STOMACH SWEEPER.

Long before the stomach pump was invented, the stomach brush was in fashion. It appears to have resembled an instrument used by wine coopers, called a bottle rinser. When let down into the stomach, it was agitated by a circular wire, and was thought, in conjunction with copious draughts of warm water, to cleanse the stomach thoroughly.

[Wadd's Memoirs.

POPULAR TALES.

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

THE ORIGINAL STORY.

(Concluded.)

Auld Robin, the laird, saw the desolation of his neighbour's dwelling, and he laid his schemes accordingly. He blew and braggit of his siller;—tell't Wattie that he understood a' his difficulties;—that he had nae objections to lend him a helping hand;—and that, to crown all, he wad make Jeanie his wife, and the ledly of Stanedykes.

Walter's countenance brightened up. It was like torchlight suddenly let in on folk that have a long time been sitting in darkness. But an hour afore he had thocht his case desperate, and now!—yet he could scarcely credit his ears. Sooner wad he have expectit a shower of gold frae the gloomy November clouds than help frae the hand of the laird of Stanedykes. But, tho' blinded like a man by a flash of lightning, even then, when he thocht o' his daughter, the young, the bonny, the dutiful,—of sacrificing her in this gate,—it was eneuch to stagger him, and make his flesh creep. It was, however, the only star he saw in his night of black darkness; and the laird stuck to him.

"Now, ye've gien me your hand," said Robin, rising to gang awa, "ye've gien me your hand, that ye'll do your utmost wi' my bonnie Jeanie. I've mair, Walter, than either you or her ken aboot, but the day she takes me she'll be mistress o'ta'. She'll hae naething to do ava, but sit, and sew, and churm like a lintie, and tak her pleasure, wi' a ponie to ride on when she likes the open air; and as mony maidens to wait on her,—if she likes attendance,—as ony lord's ledly frae Earlsferry Abbey to Culzean Castle. When ye bring me our word that she's consentit (she's your daughter, ye ken, Walter, my gude freen; and Scripture tells ye, ye can mak her do what ye like,) bring our a' yere bills and bonds to me, and I'll pit my name on the back o' them. Then ye ken," he added, snapping his fingers, "they'll be worth twenty siller shillings to the pound; and as gude as the Bank o' Scotland. But mind ye, I canna wait; and, if I hear nae her consent the morn, I maun een look anither way."

It is hard to say, when he thocht of Jeanie in her teens, and the laird wi' ae foot in the grave, whether pleasure or grief was uppermost in Walter's heart; but at night, when they were sitting oure their cheerless ingle, he took an opportunity of breaking the subject to his daughter. "It's true, Jeanie, my dear," he said, giving her a kind clap on the shoulder, "it's true we canna get every thing we like in this weary world. Ye're mither and me there married, like fools, for love, and lippenit to guid fortune for the plinishing. Ye see what we have been able to mak o't! No that I wad yet change her for ony ane, na—na, guidwife; hooever, I'm no speaking about that at present. Ye see, Jeanie, my dear; the state to which we are reduced;—every thing gaun back wi' us—empty barns, and horseless stables—naething but cauld poverty—and me, wi' my broken arm, every day in the fear o' being thrown into the jail. I wush, my dear Jeanie, ye could help us."

"Me! how can I help ye," said Jeanie, dighting away the tears, that had started in her een, wi' the corner of her apron, as she stoppit her spinning-wheel. "Ay, faither, if it lay in my power, if it lay between me and the end of the world, to help ye, I wadna weary o' the way."

"Deed, Jeanie, it is in your power—and ye maun tak him. Ye wad, nae doubt, like a younger man if he offered; but mak hay, my dear, when the sun shines; and when ance ye're the ledly of Stanedykes, ye may smirk in your sleeve at them a'."

"Stanedykes!—but, faither," askit Jeanie, innocently, "hoo can ye ca' Jamie Gray an auld man!—or, tho' I were to get him, hoo could either I, or ony ither body, be ledly o' Stanedykes when the auld laird is living!"

"Young Jamie!" quo' Walter, gieing a laugh. "na, na, lass, that were a kettle of fish to fry. Wha kens aboot that scapegrace! I've warrant he's married abroad; or may be, wha kens, dead and buried long ago. It's the laird himself I'm speaking aboot."

"The laird his faither!" cried Jeanie, while her heart flaffed as if it wad have loupit thro' her stays. "Never speak in that way. Do ye think the laird wad marry me, that might be his grandchild!" and she gaed a wild laugh that sounded hardly canny.

"Tak ye, Jeanie!" said Walter, kindly patting her cheek, that had momentarily grown pale as the driven sna', "ay, and be glad to get ye. Oh, Jeanie," he said, rising hurriedly frae his seat, and pacing aboot the floor in a distractit-like way, "think on the state we are in; look at me,—look at your puir mother,—we are beggared out o' house and hal',—and, in a few days, may not have a mouthfu' to eat, or a roof to cover us."

"Jeanie, my dear bairn," said her mother, leaning her hand on her shoulder, hear what your faither says, it is God's truth. Ye've aye done your duty; come what will, I'll aye say that o' ye. But what signifies a', what matters by ganes, if, when a word o' your mouth could lift us out o' this mire of meesery and wretchedness, ye keep your teeth close, and determine to act the pairt o' an undutiful dochter!"

Jeanie's heart swelled to her mouth; and while she sat wi' her hands clasped before her, and the tears running like beads of boiling water down her cheek, her voice died within her, and she couldna utter ae word. Her mind seemed to have fairly gien way; and when, in a while, her recollection began to come back, she started, as out of a fearful sleep, and in a broken, half-screaming way, cried out, "It wad ruin me here and hereafter—no—no—I daur not, cannot do it. Oh, I wish—I wish—I wish I was dead and buried!!!" With this she drappit from her chair on the floor, and gaed away in a dwam, second only in soundness to the awful sleep of death.

Next morning, however, she was up betimes, and gaun aboot the wee affairs of the house (indeed there was now little or naething for her to look after); but her pale cheek, and sunken ee, told what she had suffered, and was suffering. She seemed to shudder within herself at the bare idea of the struggle which she kent must again be renewed, as the bleating goat is said to shudder when driven into the den of the hungry wild beast.

So great, however, was the effect of the terrible conflict of yestreen, and such an impression had it made on the minds baith of father and mother, that, when they regarded the agoneezed countenance of Jeanie, they hesitated to put the thing to the test, though they kent that, in the course of a few hours, the battle must be either lost or won for ever. Breakfast passed without scarcely being tasted, while Jeanie glanced with a fearful ee on them baith, as dauting her, and hinging about her, they yet feared and kept aloof frae the momentous subject. The dark cloud, she perceived, had not yet passed over their heads. Hour after hour glided away. In the course o' the forenoon, Wattie hurriedly shut the auld family Bible, which he had sat down, as if to pore over; and, putting on his hat, dawndered away out like a tipsy man amang the fields, without kenning where his path lay.

Jeanie at last sat down to her spinning-wheel as usual, tho' she crooned not away at either of her favourite tunes, "Cowden Knowes," or, "The Flowers a' the Forest;" and her mother, putting on her spectacles, opened the book her father had shut. Neither seemed inclined to converse; and, save the humming of Jeanie's wheel, and now and then the mewling of the kitten, that wandered about among the empty dishes in search of its accustomed milk, the hail house was silent. It didna, however, lang remain so. Walter came hurrying in with visible perplexity in his features; and, throwing his hat into a corner, sank down into a chair by the window. Jeanie turned and looked him i' the face, but, in the anxiety there painted, saw eneuch to prevent her looking a second time. The shadow of desolation cam' oure her speerit.

"Jeanie, my dear bairn," cried Walter rising up behind her, and patting her tenderly on the back, "Oh! Jeanie, have mercy on us,—speak the word afore it be ours late. Could ye bear to see the faither that brought ye up, and the mither that bore ye—could ye bear to see yere auld mither and me begging our bread frae door to door, or lying on the straw of a poor-house? We thocht na—thocht na to have come to that—and you have it in your power to put every thing right. Say but the word; every thing depends on you,—our comfort, nay, even our very existence. We'll lie down on our knees before ye on the floor,—the paurents that gied ye being will throw themselves at yere feet. Ye surely canna spurn them awa wi' disdain! Ye canna shut yere heart to our prayers! Ye canna think there is a hereafter—and yet see us starving here!"

This was past human tholing. "What maun I do—what maun I do!" said Jeanie, eagerly, "tell me what I maun do!"

"Ye maun just say, my dear lassie, that ye'll marry Laird Gray. That's a' Jeanie we want ye to say; and that's na muckle." And, as Walter spoke these words, his voice trembled with anxiety and earnestness. Where could Jeanie look for counsel! She lookit in her mither's face—and her mither's een seemed to say, "Oh! Jeanie, do it, or my heart will break." Jeanie's heart was all but broken!

To be sure, to be sure," she said, putting her hand within her mother's, "I'll do whate'er ye want me. Ony thing, ony thing."

At this very moment Robin Gray, whose coming oure the fields Walter had seen before horrying in, tapped at the door, carrying in his hand a pair o' fat ducks, his first present of courtship to a famishing family.

It wad be needless here, and a waste baith of time and paper, to gang thro' wi' all the circumstantialities that took place before the wadding, which caused a titter of astonishment and jeering laughter along the haill shore of Fife. But married they were, to the no small consternation of sand-blind Nancy, the veteran housekeeper, wha hesitated about gieing up the keys; till, at last, forced to believe her ain enn, she concluded that the laird had grown donnard, and lost his right senses. Scarcely less thunderstruck were Walter Grahame and his wife, when they fand what a few days had brought forth: but the accepted bill, the stockit pantry, and the calls of mony, that scarce a week ago passed their door, like the Levite, on the opposite side, assured them that all wasna a dream.

Jeanie saw her father and mother once more raised frae misery to comfort, and felt herself the ledly o' Stanedykes. Of guid and gear she had eneuch, and to spare. Some, of course, wad tak it for granted she was happy; that, however, is another question.

It was in the thoughtfu' month of September, when the yellowing leaves, the heavy clouds, and the shortening days, remind man of the fate that sooner or later awaits him; and, it might be, some five or six weeks from the date of puir Jeanie's marriage, that, ae gloaming, as she was sitting at the far end o' the garden, behind the house, under the bourtree-bush, thinking, maybe, mournfully o' the days that were gone, a man dressed in a sailor's jacket burst suddenly thro' the hedge, and stood before her!

They gazed on each other for some time without speaking. His een were rivetted upon her, and pierced thro' Jeanie's soul; yet she couldna turn her head away. What, oh heaven and earth! maun she have felt, when she saw wha stood before her—when she saw her ain Jamie Gray looking into her heart—when she thocht of what had passed between them, and when she thocht on what she now was—his father's wife!

He spoke not a word; but, with a smile of deevilish contempt, slowly raising up his finger opposite her face, he gave a long slow hiss of the bitterest scorn, turned on his heel, and departed.

Jeanie was carried to bed in a raging fever; and the laird, who had heard of his son's arrival, imputed it at ance, in the jaundice of his jealousy, to the right cause. With the wild fury of a madman, he taxed her with having broken thro' the vow she had sae lately sworn to afore the minister. All the wicked passions of his wicked heart were roused up, like serpents frae their dens. He stampit and swore about his son in the whirlwind of his unnatural hatred: he shook his head oure the deeing Jeanie, telling her that she, like the rest, was but born to deceive him; and cursed the day that ever gave birth to such an unfortunate, miserable wretch as himself.

An awful night of tempestuous horror frowned over, and next morning Jeanie was out o' mind and delirious. She muttered and raved constantly about Jamie, asking why he had been sae lang, lang o' coming! What place of the West Indies they had buried him in!—and to take away the man in the sailor's claes that was aye standing afore her. Force was at last used to confine her to her bed; and auld sand-blind Nancy, standing wi' her hands in her sides in the middle of the floor, casting a leer first on the bed where lay the distracted and dying bride, and then on the laird, that was pacing up and down the room wi' his hands behind his back, mumbled, wi' hellish rejoicing, between her teeth, "What think ye now, maister, o' yere bonny bit wifie!"

Her strength at last totally exhausted, Jeanie fell asleep late in the afternoon; and the laird, bidding a' body leave the room, darkened the windows, and sat down to doze in the leather elbow chair by the bedside, where the sick nurse had been sitting. Scarcely had he closed his een when he fand something desperately squeezing him. He started forrit, and lookit up. It was Jeanie's hand that held a grup of his coat sleeve, so forcibly that he felt her finger nails piercing the flesh o' his withered arm. Scarcely could the hand be drawn away, though the spark of life had fled for ever!

Jamie was never seen in Fife after. Some say that he was shot in a sea-fight off the Nore, and others that he was the stranger that threw himself oure the pier of Leith. The truth is, that naeboddy ever heard ony mair about him.

Auld Laird Gray spun out ten years after Jeanie's judgement-like departure; but he never could be said, from that time, to be properly in his right mind, losing his faculties, ane after anither, and growing, wi' the frailties of age, a kind of second bairn, or rather natural. However, let the truth aye be spoken, he had his beef-tea, or chicken-soup, regularly every day; and his swelled legs, carefully wrappit up in the finest Welch flannel, were laid on a stool wi' a silk cushion, by the dutiful hands of sand-blind Nancy.

Jeanie's gravestone is in the southmost corner of the kirkyard of Dysart; but the reading is now scarcely legible, from the effects of the rain and sea-winds on a soft stane. On the tap o't there's the figure of a wee angel blowing a trumpet; but sae defaced as no to be able to scare away the sea-gulls, that, coming up frae the shore, sail round and round about it, and at last light upon 't wi' a scream, as i it was the grave of some auld sailor of their acquaintance they had come up on purpose to pay a visit to.

ORIGINAL REVIEW.

FOR THE RECORD AND MAGAZINE.

THE RED ROVER;

A Tale of the Sea:—by the Author of the Spy, &c. &c.

It is an unpleasant task to speak ill of a work of this kind, even though we might decline to praise it; and it is rather a perilous office to raise one's voice against the productions of an author who has acquired a name and a fame equal to those of Mr. Cooper; nonetheless, as we acknowledge our presscriptive right in the republic of letters, we shall without attempting a formal review of the writings of this author, express our opinion very frankly of his last performance, the title of which we have placed at the head hereof.

Mr. Cooper has sketched so many excellent, and indeed powerful scenes, in his different works, that his claims to genius, especially in the estimation of his own countrymen, will hardly be disputed at this day; and although we readily make this concession, yet we must be permitted to say, that he lacks many of the essential requisites of a good story-teller. His plots are none of the best, his gentlemen and ladies do not always converse in spirited and easy dialogues; and for the "better half" of his characters, he may as well dismiss them at once, for he finds it impossible (and we suspect he is not singular in this failure) to understand and manage the women.

Acting, we presume, upon the hint that has frequently been thrown out, "that Mr. Cooper never has drawn, and probably cannot draw, the character of a lady," in this performance, he has made the ship "Dolphin" the heroine of his story; at least, if she be not the heroine, we confess it would puzzle us not a little to decide who is: and for the hero, whether he intended the vessel which is also called "the Red Rover," or "Red Rover," himself, the commander, or Wilder, to personate that character, we are unable to say. These at any rate, are the most prominent actors, and the greater part of the work is taken up with descriptions of their adventures, of the ocean in calms and in storms, and of vessels and their different parts. This is done in language altogether unintelligible to one unacquainted with sea phrases, or whose gentility has not been polished by a voyage before the mast. This is indeed a sore grievance; and particularly so, as the "Dolphin" is de facto, the heroine of the novel, and one naturally desires to be acquainted with all her motions. In order to do this, however, one must have made as many voyages as "Sinbad the Sailor." For instance, take the following passage, opened at random:

"There is master Harry, the lad on the poop, who hails a yard as soft as a bull-whale roars."

Or this:

"Bouse a bit on the waister, so belay all that."

From several tedious and technical descriptions of the "Red Rover" and the "Dolphin," we are content to believe that they were the handsomest vessels ever built with a "poop" or a "waister," if, haply, such terms appertain to vessels; and had Mr. Cooper laid the keel himself, and commanded her until the time she was burned, he could not have loved the "Red Rover" more than he apparently did.

Many of the descriptions, however, of ocean scenery, of battles and of storms, are admirable; and the actors are often placed in circumstances where they excite the most intense interest. Take, for instance, the following description of a tempest and a fight, which is only equalled, certainly not surpassed, by the much admired panther scene, in the Pioneers:—

"A gun was now discharged from the side next the still receding 'Dolphin.' The iron messenger was seen bounding along the surface of the sea, skipping lightly from wave to wave, until it cast a little cloud of spray upon the very deck of their enemy, as it boomed harmlessly past her hull. Another, and yet another, followed, without in any manner extracting signal or notice from the Rover."

"How's this!" exclaimed the disappointed Bignall. "Has he a charm for his ship, that all our shot sweep by him in rain! Master Fid, can you do nothing for the credit of honest people, and the honour of a pennant? Let us hear from your old favourite; in times past she used to speak to better purpose."

"Ay, ay, sir," returned the accommodating Richard, who, in the sudden turns of his fortune, found himself in authority over a much-loved and long cherished piece. "I christened the gun after Mistress Whiffle, your honour, for the same reason, that they both can do their own talking. Now, stand aside, my lads, and let clattering Kate have a whisper in the discourse."

"Richard, who had coolly taken his sight, while speaking, now deliberately applied the match with his own hand, and, with a philosophy that was sufficiently to be commended in a mercenary, sent what he boldly pronounced to be a 'thorough straight-goer' across the water in the direction of his recent associates. The usual moments of suspense succeeded, and then the torn fragments, which were seen scattered in the air, announced that the shot had passed through the nettings of the 'Dolphin.' The effect on the vessel of the Rover was instantaneous, and nearly magical. A long stripe of cream coloured canvas, which had been artfully extended from her stern to her stern, in a line with her guns, disappeared as suddenly as a bird would shut his wings, leaving in its place a broad blood-red belt, which was bristled with the armament of the ship. At the same time, an ensign of a similar ominous colour, rose from her poop, and fluttering darkly and fiercely for a moment, it became fixed at the end of the gaff."

"Now I know him for a knave that he is!" cried the excited Bignall; "and see! he has thrown away his false paint, and shows the well known bloody side, from which he gets his name. Stand to your guns, my men! the pirate is getting earnest."

"He was still speaking, when a sheet of bright flame glanced from out that streak of red which was so well adapted to work upon the superstitious awe of the common mariners, and was followed by the simultaneous explosion of nearly a dozen wide mouthed pieces of artillery. The startling change from inattention and indifference, to this act of bold and decided hostility, produced a strong effect on the boldest heart on board the King's cruiser. The momentary interval of suspense was passed in unchanged attitudes and looks of deep attention; and then the rushing of the iron storm was heard hurling through the air as it came fearfully on. The crash that followed, mingled, as it was, with human groans, and succeeded by the tearing of riven plank and the scattering high of splinters, ropes, blocks, and the implements of war, proclaimed the fatal accuracy of the broad-side. But the surprise, and, with it, the brief confusion, endured but for an instant. The English shouted, and sent back a return to the deadly assault they had just received, recovering manfully and promptly from the shock which it had assuredly given.

The ordinary and more regular cannonading of a naval combat succeeded. Anxious to precipitate the issue, both ships pressed nigher to each other the while, until, in a few moments, the two white canopies of smoke, that were wreathing about their respective masts, were blended in one, making a solitary spot of strife, in the midst of a scene of broad and bright tranquillity. The discharges of the cannon were hot, close and incessant. While the hostile parties, however, closely imitated each other in their zeal in dealing out destruction, a peculiar difference marked the distinction in character of the two crews. Loud, cheering shouts accompanied each discharge from the lawful cruiser, while the people of the Rover did their murderous work amid the deep silence of desperation.

"The spirit and uproar of the scene soon quickened that blood, in the veins of the veteran Bignall, which had begun to circulate a little slowly by time."

"The fellow has not forgotten his art!" he exclaimed, as the effects of his enemy's skill were getting but too manifest in the rents sails, shivered spars, and tottering masts of his own ship. "Had he but the commission of the King in his pocket, one might call him a hero."

"The emergency was too urgent to throw away the time in words. Wilder answered only by cheering his own people to their fierce and laborious tasks. The ships had now fallen off before the wind, and were running parallel to each other, emitting sheets of flame, that were incessantly glancing through immense volumes of smoke. The spars of the respective vessels were alone visible, at brief and uncertain intervals. Many minutes had thus passed, seeming to those engaged but a moment of time, when the mariners of the 'Dart' found that they no longer held their vessel in the quick command, so necessary to their situation. The important circumstance was instantly conveyed from the master to Wilder, and from Wilder to his superiour. A hasty consultation on the cause and consequences of this unexpected event was the immediate and natural result."

"See!" cried Wilder, "the sails are already hanging against the masts like rags; the explosions of the artillery have stilled the wind."

"Hark!" answered the more experienced Bignall: "There goes the artillery of heaven among our own guns. The squall is already upon us—port the helm, sir, and sheer the ship out of the smoke! Hard a-port with the helm, sir, at once!—hard with it a-port, I say."

"But the lazy motion of the vessel did not answer to the impatience of those who directed her movements, nor did it meet the pressing exigencies of the moment. In the meantime, while Bignall, and the officers whose duty kept them nigh his person, assisted by the sail-trimmers, were thus occupied, the people in the batteries continued their murderous employment. The roar of cannon was still constant and nearly overwhelming, though there were instants when the deep ominous mutterings of the atmosphere were too distinctly audible to be mistaken. Still the eye could lend no assistance to the hearing, in determining the judgement of the mariners. Hulls, spars, and sails were alike enveloped in the curling wreaths which wrapped heaven, air, vessels, and ocean, alike, in one white, obscure, foggy mantle. Even the persons of the crew were merely seen at instants, labouring at the guns, through brief and varying openings."

"I never knew the smoke pack so heavy on the deck of a ship before," said Bignall, with a concern that even his caution could not repress. Keep the helm a-port—jam it hard, sir! By heaven, Mr. Wilder, those knaves well know they are struggling for their lives!"

"The fight is all our own!" shouted the lieutenant, from among the guns, stanching, as he spoke, the blood of a severe splinter-wound in the face, and far too intent on his own immediate occupation, to have noticed the signs of the weather. "He has not answered with a single gun, for near a minute."

"Fore George, the rogues have enough!" exclaimed the delighted Bignall. "Three cheers for vic—"

"Hold, sir," interrupted Wilder, with sufficient decision to check his commander's premature exultation, "on my life, our work is not so soon ended. I think, indeed, his guns are silent;—but, see! the smoke is beginning to lift. In a few more minutes, if our own fire should cease, the view will be clear."

"A shout from the men in the batteries interrupted his words; and then came a general cry that the pirates were sheering off. The exultation at this fancied evidence of their superiority was, however, soon and fearfully interrupted. A bright vivid flash penetrated through the dense vapour which still hung about them in a most extraordinary manner, and was followed by a crash from the heavens, to which the simultaneous explosion of fifty pieces of artillery would have sounded feeble."

"Call the people from their guns!" said Bignall, in those suppressed tones that are only more portentous from their forced and unnatural calmness: "Call them away at once sir, and get the canvas in!"

"Wilder, startled more at the proximity and apparent accustomed delayed not to give an order which was seemingly so urgent. The men left their batteries, like athletes retreating from the arena, some bleeding and faint, some still fierce and angry, and all more or less excited by the furious scene in which they had just been actors. Many sprang to the well-known ropes, while others, as they ascended into the cloud which still hung on the vessel, became lost to the eye in her rigging.

"Shall I reef or furl?" demanded Wilder, standing with the trumpet at his lips, ready to issue the necessary order.

"Hold, sir; another minute will give us an opening."

"The lieutenant paused; for he was not slow to see that now indeed, the veil was about to be drawn from their real situation. The smoke which had lain upon their very decks, as though pressed down by the superincumbent weight of the atmosphere, first began to stir; was then seen eddying among the masts; and finally, whirled wildly away before a powerful current of air. The view was indeed, now all before them.

"In place of the glorious sun, and that bright blue canopy which had lain above them a short half hour before, the heavens were clothed in one immense black veil. The sea reflected the portentous colour, looking dark and angry. The waves had already lost their regular rise and fall, and were tossing to and fro, as if awaiting the power that was to give them direction and greater force. The flashes from the heavens were not in quick succession; but the few that did break upon the gloominess of the scene came in majesty, and with dazzling brightness. They were accompanied by the terrific thunder of the tropics, in which it is scarcely profanation to fancy that the voice of One who made the universe is actually speaking to the creatures of his hand. On every side, was the appearance of a fierce and dangerous struggle in the elements. The vessel of the Rover was running lightly before a breeze, which had already come fresh and fitful from the cloud, with her sails reduced, and her people coolly, but actively employed in repairing the damages of the fight.

"Not a moment was to be lost in imitating the example of the wary freebooters. The head of the 'Dart' was hastily and happily got in a direction contrary to the breeze; and, as she began to follow the course taken by the 'Dolphin,' an attempt was made to gather her torn and nearly useless canvass to her yards. But precious minutes had been lost in the smoky canopy, that might never be regained. The sea changed its colour from a dark green to a glittering white; and then the fury of the gust was heard rushing along the water with fearful rapidity; and with a violence that could not be resisted.

"Be lively, men!" shouted Bignall himself, in the exigency in which his vessel was placed; 'Roll up the cloth; in with it all—leave not a rag to the squall!' Fore George, Mr. Wilder, but this wind is not playing with us; cheer up the men to their work; speak to them cheerily, sir!"

"Furl away!" shouted Wilder. "Cut, if too late; work away with knives and teeth—down, every man of you, down—down for your lives, all!"

"There was that in the voice of the lieutenant which sounded in the ears of his people like a supernatural cry.—He had so recently witnessed a calamity similar to that which again threatened him, that perhaps his feelings lent a secret horror to the tones. A score of forms were seen descending swiftly, through an atmosphere that appeared sensible to the touch. Nor was their escape, which might be likened to the stooping of birds that dart into their nest, too earnestly pressed. Stripped of all its rigging, and already tottering under numerous wounds, the lofty and overloaded spars yielded to the mighty force of the squall, tumbling in succession towards the hull, until nothing stood but the three firmer, but short and nearly useless, lower masts. By far the greater number of those aloft reached the deck in time to ensure their safety, though some were too stubborn, and still too much under the sullen influence of the combat, to harken to the words of warning. These victims of their own obstinacy were seen clinging to the broken fragments of the spars, as the 'Dart,' in a cloud of foam, drove away from the spot where they floated, until their persons and their misery were alike swallowed in the distance.

"It is the hand of God!" hoarsely exclaimed the veteran Bignall, while his contracting eye drunk in the destruction of the wreck. "Mark me, Henry Ark; I will forever testify that the guns of the pirate have not brought us to this condition."

The character of the "Red Rover" has no distinguishing peculiarities; it is made up of inconsistencies,—vices and virtues,—which are most absurdly placed in the body and person of an outlaw. The next personage is Wilder,—taken from a wreck when a lad by two seamen; he is taught Latin by his captain, and most unaccountably obtains the appointment of lieutenant in the British navy. While holding this rank, he enlists, for the purpose, it appears, of delivering him up to justice, with the pirate, alias, "Red Rover." After he enlists, however, he very naturally falls in love with Gertrude, a very la-la sort of a girl, because there is no one else for him to fall in love with; and near the end of the book he marries her. One of the best drawn and most consistent characters is the vain old Madame De Lacey; and Dick Fid is entitled to his share of praise, because the outlandish jargon he uses, is also used by his betters; but Homespun, the tailor, is so illy conceived, that the author seems to have dropped him involuntarily, from not knowing what use to put him to.

The greatest charm in the work appears to have been contained in the eyes and voices of Wilder and the Rover; for they could either of them still a hundred and fifty mutinous pirates, at a single word or squint.

After all the crew had left the ship and its wayward commander, we are informed—

"But doubt was soon ended. Suddenly a streak of flame flashed from her decks, springing fiercely from sail to sail. A vast cloud of smoke broke out of the hull, and then came the deadened roar of artillery. To this succeeded for a time, the awful and yet attractive spectacle of a burning ship.—The whole was terminated by an immense canopy of smoke, and an explosion that caused the sails of the distant 'Dart' to waver, as though the winds of the trades were deserting their eternal direction. When the cloud had lifted from the ocean, an empty waste of water was seen beneath, and none might mark the spot where so lately had floated that beautiful specimen of human ingenuity."

Any writer, except Mr. Cooper, would not have neglected so good an opportunity as the above, to dispose of his hero; and we were led to suppose that when they blew up, there would have been an end of the Rover and his female boy; instead of which, however, in the last page, after the lapse of some twenty years, he is brought to the house of Wilder to die, and it is there first discovered that Wilder and the Rover are relations. How he is saved, we are uninformed, and do not wish to know, feeling perfectly satisfied that the whole is done in one chapter, and that the last!

The whole plot, if plot there be, from beginning to end, is improbable. Wilder's scheme of getting on board the pirate, besides being not over wise, succeeded, as far as the reader knows, merely by chance. The dialogue of the higher characters is stiff, that of the females is spiritless, and apparently proportioned in quantity, rather to the author's consciousness of want of skill in its management, than to the share that is usually contributed, by the fair sex, either in fiction, or real life.

With all this, however, there are many scenes sketched with a strong hand. Besides the one we have quoted, "the Red Rover's" nocturnal chase of the "Royal Caroline," may be instanced. The silent passage of the Rover by the dismantled wreck, the shipwreck itself, and the escape of Wilder and his female companions from the sinking hulk, are awful, and indeed terrific. The best we can say of The Red Rover, as a whole, is, that it is better than either of his three last productions, and approaches, without equalling, the Pilot. It will add but little to the fame of the author.

LACONICKS.

It is foolish to expect the five following things, from the following persons:—

1. A present from a poor man;
2. Service from a lazy man;
3. Succour from an enemy;
4. Counsel from an envious man;
5. And true love from a Prude.

Five things are useless, when not accompanied with five others:

- Good advice without effect;
- Riches without economy;
- Learning without good manners;
- Aims to improper objects—or without a pure intention;
- And life without health.

When subjects are ill treated by subaltern officers, and can not make remonstrance to the prince, because the too great authority of ministers of state deprives them of the means; their lot is like to that of a man who, half dead with thirst, approaches the river Nile to drink; but perceiving a crocodile, is obliged either to perish for lack of water, or submit to be devoured alive.

Never trust to appearances or high pretensions. Behold the drum: notwithstanding all its noise it is empty within.

Soft words may appease an angry man; bitter words never will. Would you throw fuel on a house in flames, in order to extinguish the fire?

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1828.

DIED, at his residence in this city, on Monday evening last, very suddenly, of a rupture of the heart, His Excellency, DE WITT CLINTON, Governor of the State of New-York, aged 58 years and 11 months. The suddenness of his exit, and the great loss to which it has subjected the city, the state, and the whole union, has produced an excitement which may readily be conceived by those who take a lively interest in the publick welfare; but it can never be described.

Death, as a common abstract idea, has something in it so solemn, and at the same time so sympathick, that he may be considered as having digressed from the common nature of humanity, and adopted somewhat of the horrifying apathy of brutes, who does not feel at once a tender and a gloomy sensation whenever it crosses his mind. And yet, how often have we the ocular, if not the tangible proof of that indifference to the teachings of humanity, which is the consequence of a habitual reference to this gloomy idea. Death lays his withering hand on so many of the gay objects around us, that, however forcibly the lesson may strike home to our hearts at the first, its impression becomes weaker and weaker, and its duration more and more volatile, by every repeated example. In the common visitations of this spoiler, how few ever hear of his ravages. The obituary notice, a gloomy paragraph, seldom read, and never recalled to the memory, may circulate widely; but who reads it with interest, or reflects on it with an intent to profit, or a heart to melt at the perusal? Now and then, the casual reader of newspaper obituaries may recognize some friend of his young and happy days, or some relative, near by the ties of blood and the faithful realization of their obligations; but how seldom does the world, or any of its medley of living beings, who live beyond the immediate neighbourhood of the deceased, know any thing of him but the naked fact that he died! Few, and scarcely seconded by the soothing power of sympathy, are they who mourn on such occasions. To the world,

The annals of the human race,
Their records since the world began,
Of him afford no other trace
Than this,—THERE LIVED A MAN!"

Far different, however, is the sensation produced by the death of such a man as it is now our painful duty to speak of. A man who has made his name familiar to the lips of millions, and whose fame has reached even beyond the limits of our great and growing republic. The death of the great man—the statesman and the philosopher,—never meets with indifference from the ear of the patriot, the philanthropist, or the good citizen,—let the tidings come when and where they may. And it is our melancholy task to announce such a dispensation of Divine will, in the decease of the chief magistrate of this state,—DE WITT CLINTON.

Seldom do these bereavements which it is our lot to experience, assail us so suddenly, or so destitute of any possible means to fill the void which their departure leaves in the circle of publick or domestick relations. When in the little communities which are every where to be met with, the leading spirit is called away, there is always some secondary mind which is called into action, and is presumed to fill the blank. But who shall assume the station which is vacated by him, to whom schools and senates were wont to look up for wisdom and support? We speak of the deceased as a citizen and a scholar. We know that we address many whose political sentiments and feelings were totally averse to his who can now oppose them no more. But happily, indeed, the genius of our political prosperity never decreed that these variances, which are the result of contrary popular opinions, should tarnish the gems of personal friendship, or blind our eyes to intellectual light. Whatever may be our feelings in a political point of view, to CLINTON, the philosopher, the patriot, the philanthropist, and the Mason, we are to look; for that CLINTON lives forever!—to CLINTON the partizan we have no homage to pay; for that character must perish with his own fallible mortal clay.

Thus it ever is with man. The greatest is but mortal; and mortality, however it may be vivified and exalted by the glory of intellectual attainments, will always carry something more than its ordinary frailness, down with it to the grave. If man were a perfect being it would not be so; and he may be said to approximate nearest to human perfection, with whom is buried the least of his living fame.

To eulogize the dead with justice, we leave to those who may outlive the prejudices which party creates, or who have candour enough to look beyond them. Were we qualified for the task, we would not yet undertake it; and confident we are, it will be more faithfully and permanently executed by the hand of some one, whom the wisdom of the people shall authorize, than any self constituted eulogist could at present hope to arrive at. With such impressions we leave his eulogy for the orator and the historian; reserving for ourselves this sole expression:—the virtues and worth of a great man are laid deeper in the hearts of republicans than all the thousand conscientious tests which designate political partisans or religious sectarians. They are like our faith in heaven, on which we lean when all else has failed. They are our patriotism, our religion and our immortal hope.

THE FUNERAL. The last solemnities in honour of the remains of the late governor, took place on Thursday last, agreeably to the arrangements of the legislature previously made, and under the direction of the joint committee of both houses. Cannon were discharged at intervals of thirty minutes from sunrise until the moving of the procession; and minute guns were fired during the moving of the procession, accompanied by the solemn toll of the bells.

The procession moved from the residence of the deceased, corner of North Pearl and Steuben-streets, through North Pearl, Columbia, North Market, State, and Washington-streets, to the place of sepulture, the family vault of the late Doct. Stringer, in Sand-street, in the following order:—

The military escort, under the command of Brigadier General Cooper.

The clergy of the city and the attending physicians, with scarfs.

The HEARSE, covered with a superb canopy, surmounted with black plumes, and drawn by four white horses, their heads also decorated with plumes, and the harness trimmed with crape; led by grooms properly habited.

The following gentlemen in scarfs, as PALL BEARERS: Gen. Bogardus, Mr. Cray, Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Wilkeson, of the Senate; Mr. Bucklin, Mr. Scudder, Gen. Montross, Mr. Williams, Mr. Breese, and Gen. Brinkerhoff of the assembly. Ch. Justice Savage, Judge Sutherland, the Secretary of State Mr. Flagg, the Comptroller Mr. Marcy, and Messrs. J. D. P. Douw and William James.

The Albany Military Association, flanking the pall bearers. The relatives of the deceased, and of his family, in carriages. The present and late military family of the commander-in-chief, as mourners.

The joint committee of arrangements, in scarfs.

The senate and assembly, severally preceded by their officers; the president and speaker with scarfs.

The other state officers, and canal commissioners.

The common council, judicial and executive officers, and members of the bar of the city of Albany.

Master Masons, to the number of five hundred, with the insignia of the order.

Royal Arch Masons, with their officers, in full dress.

Present and past Grand Officers of the Grand Chapter of the State of New-York, in full dress.

The faculty of Union College, and Phi Beta Kappa society, preceded by Doctor Nott, their president, robed in a scarf.

St. Andrews Society, with their badges.

The officers and members of the Albany county Sunday School Union.

The Fire departments, consisting of several companies, with their banners; the whole under the direction of Allen Brown, as marshal.

The masters of vessels and steamboats.

The students at law.

The citizens of Albany, preceded by the several ward committees.

Officers of other counties, &c.

Business was entirely suspended during the day, and the feelings of the people on the melancholy occasion were strikingly illustrated by the silence and apparent interest which every where prevailed. Add to this the cold and gloomy state of the weather, which though it may have sensibly diminished the number, added much to the solemnity of the procession.

The ceremonies were such as found a corresponding feeling in every heart. They were appropriate and imposing, without any needless ostentation. In a word every thing was done that decency required, and so done as to confer honour upon the committees who directed the ceremonies.

The masonic part of the procession, considering the inclemencies of the weather, and the shortness of the notice for a society so sparsely located, was unusually well represented, both in number and appearance. The other organized societies, and the military, were also well conducted, and no accident or irregularity occurred to mar the harmony that such a ceremony demanded.

In 1806 De Witt Clinton was elected Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the state of New-York, which office he held without intermission until the year 1820. At the time of his death he was Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, and Grand Commander of the General Grand Encampment of the United States.

§ The Encampment, Chapter, and the several Lodges in this city, have unanimously resolved, that the masonic rooms and jewels be clothed in mourning, and that the members wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days, in testimony of respect for the virtues of their deceased companion and brother, DE WITT CLINTON.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Saturday, Feb. 9. In senate, the commissioners of the Land Office transmitted a communication on the subject of the arsenal lot in the city of Albany, recommending a sale of said lot, excepting such part as is necessary for the accommodation of the arsenal; referred to the committee of finance. The annual report of the trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbour was received, accompanied by a memorial, requesting the passage of a law in relation to the marine hospital.

In assembly, the section of the justices court law, exempting persons from imprisonment, in executions for amounts less than ten dollars, was under consideration, in committee of the whole, on the revision.

Monday, Feb. 11. In senate, the day was chiefly spent in committee of the whole, on business of a local and uninteresting nature.

In Assembly, the justices court law was again under consideration, and after a debate of nearly three days, the section under question is left as it heretofore stood; allowing imprisonment of the body, for want of property, be the amount more or less. The governor transmitted a communication from judge Irving of New-York, in relation to slander suits in frivolous cases; suggesting a remedy for the evil, by amending the law in relation to costs. Ordered printed, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Tuesday, Feb. 12. Mr. Spencer moved that the reading of the journals, and all other business be dispensed with, to hear the reading of resolutions from the assembly. § See the proceedings of the assembly as reported below. Mr. Spencer moved for a concurrence in the resolutions; which was seconded by Mr. Cray; both gentlemen accompanying their motion by very proper and feeling remarks, on the sudden and painful bereavement, which the state has experienced in the death of its chief magistrate. The senate transacted no other business except the appointment of a committee to inquire and report to the senate, whether an election of president of the senate is necessary; consisting of three members,—Mr. Spencer, Mr. Dayan, and Mr. Jordan.

In assembly, immediately after prayers by the Rev. Mr. Young, Mr. Butler addressed the house in an eloquent, pathetic, and highly appropriate manner; after which he offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted by the house, and concurred in by the senate.

It having pleased the Almighty, suddenly to remove by death the chief magistrate of this state, and the legislature being desirous to manifest its deep sense of the great public loss sustained by the state, and the American nation, it is therefore

Resolved unanimously, By the senate and assembly of the state of New-York, that in testimony of the profound grief, felt by this legislature, on the sudden death of DE WITT CLINTON, governor of this state, the members of senate and assembly, will wear the usual badges of mourning, during the present session.

Resolved unanimously, That the funeral obsequies of the late governor, be conducted under the direction of a joint committee of the two houses, to consist of four members of the senate, and four members of the assembly.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the two houses of the legislature, will, in their public character, attend the funeral solemnities of the late governor.

Resolved unanimously, That these resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased governor Clinton, as an evidence of the high estimation entertained by this legislature of his great talents and eminent public services; of the deep regret caused by his sudden and awful removal from the scene of his fame and of his usefulness; and of its sincere condolence with those who have been so deeply afflicted by this dispensation of Providence.

Wednesday, Feb. 13. The two houses met pursuant to adjournment, when, after accepting the report of the joint committee of the senate and assembly, they adjourned until one o'clock, P. M. to-morrow.

Thursday, Feb. 14. The two houses met at one o'clock, P. M. and after a short sitting proceeded in a body to the mansion of the deceased governor CLINTON. No legislative business was transacted this day.

Friday, Feb. 15. In senate, the following bills were read a third time and passed: to lay a tax to pay the expenses of building a jail in the county of Orleans; and to incorporate the Black River canal company. Mr. Spencer, by the unanimous consent of the senate brought in a bill "to defray the expenses attending the funeral of DE WITT CLINTON, late governor of this state," which was read three times and passed.

In assembly, Mr. Edgerton from a select committee appointed for the purpose, brought in a bill providing for the payment to the minor children of the late governor CLINTON, of the salary attached to the office of governor for the present year; and providing also for the payment to them of a sum equal to that received by any other canal commissioner for the period during which DE WITT CLINTON filled that office. The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to a committee of the whole. It will probably pass both houses to-day (Saturday) without opposition.

NEWS AND TRIMMINGS.

In a late trial before the Philadelphia quarterly sessions, one of the witnesses, a woman who lays out the dead, testified that a thief, who had turned state's evidence in the case, on one occasion, stole a dead body out of the house while she was making the winding sheet.—Human bones, it is said, have been found in Madison county, Ohio, which must have been 8 feet in height!—A party lately returning from a visit to the ship Delaware, lying off Annapolis, dined on board the steam-boat Patuxent, when, among other toasts, the following was given by Charles Bonaparte:—The Memory of Fulton—whose genius permits us to drink our toasts at the rate of ten miles an hour.

§ We crave the indulgence of our patrons, for the late appearance of our present number. We shall endeavour to avoid a repetition of the delay, for the future.

DIED,

In Bennington, Vermont, on the 6th inst. Mrs. MARIA NORTON, wife of Capt. Martin S. Norton, aged 25 years.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to the late firm of R. STARR & Co. in the above Foundry, continue to execute orders for Plain and Ornamental Type, Brass Rule, and Metal Cuts. Also, for Presses and Ink, Chases, composing Sticks, Cases and Stands, Galleys, and printing materials of every description, at short notice, and on terms as liberal as those of other Foundries.

Many new articles have been added to this Foundry within the last year—among which are new founts of Small Pica and Bourgeois. Also, Small Pica, Brevier and Minion full face capitals for captions, and full face two line letter of all the different sizes from Pica to Pearl. Likewise Canon, Double Great Primer, Double Pica, Great Primer and Pica Antiqua with lower case to each, and Long Primer, Brevier and Minion antique capitals. Also, many elegant Borders and New paper Ornaments, none of which are stereotyped from wood cuts or type, as is usual at most other foundries, but all are cut on steel and cast in copper matrices, and are warranted to work clear. Printers will at once perceive the superiority of those cast in copper matrices, the lines not being filled up and the edges rounded, as is the case with those stereotyped. The large job letter and cuts are all cast in moulds and matrices, on metal bodies, and with the exactness of the smaller type.

Have also cut a new and very beautiful English Script, on inclined body, orders for which can be executed by the first of April. By being cast on inclined body, the face is not exposed as on square body, where most of the letters are kerned; and the mould in which it is cast having a notch or shoulder in the side the type are kept perfectly in line. No expense has been spared, and it is confidently believed, that this Script will be found the most elegant type ever cast in this country, or in Europe.

Type cast at this foundry is warranted equal at least in hardness and durability, to any cast in this country. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the founts regularly put up. It is intended to keep such a supply on hand as to be able to furnish orders without the usual delay. Orders by mail, or left at the Foundry, No. 8 Liberty street, will receive prompt attention.

POETRY.

FOR THE MASONICK RECORD, AND SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

SONNET—TO —.

Is there within the cloisters of thy heart,
 One little spot, where wildered love may rest?
 Oh, tell the secret impulse of thy breast,
 Fair one, to me—and joy or wo impart!
 Be thou my Ariadne—I to thee
 Will be no heartless, thankless Theseus:
 The changeless sun, as he revisits us,
 Shall find us changeless, and as true as he
 To his gay flowery spring. To emulate
 Idalia's birds, we 'll give to eve and morn
 A joyous, never-wearying return,
 And steal the point from every shaft of fate.
 Each hour shall fly in rapture, if thine eye
 But lend to time one half its buoyancy!

THE OCEAN OF YEARS.

The poem below appeared as the New-Year's Ode for the Carrier of the Catskill Recorder. The author, who has very frequently contributed to our columns over the signature 'G.' was not aware of its possessing more than the ordinary merit of such ephemeral productions; but with the elegant compliment from the editors of the New-York morning Courier, he will not be so tenacious of his own opinion as to oppose that of a judge so able to criticise as James G. Brooks. The Courier pronounces it "a most spirited and splendid production—full of genius and enthusiasm;" and adds,—"We know not the author, but whoever he may be, let him cultivate the rare genius with which nature has blessed him; it will conduct him to honour and renown."

Silent and dark is the ocean of years
 Back through its mazes when memories float;
 Trackless and cold its broad surface appears,
 Where the billows close after the canvass-borne boat:—
 Years that have passed! ye have now and then left
 A ripple, to show where some billow was cleft
 In the strife of a moment,—whose motion rolls on,
 When the prow that awakened its bubbles is gone.

Wo to the bark that has foundered unseen,—
 Lost and unknown in the ocean of years;—
 Laurels grow not—but the sea-plant is green;
 Sorrow dries there, save the sad siren's tears.
 Not to the shore shall a billow of fame
 Toss up to sight the lost wanderer's name;
 Not on an island of hope shall be driven
 The wreck that the winds of oblivion have riven.

Billow on billow, and tide after tide,
 Waft the proud bark of life's convoy abroad;
 Ocean's around them unnumbered and wide
 As Eternity,—who shall direct them but God?
 Freight with gold, some glide swiftly away,
 Safe for a while; but beware of the day
 When the tempest of death from the night cloud comes down!
 The bark may be saved, but the treasure must drown.

Another comes on—it is laden with fame;
 Lighter than air on the surface it floats;
 Yet shall its cherished freight be but the game
 Of the wandering billows and sea minstrel's notes.
 Tossing, and mingling, and wasting, and scattered,
 Like the rage of the sail by the hurricane tattered,
 Who can trace out the fond venturer's lot,
 Till found by the wrecker who values it not!

Next comes the gilded bark, freighted with love,
 Laughing at tempests and sighing at calms;
 Wrapped in the sunshine that flatters above,
 Musick defies even the tempest's alarms.
 Backward and forward, the sport of the tide,
 No compass to steer, and no pilot to guide—
 Soon would the dear store to ruin be driven,
 Did pity not stoop and transfer it to heaven.

Thus speeds our voyage on the ocean of years.
 Fain would we anchor, but fate bears away
 Through current and calm,—and the spirit that steers
 The vessel of life, is a foe to delay.
 Here, in a season like this, when we greet,
 Let joy be the signal however we meet.
 To Friendship, who hails, be the sole answer given,—
 We are laden with hope,—our voyage is to heaven.

And friendship will hail—when abroad on the deep
 The horizon is sail-studded round to the eye;
 Some all dimasted and torn by the sweep
 Of the tempest,—and some o'er whose passage the sky
 Was ever in smiles—and friendship will greet,
 In a season like this, when the lulled billows meet
 Like the green sea of Sunda, where the tempests breathe not,
 And all the rude strength of the wave is forgot.

Hail, aged bark! thou art shipping a course
 Unknown to the gay ones that hover around thee;
 Thine is a voyage where the billowy force
 Of the ocean of years hath repassed thee, and found thee
 Changeless and firm as the rock it hath washed
 Incessant and loud, where its first foam was dashed.
 Now ye have spurned at the hurricane's sport,
 Where are ye bound?—and how near is your port?

Ye who have spread the broad banner, and bore
 Freedom and strength on your glorious deck,
 When the red thunder cloud mingled its roar
 With the rush of the waves and the crash of the wreck!
 Ye have weathered the storm, and your banner is borne
 Gallant and gayly, unshamed and untorn!
 Ye are gaining your haven, and there may ye rest,
 Where storms never reach, in the isles of the blest.

Welcome staunch bark! thou hast manhood on board,
 Bearing away in the pride of thy glory!
 Ne'er may thy bold waving banner be lowered,
 And sunshine and plenty be ever before thee.
 Hail gallant vessel! Thy convoy is youth,
 Lovely, and ardent, and panting for truth!
 Sunshine around thee—and O may the Giver
 Of happiness grant thee that sunshine forever.

First to the past year we bid our farewell:—
 Chequered it was, like its fellows of yore,
 With the dark hues that vanity casts in her spell,
 And the bright ones that happiness sprinkles them o'er.
 Peace have we seen with her olive-bow wand
 Cheering the droppings of Plenty's full hand;
 And, rising like odours of Araby sweet,
 Gratitude's offering the blessing to meet.

Broad o'er our fields were the pinions of health
 Spread like an eagle—the wing of a dove;
 Deep has Contentment, the truest of wealth,
 Mingled its breath with the pantings of Love.
 Maidens who erewhile in singleness sighed,
 Have taken the happier title of bride;
 Happier prizes have fallen to others,—
 Theirs are the raptures and honour of mothers!

Yet has the dark wing of sorrow o'er-shaded Eyes that were smiling when the season began;—
 Flowers of the loveliest promise have faded,
 And earth has no flower so soon withered as man,
 When the blighter comes o'er him, and takes to his breast
 Of all that we cherished, the fondest and best!
 Death! thou hast claimed him, but not for thine own—
 Thy touch broke the chain, and thy victim hath flown.

Far o'er the ocean, where science was born,
 Redemption hath sprung for the famishing brave;
 The offspring of heroes, the Mussulman's scorn,
 The daughter of Greece is no longer a slave!
 Peace to their classic fields, peace to their shore;
 Peace to their temples and homes—for no more
 Shall the cimeter waste, or the infidel bear
 In chains of dishonour the young and the fair.

Go on, liberators, accomplish the work,—
 The harvest is plenteous and freedom the fruit.
 Soon shall the diadem fall from the Turk,
 And Liberty franchise the slaves of the brute!
 From the thralldom of Ali shall Tempe awaken,
 A Phoenix from ashes long spurned and forsaken,
 And the ruins of cities, though scattered, shall flourish,
 Rebuilt o'er the illustrious ashes they nourish!

THE FATHER OF ROBIN HOOD.

FROM A COLLECTION OF OLD BALLADS.

The father of Robin a forester was,
 And he shot in a lusty long bow
 Two north country miles and an inch at a shot,
 As the Pindar of Wakefield does know:
 For he brought Adam Bell, and Clim of the Clough,
 And William's Cloudeslee
 To shoot with our forester for forty mark;
 And our forester beat them all three.

FUNERAL HYMN.

BY BISHOP HERBEN.

Thou art gone to the grave—but we will not deplore thee,
 Though sorrow and darkness encompass the tomb;
 The Saviour has passed through its portals before thee,
 And the lamp of his love is thy guide through the gloom.

Thou art gone to the grave—we no longer behold thee,
 Nor tread the rough paths of the world by thy side;
 But the wide arms of memory are spread to enfold thee,
 And sinners may hope since the sinless hath died.

Thou art gone to the grave—and its mansion forsaking.
 Perchance thy weak spirit in doubt lingered long;
 But the sunshine of heaven beamed bright on thy waking,
 And the sound which thou heardest was the seraphim's song.

Thou art gone to the grave—but 'twere vain to deplore thee,
 When God was thy ransom, thy guardian, thy guide;
 He gave thee, He took thee, and He will restore thee—
 And death hath no sting since the Saviour hath died.

THE MOTHER TO HER CHILD.

FROM THE MEMORIAL.

One kiss, my boy, upon thy cheek,—
 That cheek so young and bright,—
 And once again I'd hear thee speak
 Thy softly hushed "good night;"
 Then rest, and not a shade of earth,
 Can cloud thy slumbers fair;
 Dark dreams from worldly cares have birth,
 And thou hast nought of care;
 O, why might not life's silver tide
 With thee thus ever smoothly glide!

Who gazes on the bloom of May,
 Nor sighs that all will wither?
 And yet the blossoms must decay,
 Ere we the fruit may gather;
 And life's sweet morning buds of joy,
 Like spring flowers soon depart;
 And thou must change, yet wear, my boy,
 Life's freshness in thy heart;
 Pure feelings, like the flowers perfume,
 Embalm the memory of its bloom.

Man's lot, "dominion o'er the earth"—
 Maketh his sinews strong,
 And that proud lot will lead thee forth,
 All ardent mid the throng:
 Life's onward path is wrapped in night,
 And dangers are its fame;
 Ambition holds its eagle flight,
 And spurns at quiet's name;
 And pleasure's siren songs entice,
 And flowers conceal the precipice.

O, wilt thou wander, then, my boy?
 Away, ye idle fears!
 Why shroud our sun of present joy
 In clouds of future years?
 There's ONE will watch thee, though I sleep
 Where morning never shone;
 There's ONE thy faltering steps can keep;
 Wouldst thou His voice were known?
 Then list, amid the world's wild din,
 The still small voice thy heart within.

MASONICK RECORD.

THE PRINCIPLES OF MASONRY.

An Address on the Principles of Masonry, delivered in the Church at Frankfort, Kentucky, on the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist, June 24, A. L. 5823, at the request of Hiram Lodge, No 4:

BY AMOS KENDALL.

Originally, the moral as well as physical world, was all order, beauty and harmony. What would a stupendous comet produce in our solar system, were it to rush upon this earth and sweep it from its orbit? The same confusion and ruin followed the irruption of vice into the moral system. In primeval purity, all was the sunshine of peace; no passion ruffled the smooth sea of happiness; no pain agonized the decaying frame of man, distorting the human face divine; all was unclouded joy and heavenly serenity, an uninterrupted succession of delightful thoughts and rapturous sensations. Man, like the heavenly bodies, travelled on in the bright path which his Creator had prescribed, enjoying unbounded bliss and exciting the admiration of angels. But the great destroyer came, ran athwart his course, and thrust him from his orbit. Since that fatal day, he wanders in a devious track on the confines of the moral universe, pushing further and further into darkness and night, from that radiant Centre which calls and draws him back. The first transgression engendered and brought to maturity, the whole brood of hateful passions. Anger, lust, envy, hatred and revenge, with all their dreadful squadrons, swept across the human breast, and overturned God's moral temple from its low foundations. Instead of all the raptures and joys of paradise, how feel we now! In our tumultuous bosoms, wave of passion follows wave; one tempest hardly ceases to thunder when another rolls on. The beautiful moral edifice is but a ruin, amidst which wild beasts howl, reptiles crawl, and the winds of heaven whistle. Man's moral form is scarce the outline of what it was, of what it ought to be, and of what it may hereafter be. To repair this ruin, to rebuild the grand temple which transgression has dilapidated, is the professed object of masonry. Alas! we almost blush to name its glorious object to those who witness its mean effects. If the ancients among the sons of Judah, who remembered the glory of the first temple, wept at the diminished size and faded splendour of the second, how much more cause have we to weep over the most perfect moral edifice which our masonry produces! That perfection cannot be attained in the great undertaking, is proved by the nature of fallen man, as well as the experience of past ages; but that much may be done towards repairing the moral ruin, is attested by the invitations and promises of our great Master above, as well as by the example of eminent masons in modern and ancient times.

Why have we now so few eminent masons?—Why do not we ourselves live more perfectly according to the principles which we profess? It is to be feared, that most of us forget those duties which we are under solemn obligations to perform, and instead of erecting in our hearts a beautiful moral edifice, acceptable to our Grand Master above, pile ruin upon ruin, until the foundation and the outline of the original temple, are lost forever in the undistinguished rubbish. My brethren, is it not so? How few of us make the Bible the rule of our faith? Yet we all profess to do so. How few of us habitually think of circumscribing our desires and keeping our passions within due bounds? Yet we are all under the most solemn obligations to do so. How few of us ask the aid and blessing of the Supreme Being in all our undertakings? Yet this is a masonick duty. How few of us strive to live in peace with all mankind, exercising charity, forgiving injuries, diffusing around us the principles and fruits of true benevolence? Yet these are among the first duties which masonry inculcates. How few of us live with a constant view to immortality, preparing ourselves as meet stones for that "building not made with hands, eternal in the heavens!" Alas, how few!

Though masonry inculcates all the moral duties and the worship of one God, yet it is not religion. It does not profess to change the heart and make at once a temple from a ruin. But masonry and religion are sisters. Their origin and object are the same. Both came from God; both tend to make men better; and both point to heaven as our final home. I do not say that masonry alone will carry us there; but he who in heart and practice feels and follows the true principles of masonry, does all that man can do, to climb the mystick ladder which spans from earth to heaven. A renewed and purified heart makes no man less a mason; for it is the glorious prize for which a true practical mason strives. Christianity, therefore, is not at war with masonry. On the contrary, she is the kind angel which takes the mason where human efforts fail, and bears him on wings of love to that happy region, for which without divine assistance, he was vainly struggling.

Neither a mason's nor a christian's duties are confined to the discipline of his own heart! They range abroad and mingle themselves with all the relations of society. I have wondered that christians, who are commanded to judge the tree by its fruit, have often been found among the enemies and persecutors of masonry. Does not this tree yield good fruit? It disarms the bitterest personal animosities, teaches forgiveness and forbids revenge. Is not this good fruit? It unites in one brotherhood men of all nations and languages. Is not this good fruit? Actuated by its pervading principles at some mysterious sign or sound, arms have dropped from the hands of the most deadly national enemies on the field of battle, and those who were ready to pierce each others bosoms, have embraced like brothers. Is not this good fruit? It fills the heart of the penniless stranger with gladness, wipes the widow's tear and relieves the needy orphan. Is not this good fruit? Why, therefore, would some good men and christians cut it down as a barren fig tree? But we are often told, that many masons lead immoral lives. With sorrow and shame we acknowledge the justice of this charge. Too many forget the sublime principles they have been taught and the solemn obligations they have incurred. But their vices are not the fruit of masonry; they are noxious weeds which she has not succeeded in exterminating. They shoot up spontaneously in the human heart, and not a mason's nor a Christian's power can destroy the latent seeds. Germinate they will, and all we can do is to nip the rank shoots and thus prevent their luxuriance from overshadowing virtue's nobler plants. Judged by the standard of pure morality, what society, nay, what man, can stand the test? Would it not be disingenuous and unjust to condemn christianity because a single professor or even a whole church deviate from its pure principles? If christianity which changes the heart, cannot extinguish vitious propensities and stop immoral practices, who can expect that grand result from masonry which merely professes to discipline the heart? He who would suppress masonry or christianity, because vice sometimes rears his hated front within their sacred pale, would extinguish the sun, the source of light and heat, and plunge the world in darkness and death, because noxious vapours sometimes float on his beams! Judge no institution by the practices of its worst members. If its principles be good, instead of obscuring its beneficent beams in eternal night, let us drain those stagnant pools of vice whence its influence extracts poison and pestilence. Let it shine upon the uncontaminated surface of our hearts, whence will spring up, in beautiful luxuriance, the plants of faith, hope and charity, yielding immortal fruit.

My brethren, think not that you have performed all your masonick duties merely by a regular attendance upon the meetings and the labours of the lodge, by complying with all its requisitions, or even by an intimate acquaintance with all the mysteries of our order. These are the body of masonry; but what is a body without a soul? Look at our implements, our ornaments, our parades and our days of festivity—what are they! Nothing—unless thoughtfully improved, worse than nothing. All these have their moral. There is not an implement or ornament in our lodge; there is not an emblem painted on our aprons; there is not an incident or ceremony in all our discipline, which does not point inwardly or upwardly. They remind us of our origin, our duties, and our destiny. They remind us, that there is an All-Seeing-Eye above which measures all our actions by the square of justice. They teach us to have faith in the Ruler of the Universe, to look to him as our father, our friend and our protector. Every where and at all times, appeals to the Omniscient Mind and reliance upon the Omnipotent Arm, are recommended by the principles of our order, and will make us happier and better men. With proper conceptions of the power, the justice and the goodness of the Deity, it is impossible for a man to be a bad husband, father, friend, neighbour or citizen.

Yet, masonry does not content herself with teaching this grand principle, with erecting this main pillar in the masonick edifice. In separate lessons and in a thousand ways, she inculcates all the social duties. Submission to lawful authority, universal charity, truth and justice in all our intercourse with our fellow men, are precepts taught with peculiar care. We are particularly instructed, that industry is the mother of many virtues, and that masons should not live as drones in the hive of society. See you not among our emblems the bee hive; that little industrious community, whose laws punish idleness with death? Masonry presents this as an example, and inculcates the just maxim, that "if one will not work, neither shall he eat." Have we no drones among us? Are there not masons who live without any occupation, feasting luxuriously on the honey which others have gathered, and preparing to leave families degraded by their idleness and corrupted by their example, to the charities of their brethren and the world? However good masons such men may be in theory, they are no masons in practice. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread" was the dreadful curse which the Great Creator pronounced on fallen man; and he who attempts to evade this inevitable doom does injustice to man and defies his Maker. Who riots in sumptuous living, and gluts his appetite on the unpaid for fruits of other men's labour! Vain man and false mason, think you to escape unpunished! Think you not that he who has bowed to earth and wrestled with the clods, to draw thence the luxuries on which you feast, will not soon raise his hardened palms and sun-burnt face to heaven, to call down vengeance on your fraud and injustice! There are among men, butterflies with gaudy wings robbed from the industrious bee, who ought yet to have been crawling worms, and are now in all their splendour ten times more detestable.

My brethren, I hope there are no drones among us. I hope that each of us has an honest and useful occupation which we faithfully pursue, or stores of wealth which render personal exertion and labour unnecessary. But for the good of mankind and the honour of our order, it would be well to avoid the appearance of idleness. If it be not necessary that we labour with our own hands or direct any business for our own support, we may at least draw designs for others and not cease to do good when we cease to labour. But O, be not idle! The idle man's mind is the devil's trestle-board, on which he delights to draw designs the most captivating and yet the most noxious, the most alluring to the senses and passions of man, and yet the most fatal to masonry and virtue. Idleness and virtue are incompatible—so, in a great degree, are industry and vice.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

At a special meeting of Hudson Lodge, No. 15, convened at St. John's Hall, in the city of Hudson, on Wednesday the 13th February, 5828, in consequence of the death of his excellency De Witt Clinton, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:—

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to put a period to the mortal existence of De Witt Clinton, who was a beloved brother and distinguished member and officer of our masonick fraternity; who during the whole term of his active life zealously devoted the full influence of his powerful and comprehensive mind, to the promotion of the best interests of the institution of masonry; who by such aid and by his high fame as a scholar, a statesman and a philanthropist, as well as in the arts and sciences, has contributed more than any other American name to bear the ensigns of masonry beyond and above the shafts of ignorance and prejudice; and who as a man and as a friend, as well as in all the relations of social life, ever exemplified in practice the benign principles and cardinal virtues of our order: therefore

Resolved, that we deeply feel and mourn the loss, which by this dispensation of Providence is visited upon our nation and the age, but more especially upon our fraternity, by this removal of our distinguished brother, in the prime of his usefulness, and with all his ripening honours thick upon him.

Resolved, as a testimony of our respect and affections for his memory, and as a pledge of our determination to imitate his virtues, that the officers and past officers of this lodge will wear crape, and the brethren the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, that this lodge be dressed in mourning for the space of twelve months.

Resolved, that the proceedings of this lodge be published. CYRUS CURTISS, Master.

CHARLES GARDNER, Sec'y.

At a special meeting of Hudson Royal Arch Chapter, No. 5, convened at St. John's Hall, in the city of Hudson, on Wednesday evening the 13th February, 5828, in consequence of the death of his excellency De Witt Clinton, General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, that this Chapter concur in the resolution this day passed by Hudson Lodge, No. 15, honouring the memory of the late General Grand High Priest De Witt Clinton.

Rev. THOMAS F. KING, H. P.

CHARLES GARDNER, Sec'y.

At a special meeting of La Fayette Encampment, No. 7, convened at St. John's Hall, in the city of Hudson, February 13th, 1828, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, that this Encampment, concur in the resolutions this day passed by Hudson Lodge No. 15, honouring the memory of his excellency De Witt Clinton, Grand Commander of the Grand Encampment of the state of New-York, and General Grand Commander of the General Grand Encampment of the United States.

L. U. LAWRENCE, G. C.

CYRUS CURTISS, Recorder.

Phoenix Lodge, No. 361, in Lansingburgh, convened Wednesday evening, Feb. 13th, 5828. The object of the convention having been explained, a committee was appointed to draft resolutions suitable to the occasion. The committee having retired a few minutes, returned and reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God to remove by death our worthy and beloved brother De Witt Clinton, Governor of the State of New-York; and General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of the United States—and whereas we have assembled to lament the sudden death of this gifted son of genius, and to pay our sad tribute of respect to the memory of departed worth: therefore

Resolved, that while we express our faith in the rectitude of Divine Providence, we feel suitably humble under this mournful dispensation, by which community is deprived of one of its brightest ornaments, our country of one of its ablest statesmen, and our fraternity of one of its most distinguished patrons:

Resolved, that we deeply sympathize with his afflicted family in their irreparable loss, and wish them that consolation which their bereavement requires.

Resolved, that, while we rejoice that we have been contemporaries with so eminent a patron of science, internal improvements, and national greatness, we grieve that so brilliant a star in the intellectual horizon was destined to set so soon.

Resolved, that in token of respect for our deceased brother, we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, that the above preamble and resolutions be signed by the W. Master and Secretary, and published. ALEX. MC'CALL, Master.

JOHN WADDLE, Sec'y.

At an extra communication of Hamilton Lodge, No. 144, assembled at the Masonick Hall in the village of Glen's Falls, Warren county, on the 15th instant, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, that, whereas it has pleased Almighty God, the Supreme Architect of the Universe, in his divine providence, to call from his labours our worthy brother De Witt Clinton, P. G. M. of the Grand Lodge of the state of New-York, we feel our duty to pay to his memory the last tribute of respect:

Resolved, that the worshipful master, wardens, and brethren of this lodge, show their respect for our deceased, worthy brother, by wearing the usual badge of mourning thirty days.

E. G. LINDSEY, Sec'y.

On receiving intelligence of the death of his excellency, De Witt Clinton, Rising Sun Lodge, No. 185, at the request of Wm. A. Langworthy, W. M., convened at their lodge room in the village of Saratoga Springs, in the county of Saratoga, and unanimously passed the following resolutions, expressive of their feeling, and regret at this afflictive dispensation of Divine Providence:—

Resolved, that we sincerely lament the unexpected decease of his late Excellency, De Witt Clinton: that we consider the afflictive dispensation by which the nation has been deprived of those qualifications which fitted him for the highest offices of state, and of those talents which so greatly ornamented the paths of literature and science, as a public calamity, and that we freely unite our sympathies in deploring an event which may justly be called a national loss.

Resolved, that the members of this lodge will wear the usual badge of mourning on the left arm for the term of thirty days, in testimony of the respect we entertain for the memory of De Witt Clinton, a mason, a scholar and a statesman.

Resolved, that the above resolutions be signed by the secretary, and published.

AARON BLAKE, Sec'y.

At an emergent meeting of the Masonick Brethren of Brother's Lodge, No. 147, in the village of Fort Ann, in the county of Washington, held on the 15th day of February, 5828, in consequence of the sudden and unexpected death of our worthy Br. De Witt Clinton; late Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, and Governor of this state—it was unanimously

Resolved, that we deeply deplore his loss, and revere his memory, for the many virtues which he maintained in the discharge of his public and private duties; and especially his zeal and ability in forwarding those stupendous plans of internal improvement which have justly elevated him to the distinguished rank of the statesman and patriot—therefore

Resolved, that the brethren of this lodge wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

[From the Philadelphia Journal of Medical Science.]

ANOMALOUS CASES OF DROPSY.

BY N. CHAPMAN, M. D.

It is a common remark of writers, that in the commencement, as well as throughout the subsequent stages of dropsy, particularly ascites, there is sometimes almost as much distress from flatulence as by the accumulation of the fluid. For this and several other reasons, I once thought it not unlikely, that occasionally the blood vessels may, instead of a serous effusion, secrete a gas, which, by some process not understood, might be converted into a fluid state. That the blood vessels are capable, and do exercise such an office has been shown by Mr. Hunter, and is rendered probable by a variety of facts. Dropsy, I have seen in several instances to follow flatulent colic—and I had, some years ago, under my care, in consultation with the late Dr. Wistar, the case of a boy which strongly supports the hypothesis.

Having become heated and fatigued by skating, he laid on the ice, and after a time, was seized with a colic, attended by a distention of the abdomen, amounting to tympanites. By carminatives, opiates, and external warmth, he was speedily relieved of pain, but on our next visit, a few hours afterwards, we were astonished to find that he laboured under ascites, with oedema of the lower extremities, which proved exceedingly tedious, though he finally recovered.

During the summer of 1825, I had under my care a lady from the country, who, after eating water-melons and some other fruit, was attacked, according to her report, with violent colic, followed immediately by tympanitic distention. On examination I found she had confirmed ascites with oedematous swellings of her feet and ankles, from which she was relieved by copious diuresis and watery discharges from the bowels.

It seems, moreover, that dropsy may be induced by repelled perspiration, or in other words, by an inverted action of the exhalents. Cases to this purport have also come under my notice. Not many years ago, I attended a gentleman, with Dr. Physick, who, returning from a tiresome and dusty ride, went into a warm bath. The water was so uncomfortably hot, that he could scarcely bear it. He however, continued in it for half an hour, and on coming out felt chilly and soon experienced the distention of ascites, and finally died of universal dropsy.

Nearly about the same time I was called to another gentleman in consultation with Dr. Physick also, with general dropsy, who traced its commencement directly to his having imprudently plunged into a cold bath, whilst heated and sweating from exercise. Each of these individuals was in the meridian of life, of robust constitution, and previously in the enjoyment of perfect health.

These are anomalous cases, apparently exceptions to the doctrine of the universal and inseparable connection of dropsy with inflammation. But, perhaps, they may be reconciled to it. In the instances, for example, which were preceded by colic and tympanitic distention, it is not altogether unreasonable to suppose that the irritation was extended to the peritoneum, exciting phlogosis—and in relation to the others, succeeding to the use of the hot and cold bath, it is more manifest that there was a metastasis of the irritative impression made on the dermoid, to the serous tissue, and the effusion resulted accordingly. The external and internal exhalents act pretty much reversely, whatever is gained by the one is lost by the other, and very often there is an entire vicarious assumption of office respectively. The functions of the skin being suspended, what is more usual than to see some inward surface or organ increasing its efforts to compensate the loss. Generally, we have under these circumstances, watery diarrhœa, or an augmented urinary discharge. But imagine, that instead of the bowels or the kidneys being thus affected, the peritoneum were excited, should we not be presented with hydropick results?

The doctrine, as now received, presumes that ascites is invariably the effect of pre-existing peritonitis, and especially of the sub-acute or chronic state of it, all the remote causes of the disease uniting to produce such an effect. Cases, however, of ascites, do sometimes follow the acute species of peritonitis, though always I believe, when it is originally weak, or much reduced and delicately diffused. The extravasation of coagulable lymph, or the secretion of pus is uniformly the product of it under opposite circumstances.

POWER OF ANIMAL REPRODUCTION

The extraordinary power of reproduction which many of the lower animals possess, obtains not only in lobsters and crabs, which recover their claws on losing them, but in various other animals to a much greater extent. "The lower we go," says the author of Conversations on the Animal Economy, "in the scale of creation, the more surprising is the reproductive faculty. How liable is the earthworm to be injured by the unconscious gardener; but the injury, so far from diminishing animal life, increases it; for each portion into which the animal may be divided by the spade becomes a separate creature; having a separate system of parts speedily regenerated. The head of the common snail, with its four horns, has been satisfactorily ascertained to be renewed in the course of six months; and in an animal of a more complicated structure, the water-newt, (the lacerta palustris), a complete eye was reformed in the course of ten months, with all its various parts. The star fish and anemone may have their tentacula removed, and they are speedily replaced; and if these animals are divided, two or more distinct animals are the consequence. But the fresh water polype affords the most extraordinary example of any known of this wonderful power, for in whatever way it may be cut or divided, each part becomes, in a few days, a separate animal, capable of all the functions of its parent.—This animal is of a soft nature, like a common snail. It adheres by one end, like a sucker, to water-plants and other substances; and the other end, which is the head, is surrounded by many little arms or feeders, which seize and bring to the mouth, around which they are placed like radii, minute worms and water insects."

DAMP DESTROYER.

By placing an unstopped bottle or more open vessel, if convenient, containing strong sulphurick acid, in any part of a room, the moisture of the air becomes rapidly absorbed, and the salubrity of the apartment consequently improved. The great capacity of sulphurick acid for vapour and the cheapness of the acid, renders this mode of absorbing humidity very economical.

BUGS.

The following composition has been found very efficacious in destroying bugs:—Take of pyroligneous ether one pint; camphire four drachms; oxy-muriate of quicksilver, one drachm; mix. The parts of the bedstead, and of the wall or wainscoting in which the vermin lodge, should be well washed out with lotion, by means of a painter's brush, and a little should be poured into all the crevices. Being very inflammable, it should not be used by candle light. [Gazette of Health.

NEW ALKALI IN HEMLOCK.

Professor Ficinus, of Dresden, has discovered a new alkali in the Æthusa Cynapium, (Linn.) to which he has given the name of Cynopta. It is crystallizable, and soluble in water and alcohols, but not in æther. The crystals are in the form of a rhombick prism, which is also that of the crystals of the sulphate. [Hensman's Repertoire.

SEED CORN.

Seed corn soaked in a solution of Glauber's salts, will vegetate quickly, and the salts will protect it against worms, fowls, and birds. This accidental discovery, it is said, has been fully tested.

THE GATHERER.

The following string of puns upon the representatives of the people of our state, is extracted from the Allegany Republican, and inserted in our columns by request. A further request would be attended to, had we the necessary materials in our office to comply with it.

Our legislative body, by the following list of names, appear to be a motley crew. In the mechanical branch there are two Smiths, a Shoemaker, a Glover, a Wheeler, a Miller, two Clarks and a Barber; they have a Bishop and a Dean; one Butler, one Page, two Porters, and a Carrier; they appear to be possessed of some real estate: they have Good rich, Green with Woods, among which is the Smartwood and Thorn. If you wish to build Graungers, there you will find Wood worth almost any price, if you wish a lasting Sill. I am told there are some small improvements there, for they have a Gardner, but as yet I have seen none of his produce except the Fitch. The country appears to be well watered with Wells and running water, for you will find a Lake, the two rivers Clyde and Jordan, navigated by a Scudler with but one Waterman and a Fisher. I am told that by excavating the earth which is not mountainous (though there are Knuckles now and then to be met with, and a few Livingstones with a Root), you may find Cule of a good quality, which is in good demand, as Cowles bear a good price in market at this season of the year; and though it is not considered quite so healthy, I prefer a good bed well warmed with a good Brasher, before I resign myself to the arms of Morpheus. There are but few quadrupeds, only one Martin, and two Harts, who have a Shepard and a Warren. This lack of animals must be on account of a Troop being stationed on the out skirts, while the interior is traversed with now and then a Mann and Child who Treadwell the little Alley they select as their daily walk, should it not storm. Among them there is a Skinner, a Sanage, and a Turk; a Sweetman with two Wescotts, (one with a Whiteside), a Noble Mixer, and should you make use of more than one Viele, he will Fillmore even should you wish a Gross.

WHITFIELD.

This celebrated preacher first visited New England in 1740. He was received with great honour at Boston, where he preached almost every day. He often had an audience of 6000 persons in the churches, and when he preached on the Common, it was repeatedly in the presence of 15,000, and in one instance of near 30,000 persons. He preached in many other towns, and every where with wonderful effect; "he was flocked after by all sorts of persons." He visited Northampton, and in the Journal of his tour has the following remarks respecting the Rev. Jona. Edwards and his family, mixed with other matters.

"Felt wonderful satisfaction in being at the house of Mr. Edwards. He is a son himself, and hath also a daughter of Abraham for his wife. A sweeter couple I have not yet seen. Their children were dressed not in silks and satins, but plain, as becomes the children of those who in all things ought to be examples of christian simplicity. She is a woman adorned with a meek and quiet spirit, and talked so feelingly and solidly of the things of God, and seemed to be such a helpmeet for her husband, that she caused me to renew those prayers, which for some months I have put up to God, that he would be pleased to send me a daughter of Abraham to be my wife. I find upon many accounts it is my duty to marry. Lord, I desire to have no choice of my own. Thou knowest my circumstances. Thou knowest I desire to marry only in and for thee. Thou didst choose a Rebecca for Isaac; choose one for me to be a helpmeet for me, in managing that great household committed to my charge. Lord, hear me; Lord, let my cry come unto thee."

It was while his mind was in this state (says the Christian Examiner) that he wrote home to England a very characteristic letter, soliciting the hand of a young lady, who "had often been impressed on his heart as the person appointed by God for him;" but stating, at the same time, "I bless God, if I know any thing of my own heart, I am free from that foolish passion which the world calls love." The negotiation failed; but he was afterwards wedded to a widow lady, whose attractions, by his own account, did not consist in riches or beauty, but in being a despised follower of Jesus." Unhappily, however, Whitfield was no judge of character; the union was not blessed, and her death, according to one of his friends, "set his mind much at liberty."

THE APE.

An ape, which Blumenbach observed for more than a year together, would manage the wood for the stove, and put it in with as much judgement and economy as a cookmaid. He was very fond of the fire, like all apes, and would at times singe himself, and afterwards roll in the snow, and then return to the fire. He was often at the college, where he used to examine the specimens with a most laughable imitation and grimace. Once he swallowed a piece of arsenick, large enough to poison ten Kalmucks; it only produced a violent diarrhoea, and he was quite well again. But once a work on insects was lying on the table; this fellow had studied it with great gravity for an hour. When — came into the room, he found that he had, with great address, pinched out all the beetles of the great plates and ate them, mistaking the pictures for real insects.

THE WIT OF THE GALLOWS.

The disposition of life and death has often been subject of brutal merriment. During the reign of Edward VI. Sir Anthony Kinstone, Prevost of the western army, distinguished himself by the promptness of his decisions and the cruel pleasantry of their execution. Having dined with the mayor of a city, he inquired if the gallows was sufficiently strong for use. The mayor replied, he thought so. "Then," said the Prevost, "go up and try"—and caused him to be hanged on the spot. On another occasion, having received information against a miller who could not be found on the instant, he hanged the servant, telling him to be content, for it was the best service he ever rendered his master.

NEGROES.

Blumenbach gives us a most entertaining account of a little library which he possesses of works written by Negroes, from which it appears that there is not a single department of taste or science in which some Negro has not distinguished himself.

TRIFLES.

Why ought a young goat sleeping to be taken before a magistrate?—Because it is kid napping!

Why is the Devil like the Emperor of Russia?—Because he is his Imp-erial Majesty.

Why is Sir Walter Scott like a secret discovered?
—Because he is the known un-known.

Why is a Cat standing on her hind legs like a waterfall?—Because it is a Cat-erect.

Why is the Law of Libel like the Thames Tunnel?—Because it is a great bore to the newspapers.

Why is a Postman like an Accoucher?—Because he labours to deliver.

A gentleman accosted a lady in the street with "My dear Mary, I have been at your house; I have placed my life in your hands," "You amaze me; what has happened? speak!" demanded the lady. "Only, my dear, having written and published my Memoirs, I have left a copy for your acceptance," replied the gentleman.

POPULAR TALES.

THE SPECTRE'S VOYAGE.

BY HENRY NEELE.

There is a part of the river Wye, between the city of Hereford and the town of Ross, which was known for more than two centuries by the appellation of "The Spectre's Voyage;" and across which, as long as it retained that appellation, neither entreaty nor remuneration would induce any boatman to convey passengers after a certain hour of the night. The superstitious notions current among the lower orders were, that at about the hour of eight on every evening, a female was seen in a small vessel sailing from Hereford to Northbrigg, a little village then distant about three miles from the city, of which not even the site is now discernible; that the vessel sailed with the utmost rapidity in a dead calm and even against the wind; that to encounter it was fatal; that the voyager landed from it on the eastern bank of the river a little beyond the village; that she remained some time on shore, making the most fearful lamentations; that she then re-entered the vessel, and sailed back in the same manner, and that both boat and passenger vanished in a sudden manner as they arrived at a certain part of the river, where the current is remarkably strong, within about half a mile of the city of Hereford.

This singular tradition, like most stories of a similar character, was not without a foundation in truth, as the reader will perceive who takes the trouble to peruse the following narrative.

In the turbulent reign of Edward the Second, when the whole of England was one theatre of lawless violence; when might was constantly triumphant over right, and princes and soldiers only respected the very intelligible, if not very equitable principle,

"That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can;"

the city of Hereford was distinguished by the zeal and patriotism of its citizens, and by the unshrinking firmness with which they adhered to the cause of Queen Isabella and the young prince her son, afterwards the renowned King Edward the Third, in opposition to the weak and ill-fated monarch who then wore the crown, and his detested favourites the Spensers, father and son. Sir Hugh Spenser the younger, was a man of unquestionable talents, and possessed virtues which, during a period of less violence and personal animosity, might have proved honourable to himself, and useful to his country. The nobles, however, hated him for his obscure birth and his devotion to the service of his prince, who, however imbecile and unworthy of his high station, was nevertheless unstained by any flagitious crime, and was possessed of a kind and generous heart, and was especially endeared to Spenser, on account of the wealth and honours which he had prodigally lavished upon his family and himself. The discontents of the Queen and the Barons were not vented in fruitless complaints or idle menaces. They flew to arms. The King of France, the Queen's brother, assisted them with men and money; the Count of Hainault, to whose daughter Philippa, the young prince had been contracted, did the same. The King was driven from London, and forced with the elder Spenser, whom he had created Earl of Winchester, to take refuge in Bristol. Being hotly pursued to this city by the Earl of Kent and the Count of Hainault, at the head of a formidable army, he was obliged to flee into Wales, leaving the elder Spenser governor of the castle of Bristol. This fortress was immediately besieged, and speedily taken, as the garrison mutinied against their governor, and delivered him into the hands of his enemies. This venerable noble, who had nearly reached his ninetieth year, was instantly, without trial, or witness, or accusation, or answer, condemned to death by the rebellious Barons: he was hanged on a gibbet; his body was cut in pieces and thrown to the dogs; and his head was sent to Winchester, the place whence he derived his title, and was there set on a pole, and exposed to the insults of the populace.

When the news of this catastrophe reached the younger Spenser, he was at the head of a fine army, which had sat down before the city of Hereford, for the purpose of reducing it to obedience to King Edward. The formidable force which he commanded, had struck terror into the hearts of the citizens, so that notwithstanding their attachment to Queen Isabella, and their detestation of Spenser, they had shown symptoms of their willingness to yield to the latter upon reasonable terms; and he, desirous of obtaining possession of the city without any unnecessary effusion of blood, had granted a truce of a week's duration, to give them time to decide upon what conditions they would open their gates to him. The disastrous intelligence which he received from Bristol, however, made him doubtful whether he should hold inviolate the truce which he had granted to the besieged. He did not doubt but that the Earl of Kent and his troops, flushed with conquest, would hasten to his destruction, and to the relief of Hereford, and that unless he could possess himself of the city and castle, and by shutting himself up in the latter be enabled to bid defiance to his enemies, the fate of his father must inevitably be his own.

The favourite recreation of the inhabitants of Hereford was then, as it is now, to make excursions either alone, or in parties upon their beautiful river. This amusement had become so much a custom with them, that the most timid females were not afraid to venture alone and at night in a small skiff, with which almost every family of respectability was provided; and on a bright moonlight night, the bosom of the river was beautifully diversified by the white sails glittering in the moonbeams, while sweet female voices would be heard warbling some popular melodies, the subjects of which were usually the praises of Prince Edward, or execrations of Spenser and those who had corrupted the King. It was on such a night, that the incident with which our narrative commences occurred. The moon was riding in an unclouded sky—unclouded except by those light fleecy vapours which hovered round the form of the queen of night, increasing rather than diminishing her beauty. The river seemed one sheet of silver, and numerous little vessels passing and repassing, gave it a delightfully animated appearance. In one, which seemed to be venturing nearer to the camp of the enemy than the others, might be seen a light and delicate female form, and on the shore which she was approaching, a little above the village of Northbrigg, stood a soldier, whose accoutrements bespoke him to belong to the army of Sir Hugh Spenser.

The lady landed, and the soldier hastened to meet her. "Dearest Isabel," he said, "blessings upon thy generous trusting heart, for this sweet meeting! I have much to tell thee, but that my tongue dares not utter all with which my mind is stored; and if it dared, it is not on such a night as this, so bright, so beautiful, that tidings dark as mine should be communicated." Isabel, who had laid her head upon his breast when they met, started from him, and gazed with the utmost terror and surprise at the unwonted gloom which darkened his countenance.

"Walter, what means this! Come you to break the trusting heart which beats for you alone! Come you to cancel your vows—to say that we must part forever! Oh! better had you left me to the mercy of the wave, when its work of death was half achieved, if you reserved me only for the misery which waits upon a broken heart, and blighted and betrayed affections?"

"Sweet, dry these tears!" replied the soldier; "while I have life I am thine. I come to warn thee of sure but unseen danger. The walls of Hereford are strong, and the arms and hearts of her citizens firm and trusty; but her hour is come, and the path of the destroyer, although secret, is like the stream which hides itself for a time beneath the earth, only to spring forth more strongly and irresistibly than ever."

"Thy words are dark and dreadful; but I do not know of any cause for fear, or of any means of avoiding it, if it exists."

"Fly with me, fly!—with thy heart and hand reward my love, and think no more of those grim walls, and sullen citizens, with souls as iron as their beavers, and hearts as cold as the waters of their river."

"Oh! no, no, no! my father's head is grey, and but for me alone all his affection, all his hopes are buried in my mother's grave. He hates thee and thy cause. When I told him a stranger had rescued his daughter from the wave, he raised his hands to heaven and blessed him. I told him that that stranger was a follower of the Spensers, he checked his unfinished benediction and cursed him. But if he knew thee, Walter, thy noble heart, thy constant love, methinks that time and entreaty would make him listen to his daughter's prayer."

"Alas! my Isabel, entreaty would be vain, and time is already flapping his wings, loaded with inevitable ruin, over yon devoted city and its inhabitant. Thy father shall be safe—trust that to me; and trust me, too, that what I promise I can perform. But thou, my loved one, thou must not look upon the horrid face of war: and though my power extends to save thy father from injury, it would be easier to save the wall-flowers on the ramparts of the city from the foot of the invader, than one so fair, so feeble, from his violence and lust."

"Whoe'er thou art," she said, "there is a spell upon my heart which love and gratitude have twined, and which makes it thine for ever; but sooner would I lock my hand with that of the savage Spenser himself, when reeking with the best blood of Hereford's citizens, than leave my father's side when his grey hairs are in danger, and my native city, when treachery is in her streets and outrage is approaching her walls."

These words were uttered with an animation and vehemence so unusual to her, that Walter stood for a moment transfixed with wonder: and before he recovered his self-possession, Isabel, with the velocity of lightning, had regained her skiff and was sailing before the wind to Hereford.—"Curse on my amorous folly!" he exclaimed, "that, for a pair of pale cheeks and sparkling eyes, has perhaps ruined a better concerted stratagem than ever entered the brain of the Grecian Sinon. I must away, or the false girl will wake the slumbering citizens to their defence before the deed is done: and yet, must I devote her to the foul grasp of ruffian violence? No, no! my power is equal to save or to destroy." As he uttered these words he rapidly ascended the rocks which skirted that part of the banks of the river on which he stood, and was soon lost among the wild woods that crowned their summit.

We shall not enter into any detailed account of the events of that night. The royalists, by means of an unexpected attack during the truce, and aided by internal treachery, hoped to make themselves masters of the city of Hereford. The citizens, however, had by some unknown means obtained intelligence of the designs of the enemy, and were prepared to repel their attacks. Every street was lined with soldiers, and a band of the bravest and most determined, under the command of Eustace de Chandos, (Isabel's father,) manned the city walls. The struggle was short but sanguinary—the invaders were beaten back at every point, their best troops were left dead in the trenches, and above two hundred prisoners (among whom was Sir Hugh Spenser himself) fell into the hands of the citizens. The successful party set no bounds either to their exultation or their revenge. The rejoicings were continued for three successive days; the neighbouring country was ravaged without cessation and without remorse; and all the prisoners were ordered, by a message to that effect received from Queen Isabella, to be treated as felons, and hanged in the most public places in the city. This decree was rigorously and unrelentingly executed. The royalist soldiers, without any distinction as to rank or character, suffered the ignominious punishments to which they were condemned, and the streets of Hereford were blocked up by gibbets, which the most timid and merciful of its inhabitants gazed upon with satisfaction and triumph.

Sir Hugh Spenser, both on account of his rank and of the peculiar degree of hatred with which each bosom beat against him, was reserved to be the last victim. On the day of his execution the streets were lined with spectators, and the principal families in the city occupied stations round the scaffold. So great was the universal joy at having their enemy in their power, that even the wives and daughters of the most distinguished citizens were anxious to view the punishment inflicted upon him whom they considered the grand cause of all the national evils. Isabel was not of this number; but her father sternly compelled her to be a witness of the dismal scene. The hour of noon was fast approaching, and the bell of the cathedral heavily and solemnly tolled the knell of the unfortunate Spenser. The fatal cavalcade approached the place of execution. A stern and solemn triumph gleamed in the eyes of the soldiers as they trod by the side of the victim; but most of the spectators, especially the females, were melted into tears when they beheld the fine manly form of the prisoner, which seemed better fitted to adorn the royal levee, or a lady's bower, than for the melancholy fate to which he was about to be consigned. His head was bare, and his light flaxen hair fell in a rich profusion of locks down his shoulders, but left unshaded his finely proportioned and sunburnt features. He wore the uniform of the royal army, and a star on his breast indicated his rank, while he held in his hand a small ivory cross, which he frequently and fervently kissed. His deportment was firm and contemptuous, and, as he looked on the formal and frequently grotesque figures of his guards, his features even assumed an expression of risibility. The sight of the gibbet, however, which was raised fifty feet high, seemed to appal him, for he had not been apprized of the ignominious nature of his punishment. "And is this," he said, as he scornfully dashed away a tear which had gathered in his eye, "ye rebellious dogs, is this the death to which you doom the heir of Winchester?" A stern and bitter smile played on the lips of his guards, but they remained silent. "Oh God!" he continued, "in the field, or on the wave, or on the block, which has reeked so often with the bravest and noblest blood, I could have died smiling; but this—" His emotion seemed increasing, but with a violent effort he suppressed every outward sign of it; for the visible satisfaction which gleamed on the dark faces around him, at the state of weakness to which they had reduced the proud heart of their foe, was more galling to his soul than the shameful death to which he was devoted.

By the time he reached the place of execution his face had resumed its calm and scornful air, and he sprang upon the scaffold with apparently unconcerned alacrity. At the same moment a dreadful shriek issued from that part of the surrounding booths in which the family of Chandos sat; and in another instant a female, deadly pale, and with her hair and dress disordered, had darted on to the scaffold, and clasped the prisoner in her arms.

"Walter!" she cried, "Walter! can it be thou! oh! they dare not take thy life: thou bravest, best of men! Avaunt, ye bloodthirsty brood! ye can not tear me from him. No! till my arms grow cold in death I'll clasp him thus, and defy the world to sever us!"

"Oh! Isabel!" he said, "it is too much; my soul can bear no more. I hoped thy eyes had been spared this sight—but the cold tyrants have decreed it thus: oh! leave me, leave me!—it is in vain—unmannered ruffians, spare her!" While he spoke, the soldiers forcibly tore her from him; and dragging her through the crowd—"My father! save him! he saved thy child. Walter! supplicate him—he is kind." She turned her eyes to the scaffold as she uttered these words, and beheld the form of Spenser writhing in the air, and convulsed with the last mortal agony. A fearful shriek burst from her heart, and she sank senseless in the arms of those who bore her.

Isabel survived this event more than a twelvemonth; but her reason had fled and her health was so shattered that final recovery was hopeless. She took scarcely any food, refused all intercourse with her former friends, and even with her father, and would sit silent and motionless for days together. One thing only soothed her mind, or afforded her any gratification; and this, as she was an experienced navigator of the river, her friends indulged her in—to sail from the city of Hereford to that spot on which she used to meet her lover. This she did constantly every evening; but when she landed, and waited a short time, her shrieks and cries were pitiable. This practice one evening proved fatal. Instead of steering to the usual landing-place, a little above the city, she entered a part of the river where the current is unusually strong. The rapidity of its waves mastered and overturned the frail bark in which she sailed, and the unfortunate Isabel sank to rise no more!

The tragick nature of these events made an impression on the popular mind which two centuries did not efface. The spirit of Isabel was still said to sail every night from Hereford to Northbrigg, to meet her lover; and the beach across the river which this unearthly traveller pursued, was long distinguished by the name of the "Spectre's Voyage."

THE REPOSITORY.

THE ADVENTURES OF A RAIN DROP.

[From "The Token."]

When I was first aware of existence, I found myself floating in the clouds, among millions of companions. I was weak and languid, and had indeed fainted entirely away, when a breeze from the north was kind enough to fan me, as it swept along toward the equator. The moment my strength was renewed, I felt an irresistible desire to travel. Thousands of neighbours were eager to join me; and our numerous caravan passed rapidly through immense deserts of air, and landed in the garden of Eden. I fell on a white rose bush, which Adam was twining around the arbour where Eve was sitting; while she thanked him with her smiles, and shook my companions from the clusters of grapes she had plucked for him. I shall never forget the sounds she uttered! Mankind must have lost the knowledge of them now, for I never heard such tones; though in a few instances, where childhood has been gifted with a rich, melodious voice, and I have heard it poured forth in careless happiness, it has seemed to me like the language of paradise.

As it was a cloudy day, and the sun did not appear, I slipped from a rose leaf to the bottom of a superb arum, and went quietly to sleep. When I awoke, the sun was bright in the heavens, and birds were singing, and insects buzzing joyfully. A saucy humming bird was looking down upon me, thinking, no doubt, that he would drink me up; but a nightingale and scarlet dory both chanced to alight near him, and the flower was weighed down, so that I fell to the ground. Immediately, I felt myself drawn up, as if very small cords were fastened to me. It was the power of the sun, which forced me higher and higher till I found myself in the clouds, in the same weak, misty state as before. Here I floated about, until a cold wind drove me into the Danube. The moment I entered this river, I was pushed forward by such a crowd of water drops, that, before I knew whither I was bound, I found myself at the bottom of the Black Sea. An oyster soon drew me into his shell, where I tumbled over a pearl, large and beautiful enough to grace the snowy neck of Eve. I was well pleased with my situation, and should have remained a long time, had it been in my power; but an enormous whale came into our vicinity, and the poor oyster was rolled down his throat with a mighty company of waves. I escaped from my pearl prison, and the next day the great fish threw me from his nostrils, in a cataract of foam. Many were the rivers, seas, and lakes, I visited. Sometimes I rode through the Pacific on a dolphin's back; and, at others, I slept sweetly under the shade of fan coral, in the Persian Gulf. One week, I was a dew drop on the roses of Cashmere; and another, I moistened the stunted moss on the cold Norwegian rocks. Years passed away before I again reposed on the banks of the Euphrates. When I did, Adam was banished from Eden. Many a time have I clung to the willows, and looked in pity on the godlike exile, as he toiled in the fields, with his children around him; and, when he sought the shade, again and again have I leaped down to cool his feverish brow. Pleasant as I found this benevolent office, I delighted still more to nestle among the pretty yellow ringlets of the infant Abel, and shine there, like a diamond on the surface of golden waves. Alas, it is anguish to remember how I kissed his silken eyelash, when he lay stretched in death, under the cruel hand of Cain!

Time rolled slowly on, and the world grew more wicked. I lived almost entirely in the clouds, or on the flowers; for mankind could offer no couch fit for the repose of innocence, the babe's sinless lip. At last excessive vice demanded punishment. The Almighty sent it in the form of rain; and, in forty days, the fair earth was overwhelmed. I was permitted to remain in the foggy atmosphere; and, when the deluge ceased, I found myself arranged, with a multitude of rain drops, before the blazing pavilion of the sun. His seven-coloured rays were separated in passing through us, and reflected on the opposite quarter of the heavens. Thus I had the honour to assist in forming the first rainbow ever seen by man.

It is now five thousand, eight hundred and twenty-eight years, since I first came into being; and you may well suppose that, were all my adventures detailed, they would fill a ponderous volume. I have traversed the wide world over, and watched its inhabitants through all their infinitude of changes. I have been in tears on the lyre of Sappho when her love-inspired fingers swept across its strings. In the aromatic bath, I have kissed the transparent cheek of proud Aspasia; and I have twinkled on Plato's pale, intellectual brow, when he dreamed his ethereal philosophy in her magic bower. I remained at the bottom of the cup in which Cleopatra dissolved her costly pearl—and I plunged indignantly from the prow of Antony's vessel, when he retired from the fight, and gave the world for beauty. I have been poured forth within the dazzling shrine of Apollo, and mixed with the libations to Bacchus. The Bramin of Hindostan has worshipped me in the sacred stream of the Ganges. With me the Druid has quenched his sacrifice; the Roman Pontiff signed the sacred emblem of the cross, and the Levite made clean his hands before he entered within the sanctuary. The princely Archbishops of England have taken me from magnificent baptismal fonts; and, in the wild glens of Scotland, the persecuted covenanters have sprinkled me on many a guiltless head. I have jumped from the banyan tree on the back of a Hindoo god, and glittered on the marble cheeks of deities in Athens. I have trembled on the Turkish crescent; slept on the Russian cross; died on the Chinese pagoda; and awakened between the Persian and the sun he adores. Warm climates have ever been my favourites; for there I was often in heaven, in a state of melting, delicious languor; and my visitations to earth were ever among the beautiful and the brilliant. For one hundred years I was doomed to reluctant drudgery in the cold regions of the north; during which my soul was sent forth from the gypsy kettles, over the Geysers of Iceland, and embodied again to freeze the head of the Kamshadale to his bear-skin pillow. I could tell wonders to Captain Parry, and absolutely craze Symmes with my discoveries. I could, if I chose, make known to hardy adventurers, who have risked life and limb to ascertain it, whether or not wild geese summer at the pole; but the giant king of the glaciers has forbidden me to reveal many things, which it is not expedient for the world to know at present. I dare not disobey him, for he once enchained me in the dreary chambers of an ice mountain, forty long years; and, had not the huge mass been seized with the modern spirit of enterprise, and moved southward, I might never have regained my liberty. The first use I made of freedom was to revisit those scenes I had enjoyed so much, when men were comparatively strangers on earth. I sought repose, after my wearisome journey, in the holy stream of Jordan; but scarcely had the waves given me their welcome embrace, ere the celebrated Chateaubriand conveyed me from thence to France, to perform my part in the august baptism of the infant "king of Rome." For such an office I was willing to leave my beloved Palestine, for seldom have I rested on a boy of loftier promise, or more cherub loveliness; but I liked not the service in which the crafty politician employed me, a few years after. It shames me to tell that the water sprinkled on the son of Buonaparte, aided to prepare the vile pages of "Le Roi est mort—Vive le Roi!" with which the capricious Frenchmen afterwards welcomed the tenth Charles of Bourbon. Disgusted with the servile race of courtiers, I hastened to England, in hopes of finding an aristocracy too proud, in their long inherited greatness, to sue for favour of a never satisfied multitude, or to triumph over them with all the vulgar superciliousness of newly acquired power. Few, very few, such I found; for true nobility of soul is rare; but many a glorious exploit was achieved by me in that favoured land of intelligence and freedom. Once, while hovering listlessly in air, I aided in forming the rainbow which Campbell has immortalized in such splendid verse; and the next day, Wordsworth apostrophized me, as I lay quivering on the edge of his favourite daisy. I moistened some of the pages of Scott, before they were wet with the world's tears; and I trickled from the point of Mrs. Hemans' pen, when her eloquent spirit held communion with Tasso. I have evaporated on the burning page of Byron, and sparkled on the spangled lines of Moore.

It would take too long a time to detail all the services I rendered the great, the gifted and the fair, during my residence in the "fast-anchored isle." Suffice it to say, with all its advantages, I found much to displease me; and I was anxious to visit a new republic, which I had heard of "beyond the ocean, where laws are just, and men are happy." This land, too, has its evils; but I love it better than any spot I have seen in all my wanderings. Niagara has thrown me forth in spray; and, frozen on its rugged cliffs, I have seemed "like a giant's starting tear." I have streamed from the Indian oar into the mighty rivers of the West, and slumbered in the cold, blue depth of Canadian lakes. I frolicked in the joyous little stream which Aunt Deborah Lenox praised so sensibly, and I formed a part of the "Rivulet," which brought back the happy dream of childhood to the soul of Bryant; that soul, on whose waveless mirror, nature is ever reflected in a placid smile, all radiant with poetry.

But, in good truth, I have had little leisure for recreations like these; for rain drops, as well as every thing else, are pressed into full employment, in this land of business; I have laboured hard in mills, manufactories, and distilleries; and died a thousand deaths in pushing forward the swift sailing boats on the Hudson and Mississippi. A few months since, I rose from the water-works of Philadelphia, and soon hovered over the Boston Athenæum; I happened to alight on the head of a poet, who was just quitting the gallery, and was scorched to a vapour in an instant. I descended just in time for a Frenchman to mix me with the "eau de miel," which he was pouring into an elegant cut glass vial. A fashionable fop, who considered perfume "the sovereign'st thing on earth," presented me to a celebrated belle; I shall probably die on the corner of her embroidered handkerchief; but for me to die, is only to exist again—of course, my adventures will be as long as the world's history.

BIOGRAPHY.

M. AGNESI.

Maria Cajetana Agnesi, an Italian lady of great learning, was born at Milan, on the 16th March, 1718. Her inclinations from her earliest youth led her to the study of science, and at an age when young persons of her sex attend only to frivolous pursuits, she had made such astonishing progress in mathematics, that when in 1750 her father, professor in the university at Bologna, was unable to continue his lectures from infirm health, she obtained permission from the pope Benedict XIV. to fill his chair. Before this, at the early age of nineteen, she had supported one hundred and ninety-one theses, which were published in 1738, under the title "Propositiones Philosophicæ." She was also mistress of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, German, and Spanish. At length she gave up her studies, and went into the monastery of the Blue Nuns, at Milan, where she died on the 9th of January, 1799. In 1740 she published a discourse tending to prove, "that the study of the liberal arts is not incompatible with the understandings of women." This she had written when scarcely nine years old. Her "Instituzioni Analitiche," in 1748, in 2 vols. 4to. were translated in part by Antelmy, with the notes of M. Bossut, under the title of "Traites Elementaires du Calcul differentiel et du Calcul integral," in 1775, in one vol. 8vo. and into English by that eminent judge of mathematical learning, the late Rev. John Colson, M.A. F.R.S. and Lucasian Professor of Mathematics in the university of Cambridge. This learned and ingenious man, who had translated Sir Isaac Newton's Fluxions, with a comment, in 1736, and was well acquainted with what appeared on the same subject, in the course of fourteen years afterward, in the writings of Emerson, Maclaurin, and Simpson, found, after all, the analytical institutions of Agnesi to be so excellent, that he learned the Italian language, at an advanced age, for the sole purpose of translating that work into English, and at his death left the manuscript nearly prepared for the press. In this state it remained for some years, until the late Baron Maseres, with his usual liberal and active spirit, resolved to defray the whole expense of printing a handsome edition, in 2 vols. 4to., which was published in 1801, and was superintended in press by the Rev. John Hellins, B.D. F.R.S. vicar of Potter's-pury, in Northamptonshire. Her éloge was pronounced by Frisi, and translated into French by Boulard.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1828.

Our thanks are due to a friend in New-York, for a file of London papers to the 26th December inclusive.

Post masters and secretaries of chapters and lodges, are requested to act as agents for the Record and Magazine.

The address by Br. B. F. Hunt, has been on our files for some time. It shall appear as soon as possible.

A communication from Caledonia county, Vermont, shall have a place in our next number.

The proceedings of the several masonick bodies, showing their respect to the memory of their companion and brother DE WITT CLINTON, may be taken as a proof of the great loss sustained in his death. Several demonstrations of such respect may be seen on our second page, in the resolutions of the various lodges, chapters and encampments. Others which we have received shall appear as soon as our convenience will allow.

COMMON SCHOOLS. The annual report of the superintendent of common schools, made to the legislature of this state on the 29th ult. presents a truly encouraging view of our literary prosperity. At the time the report was presented, only one town in the whole state was delinquent in the regular returns from the commissioners of common schools, but since that time the return from that town has been received, making the list complete, for the first time since the establishment of the common school fund. In 1822, twenty-seven towns were delinquent; 1823, twenty-one; 1824, twenty-nine; 1825, seventeen; 1826, fourteen; and 1827, two towns. The whole number of towns and wards, from which returns are required by law is 742. Of 8298 school districts, 7303 have been legally returned. During the year 1827, the new districts which have been organized are 179. The general average of instruction in the whole number of districts returned is about eight months, and 441,356 children have been taught in these districts during the year. The number of children between the ages of five and fifteen is 419,216. The number of children taught in common schools, (the city of New-York excepted,) has increased since the last annual report 10,255. By this report we learn that the number of children taught in common schools has trebled in eleven years. Since that time nearly one million of dollars has been paid out of the state treasury for the support of common schools, and about the same amount raised by the several towns in which the schools are established. The remainder of the funds necessary to support schools has been raised by the districts in their separate capacity, which at a rough estimate cannot be less than five millions of dollars. Add to this the probable expense of erecting school houses, furnishing repairs, fuel, &c. which may be safely calculated to exceed another million, and our schools shall have cost the respectable sum of eight millions of dollars in eleven years. The founders of this stupendous policy can now look on their work with satisfaction, as having been productive of some benefit to the state; and yet we can with justice say that the great work is but begun. True, the result of a system so extensive, and so sure in its progress, may be called gigantic; but what is it to be compared with what we know must be its strength, when the policy which extend to every corner of the state, and the funds, which are perpetually increasing, shall be adequate to meet the entire expense, without calling directly upon the people for the means of support.

INDIAN LEGAL DISCIPLINE. The Port Gibson, (Mississippi) Correspondent informs us that an example of Indian punishment took place, not long since, in the vicinity of that town, which sets the Indian character in a rather clearer point of view than often happens, in their present state of civil economy. An Indian, when under the charge of murder is generally too proud to seek safety by flight. Did he do it, the punishment of his crime would only fall on his nearest of kin, and the ties of blood are held inviolable by them. Death is the only atonement to be made among the highly honourable; and as the process of law in such cases is only a sort of family concern, the murderer is usually executed by his more particular friends, to avoid the ignominy of falling by the hands of his personal enemies. Sometimes, however, among the baser grades, the punishment may be bought off; but such compromises are looked upon by the respectable, with contempt.

The case here spoken of, was that of a young man, who, being in a drunken frolic, happened to get into an affray, in which he killed his antagonist. The following morning, he was taken by his friends about a mile from the town, and shot. The executioner was a valued friend of the murderer, and was probably selected by him to do this last of all friendly offices. But it seems the effusion of blood does not end here. A brother of the murdered Indian has since arrived, who says he is not satisfied—and that his sisters are not satisfied, because there was another who participated in the crime. The laws of the Indians, however, will not suffer any further than strictly life for life, and the surviving brother challenges the participator in the murder to single combat with rifles. The day was appointed, the challenger came, but the other did not. This does not alter the case, for the surviving brother has declared himself the avenger of the murder, and both he and the participator in it must inevitably die. If they meet in fair combat, the laws of the Indians will not like those of the whites, suffer the successful combatant to escape the punishment of blood. The surviving brother, therefore, engaged in the pursuit of vengeance with certain death before him; and such is the affection of sisters among these darkened children of nature, as to sacrifice a beloved brother, with no other possible advantage to either their honour or their happiness, than the death of an insignificant enemy.

LITERARY NOTICES.

We have on our table the annual reports of the Central Asylum, and the New-York Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, as presented to the legislature; the former the 25th of January, and the latter the 5th of February. The report of the Central Asylum contains some curious specimens of composition by the pupils, which discover the utility of such institutions in a striking light; but what adds more to the interest of this particular report, is the fact that the types were set by Levi S. Backus, principal of the asylum, also deaf and dumb. Mr. Backus, if we recollect aright, has also a wife deaf and dumb, and an assistant to him in his labours.

The report of the New-York institution is an able document, and gives an encouraging statement of their prospects. It is a proud era for humanity, when such extensive plans are going on to meliorate the condition of this depraved part of our species.

We have received the Yankee, a new hebdomadal quarto, published at Portland, Maine, under the editorial charge of John Neal. Much has been said of Mr. Neal, as a bitter and intolerant critick upon American manners and learning; but if the columns of the Yankee are to be assumed for a criterion of his liberality of principle, we have no hesitation in classing him with the finest friends of America and her literary institutions. The Yankee is neatly printed, and well filled with interesting matter, chiefly original; and, what can be said of few, it is a sheet that we can sit down and read through without becoming fatigued.

The contents of the January number of Flint's Western Monthly Review are,—Mississippi River; Birds of the Mississippi Valley; The Miseries of Authorship; The Being of a God; The New Year; Review of Biography—

Declaration of Independence; Harrison's Narrative; Simms' Poems; Greenwood's Sermon; and Hilliard's Address.

§ The contents of the December number of the Western Medical and Physical Journal, are:—Remarks on the Use of Emetics, in the first stage of Malignant or Congestive Bilious Fever; during the months of August, September, October, and November; Observations on the Minor Epidemics of Marietta, in the year 1824; An account of the Cynanche Maligna, as it has appeared in Paris, Kentucky, and its vicinity, at different times since 1821; Notices of some Anomalous Cases of Dropsy; Remarks on the Spontaneous Suppression of Hemorrhage in cases of Divided and wounded Arteries;—REVIEW:—Pathological Anatomy; the last course of Xavier Bichat, &c.; INTELLIGENCE and NOTICES:—Alcoholic Extract of Nux Vomica in Rheumatic Paralysis, and in the incontinence of Urine in Children; Camphire in rheumatism; Fatal Case of Dyspepsia.

§ The Manuscript, Number 8, for February, is now on our table. The contents are Conversations with Thomas Paine. We again commend this elegant periodical to the notice of all lovers of chaste, moral and polite reading. The present number cannot fail of pleasing all who may have the good fortune to peruse it.

FREEDOM OF ORIGIN. At a convention of delegates from several Baptist churches, held at Le Roy, sometime in January last, it was

Resolved, that all such members as belong to the Baptist church, and who also belong to the society of freemasons, be requested to renounce publicly all communication with that order, and if the request is not complied with in a reasonable time, to EXCOMMUNICATE all those who neglect or refuse to do so.

We offer no other remark on a measure so repugnant to that liberty of conscience which pure religion inculcates, but to submit our belief that the above resolution is far from expressing the feelings of the whole Baptist church. That numerous and respectable portion of the Christian church will not consent as a body to go all lengths with a faction that aims so apparently at a union of church and state.

§ The anniversary of the birth day of the immortal WASHINGTON was yesterday very appropriately noticed by our citizens, and the members of both houses of the legislature. The bells were rung at sunrise accompanied with the discharge of artillery; the military were out in their usual spirited style of appearance, and the day was much more pleasant than we had any reason to expect. The procession moved at 11 o'clock to the 3d Presbyterian Church in Montgomery-street, where among other appropriate ceremonies, an oration was pronounced by James Edwards, esq. The observance of this day does honour to the patriotism of our citizens. It is a day which, next to the fourth of July, ought to be held most sacred of the calendar by every American. To the honour of our citizens it seldom passes us without some manifestation of their regard.

NEWS AND TRIMMINGS.

At a late term of the court of sessions for the county of Kennebeck, Maine, it was ordered that the jail liberties be so extended as to embrace the whole county. This is probably a ruse to encourage an increase of population; for who would not live forever, if he could, in a county where the debtor's pasture is so spacious?—A gentleman of Northampton, Mass. has invented a mill for grinding pepper, coffee, &c. by squirrel power.—The cotton factory at Hookset, New-Hampshire, owned by Mr. John Bell and others, came near being burnt by the spontaneous combustion of the scrapings, thrown together into a reservoir; the flue of the reservoir having been obstructed. One side of the building was started, and the floors settled before the combustion was discovered. In another factory, a lamp which had been trimmed for evening use and the wick wet with spirits of turpentine, lighted itself, at noon day, to the no small astonishment of the labourers in the room.—A woman in the state of Delaware, a few days since, having put her hand through an opening in the fence to rescue a chicken from the grasp of a hawk which had seized it, was turned upon by the hawk, who fastened upon her hand with his talons, and would not leave his hold until she had beheaded him with an axe brought to her by a little child. The bird measured four feet from the tip of one wing to the other.

—Nor long ago, a stage-driver in Berkshire county, Mass. procured a pair of shoes of one of those workmen who do their work rather upon honour than the last, or perhaps had a last or two, to which he had given the appellative name of honour, and having put them on just as he was setting out on his fifteen mile rout, the soles dropped off by the jolting of the carriage, before he arrived at the end of it. Upon this the driver brought his action against the aforesaid cordiner for damages. The honour-able defendant, however, brought evidence to prove that it was the driver's fault that the soles dropped off,—not having kept his understanding firmly on the foot board of the box, whereby the said soles would have kept snugly in their places, but wickedly and maliciously holding up his feet, whereby the pegs were shaken from the shoes, and accordingly the soles dropped off. We have not yet heard the decision of the court upon this highly important and novel case in jurisprudence.

At a late fancy ball in Liverpool, a gentleman who had taken upon himself, for the time being, the swarthy hue of a 'nigger,' was requested to sing Mathews' song, "Possum up a gum tree." "Non possum," replied the merry wag.—Not far from the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, there lives a man, whose spouse one day got into a pet, and refused to speak for eight or ten days!! [Now this looks rather incredible in the outset; but we give the story in the words of the Cincinnati Parthenon, which we would as readily believe as if we had told it our veracious selves,—and said paper repeats bona fide the assertion that she actually held her tongue all the aforesaid time! so, old bachelors, good manners ought to silence all further doubt.] Well, the husband, poor fellow, although her silence sometimes used to be most "devoutly wished for," longed to hear again, the clapper of that little belle, that sometimes made his ears tingle; he had exhausted his vocabulary of honied words and coaxings; she was inexorable. At last he hit upon an expedient that "brought her to her speech again;" she was very neat and tidy about her furniture and apparel. He stepped into another room, opened a bureau, and commenced throwing the contents on the floor. She came in when he had nearly completed his work of tumbling out silks, laces, linens and kerchiefs, and without thinking of her predisposition to taciturnity, cried out,—"Mercy! what in the world are you doing?" "Nothing," replied the husband, calmly, "only looking for my wife's tongue, which I have found at the bottom of these drawers."

FOREIGN. We learn by the latest arrivals that the Russian troops, now on the Turkish frontier, are commanded by Count Witgenstein, so well known in the time of Bonaparte's invasion. They were ready at our last dates to cross the Pruth at a moment's warning: Russia has concluded a peace with Persia, much to her advantage. The Persians are to pay the whole expenses of the war. In Spain, it is said, that the insurrection in Catalonia was far from being ended. It is pretty well authenticated that the ambassadors of the three powers had left Constantinople, but no official confirmation had been received. Their departure has all along been looked upon as virtually a declaration of war on the part of the Porte. For this reason, probably, he has given them no passports, hoping to profit by the delay which would be likely to follow their hesitation about departing without them. The next arrival must be heavy with the fate of Greece. There appears now no practicable medium through which to look for peace.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Saturday, Feb. 16. In senate, Mr. Spencer, from the select committee appointed to report to the senate whether an election of president of the senate was necessary, reported in the affirmative and offered a resolution, that the senate immediately proceed to the election, which, after some debate, was adopted, and the hon. PETER R. LIVINGSTON was duly chosen temporary president. Bills read a third time and passed: for the relief of the collector of taxes for the town of Bethlehem, in the county of Albany; to confirm the election of justices in the town of Wilson, in the county of Niagara; to correct an error in the assessment list of the fourth ward of the city of Albany.

In assembly, a return was received from the Mechanick's and Farmer's bank, of Albany, also from the Ontario bank; ordered printed. The bill from the senate providing for the expenses attending the funeral obsequies of DE WITT CLINTON, was passed by the house.

Monday, Feb. 18. In senate, on motion of Mr. Waterman it was resolved, that the commissioners of the canal fund report to the senate, what sums of money have been expended from said fund, for the construction of side cuts, and other works not forming part of the Erie and Champlain canals, specifying the objects to which the several appropriations have been applied; and that they further report whether any and what part of said fund has been applied to the construction of the Oswego and Seneca canals. The senate took up the following rule proposed by Mr. Spencer on Saturday, that "the temporary president of the senate has the right of voting in all cases; and when the senate shall be equally divided including his vote, the question shall be lost." Adopted. Bills read a third time and passed: to alter the time of holding town meetings in the town of Clay, Onondaga county; to alter the same in the town of Truxton, Cortland county; to incorporate the Otisville turnpike company; relative to the common school fund in the town of Edmeston, Otsego county; to settle the claims of John Saragant. The president pro tem. was discharged from the duties of the several committees.

In assembly, resolved, that the comptroller report to this house what length of time DE WITT CLINTON late governor of this state, acted as canal commissioner, and the amount of money received by him as a compensation for his services as such commissioner; and what was the highest compensation allowed to any other commissioner during the same time. Returns were received from the banks at Auburn and Cherry Valley. Ordered printed. The lieutenant governor, acting as governor of the state, transmitted two bills passed by the legislature, which he had approved and signed; also the annual report of New-York Hospital.

Tuesday, Feb. 19. In senate, a message was received from the lieutenant governor of the state, acting as governor, transmitting a resolution of the legislature of the state of Georgia. The resolution is accompanied by a long report of a committee, denying the constitutional right of congress, which is now claimed and exercised, to legislate on the subjects of encouraging domestic manufactures, and of internal improvement. Laid on the table.

In assembly, returns were received from the bank of Troy, the New-York State bank, and the Farmer's bank, Troy, which were severally ordered printed. Mr. Granger stated that he was instructed by the canal committee to offer the following resolution: Resolved, that that part of the governor's message relative to the western termination of the Erie canal, and the memorial of the Black Rock harbour company, presented with the annual report of the canal commissioners, be referred to the canal board, and that they be requested to report to this house, the present state and condition of that work; and also to report their opinion as to the course which public policy requires should be pursued in relation to the present condition of said harbour and the contracts relating to the same. Read and adopted.

Wednesday, Feb. 20. In senate, the following bills were read a third time and passed, concerning sales of real estate upon executions made by Stephen W. Hughes, the late sheriff of Cayuga county; to rebuild the lock and waste wrier at Rome.

In assembly, Mr. Bucklin offered for consideration the following resolution:—Resolved that the committee on courts of justice be instructed to bring in a bill providing compensation for grand and petit jurors.

Thursday, Feb. 21. In senate, bills read a third time and passed: for the relief of Lowville Academy; concerning the gospel and school lands in the town of Sandford, in the county of Broome; to incorporate the Cayuga lake and inlet steam-boat company; in relation to the ferry across Cayuga lake from Grigg's Port in the town of Ledyard, to Romulus; authorizing Jonathan Hubbard to continue a dam across the Onondaga branch of the Chenango river; to amend the act authorizing William Johnston of Cape Vincent to keep a ferry across the south branch of the St. Lawrence river; to confirm the election of justices in the town of Hinsdale in Cattaraugus county; to authorize Robert Covell to erect a dam across the south branch of the Chemung river; to authorize Stephen Tuttle to erect a dam across the Chemung river; for the relief of the president directors and company of the Cossackie turnpike road. A motion was made that the senate adjourn to meet again on Saturday morning, to-morrow being the anniversary of Washington's birth day, and it prevailed, ayes 14, noes 11.

In assembly, Mr. Brasher offered for consideration the following resolution: Whereas great complaints are made relative to the delay in the administration of justice in the city of New-York, and for the purpose of providing a remedy therefor, a bill has been introduced into this house as to the efficacy of which great doubts are entertained: therefore, Resolved, that the committee on grievances inquire into the cause of the alleged delays in the administration of justice, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers; which being read, was on his motion laid on the table. The bill authorizing the supervisors of Jefferson county to levy a tax for the repair of the lower bridge in Watertown, was read a third time and passed.

THE MAIDEN'S PLEDGE.

Go, ringlet, go—pledge of my heart,
To him the pledge of love who seeks—
Tell him an emblem true thou art
Of her from whom this ringlet speaks.

Tell him to hold it in a beam
Warm from the sun at noonday bright,
Beneath the genial ray 't will gleam
With corruscations of delight.

But should no kindly sun beam play
Upon this severed lock of hair,
In beamless solitude 't will lay,
Although the power be there.

Go, ringlet, go—to him whose heart
With love beams warm will ever glow;
Go, ringlet, go—and, as we part,
My heart responds—"Go, ringlet, go."

Go, ringlet, go—this pledge I make
I will confess at truth's blest shrine,
When we the holy vows shall take,
And thus redeem this pledge of mine!

TO MARGARET.

BY JOHN BOWLING.

And is it thus,—and is it thus
We're doomed thy sainted form to see?
Oh, desolating thought for us!
Oh, sweet and blessed sleep for thee!
Thy heart is still!—but ours are torn!
Thou art in heaven!—but we forlorn!

Thy virtues, like a crown of light,
Beamed in full glory round thy head;
We never deemed a thing so bright
Could die so soon;—and thou art dead!
Thou dead!—and we are left alone,
In overpowering grief to groan.

And whither, whither shall we turn
From sorrow that has pierced us through?
We meet with none but those who mourn,
And vainly ask for comfort too:
We weep—they weep—but hearts that bleed
Far other consolation need!

Angel! where from thy throne above,
Thou lookest upon thy cell below,
'T would break thy bliss,—'t would wound thy love,
To see us thus desponding;—no!
We'll bear it all,—as 'neath thine eye
That now regards us from the sky.

And if some bursting tear should stray
Down our pale cheek,—some struggling sigh
Break forth, we'll wipe that tear away,
That sigh subdued,—and smilingly
Look up to heaven, and feel we share
The bliss unutterable there!

Thou gentle spirit!—in thy course
There were no rocks, no ruggedness,
Nor strife, nor sorrow, nor remorse;
But all was pleasantness and peace,
For all was calmest virtue!—Thou
Ne'er gavest one heart a grief till now.

Not long ago thy blue eyes met
The fading sun when evening spread
Its lines of light;—he never set
More calmly than upon thy bed
Of death,—as waning when the even
Waned thy young spirit flew to heaven.

The autumnal flowers look smiling on,—
There's life and joy in field and wood;
Yet she who waked their smiles is gone;—
We wander forth in solitude.
Mock not our woes, sweet flowers, but share
And sympathize with our despair!

Despair!—oh, no! 'tis thoughtless, vain;
On every field, and flower, and tree,

We'll trace that lovely smile again,
Which beamed upon them, saint! from thee:
Yes! stars, and flowers, and all that's fair
Thine image holds—thy name shall bear.

Some star that's brighter than the rest,
Some flower whose fragrance never dies,
Shall blend them with thy memory blest,
Shall consecrate thy obsequies;
And hourly as we think of thee,
These shall thy sweet memorial be.

FROM THE BOSTON STATESMAN.

THE SPIRIT OF THE WINDS.

Thou actor perfect in all tragick sound!
Thou mighty poet e'en to phrenzy bold!

COLERIDGE.

O viewless spirit! well mayst thou
Thy harp of power sweep lightly now,
Since not a cloud thy breath has driven
Along the calm and starry heaven;—
And quiet moonshine, pale and chill
Is slumbering now on heath and hill.

Wild spirit of the chainless breeze!
Thy course is on the trackless seas;
Thou startest from their treacherous sleep
The surges of the mighty deep;
And bendeest from thy clouded throne
To smile on ruin, all thine own.

In peace or wrath thou visitest
The desert's dark and sterile breast;—
The mountain eagle's cold abode
Where mortal foot hath never trod;
And e'en the forest owns thy sway
Whose oaks with age alone decay.

Unrivalled minstrel! soft and low
On nature's harp thou breathest now;
Faint steals thy music on the ear
A sound which love itself might hear—
A melody in mercy given
To lift the lowly thought to heaven.

I love thy music—harper wild!
I've loved it from a very child,
Whether as now its cadence stole
Like angel whisperings on my soul;
Or roused to murmurs, wild and strong,
The tempest bore its tones along.

Thou art mighty—but that might was lent
Which wakes to sound thy element.
The over-ruling power that rides
The strong-winged hurricane, and guides
The tempests on the chainless sea,—
That power alone commissioned thee.

SADDLED AND BRIDLED.

BY ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

Saddled, and bridled,
And booted was he,—
A plume at his helmet,
A sword at his knee:—
Toom hame came the saddle
At evening to me,
And hame came the steed—
But hame never came he!

Down came his grey father,
Sobbing fu' sair;
Down came his auld mither,
Tearing her hair;
Down came his sweet wife,
Wi' her bonnie bairns three—
Ane at her bosom,
And twa at her knee!

There stood his fleet steed,
All foaming and hot:
There shrieked his sweet wife,
And sank on the spot,—
There stood his grey father,
Weeping fu' free,
For hame came his steed,
But hame never came he!

TO A LADY.

FROM THE MEMORIAL.

The night breeze steals across the lake,
And curls among the green wood bowers
As soft as though it feared to break
The slumbers of the dreaming flowers.

So, lady, may my gentle song
Glide o'er the couch of thy repose,
And whisper, as it steals along,
The tale thy heart already knows.

I would not that one thought of me
Should mar the music of thy heart,—
And yet it were most sweet to be Loved and remembered as thou art!

I may but breathe,—I must not tell,
Save to the listening ear of night,—
The thoughts that in this bosom dwell,
Yet dare not venture into light.

It was the resting place of all
The griefs ambition knows too well:—
Thy smile illum'd the darkened hall,
Thy song dissolv'd the enchanter's spell.

If spirits, pure as those who need
Around the throne of light above,
The power of beauty's spell could feel,
And lose a heaven for woman's love,—

What marvel that a heart like mine
Enraptured by thy charms should be?
Forget to bend at glory's shrine,
And lose itself—ay, heaven—for thee!

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to the late firm of R. STARR & Co. in the above Foundry, continue to execute orders for Plain and Ornamental Type, Brass Rule, and Metal Cuts. Also, for Presses and Ink, Chases, composing Sticks, Cases and Stands, Galleys, and printing materials of every description, at short notice, and on terms as liberal as those of other Foundries.

Many new articles have been added to this Foundry within the last year—among which are new founts of Small Pica and Bourgeois. Also, Small Pica, Brevier and Minion full face capitals for captions, and full face two-line letter of all the different sizes from Pica to Pearl. Likewise Canon, Double Great Primer, Double Pica, Great Primer and Pica Antiques, with lower case to each, and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil antique capitals. Also, many elegant Borders and Newspaper Ornaments, none of which are stereotyped from wood cuts or type, as is usual at most other foundries, but all are cast on steel and cut in copper matrices, and are warranted to work clear. Printers will at once perceive the superiority of those cast in copper matrices, the lines not being filled up and the edges rounded, as is the case with those stereotyped. The large job letter and cuts are all cast in moulds and matrices, on metal bodies, and with the exactness of the smaller type.

Have also cut a new and very beautiful English Script, on inclined body, orders for which can be executed by the first of April. By being cast on inclined body, the face is not exposed as on square body, where most of the letters are kerned; and the mould in which it is cast having a notch or shoulder in the side the type are kept perfectly in line. No expense has been spared, and it is confidently believed, that this Script will be found the most elegant type ever cast in this country, or in Europe.

Type cast at this foundry is warranted equal at least in hardness and durability, to any cast in this country. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the founts regularly put up. It is intended to keep such a supply on hand as to be able to furnish orders without the usual delay. Orders by mail, or left at the Foundry, No. 8, Liberty-street, will receive prompt attention.

MASONICK RECORD.

FOR THE MASONICK RECORD, AND SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

TO THE MEMORY OF

Br. HENRY T. FARMER, M. D.

The minstrel's harp is still
And hangs upon the branch unstrung;
And death hath laid his chill
Forever on the fluent tongue.

The eye itself, that spoke
What lips might strive in vain to tell,
Has sunk in death, and broke
The charm that round his presence fell.

The brethren of his choice
Have buried him beneath the sod,—
There with uplifted voice
Commended his pure soul to God.

And here, an humbler lyre,
An unknown brother dares to sweep
An echo to the choir
Who o'er the silenced minstrel weep.

What though the mountain's height
And thousand rivers roll between,
By every brother's light
A brother's jewels may be seen.

And his, like aught divine
To earthliness a moment given,
Are snatched away to shine,
Set in the diadem of heaven.

G.

We cheerfully give place to the following communication, the author of which, if we do not misunderstand some passages, appears to be a member of the Baptist church. Be that as it may, there is evidence through the whole, that he is one who values highly the privileges and requirements of the gospel, and to whose heart the pure spirit of Christian charity is near and dear; and as such, he comes before his brethren, of all denominations, with no other weapons than the words of divine truth. If it be not an intrusion upon the author or the reader, we would here offer a short and candid question to such professors of religion as conceive masonry to be a sin worthy of excommunication. It is a question of conscience; inasmuch as what a man believes is a part of his conscience. Has not a freemason who is a professor of religion the same right to demand the excommunication of all within his church who are not masons? We think he has a greater right; for in his breast he has a perfect knowledge of their motives as well as his own. His they never can know, and consequently the ability to judge must preponderate in his favour. The mason, however, is taught a better lesson of charity than to account the belief of his brother an unpardonable sin. We believe too that most professing christians, even in the Baptist church, have that charity, and are not to be led away by the politico-religious electioneering of a few leading demagogues, in a region which has become notorious for its nine days' wonders. Such men as composed that convention would make no scruple of building a temple and an altar to the honour of the "martyred Morgan," and appease his manes by the institution of human sacrifices, were there any certainty of bettering their political prospects by the act. The discipline of the Baptist church is strict, very strict, we know: and we shall not be heard to say that it is not judicious in its members to have it so. It is perhaps one of the brightest tokens in its praise. But many of its members are masons, and such members and masons too, as neither society ought to be ashamed of, both for piety and intellect. If these are excommunicated, for no other offence than that of being masons, it will not be the Baptist church that does it, but a spirit of fanaticism, so powerful as to blind the discernment, and wrest the good intents of the whole, to forward the political aggrandizement and base purposes of a few.

EDITOR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MASONICK RECORD.

Sir—I noticed in the National Observer of February 1st, an article, purporting to be minutes of the Genesee Baptist convention, on the subject of freemasonry. Although I was never connected with the fraternity, nor have any means, (excepting those given me by the God of Nature in common with my fellow beings) of judging of the truth of Morgan's publication, yet a few ideas suggest themselves, which I am constrained to offer to the publick, through the medium of your valuable paper. My object is not to vindicate or condemn freemasons or freemasonry, any further than I am compelled to do, from a strict regard to truth, and an ardent desire for the advancement of pure and undefiled religion among mankind.

On reading the article in the Observer, I was almost overcome with surprise at the disgusting and unwarrantable conduct of men, professing godliness, among whom were several who are apparently set as watchmen on the walls of Zion. In their address, they first seem to declare that their object is to guard the purity of the Zion of God. But after a few paragraphs, they proceed to speak of the obligations of masons, the most exceptionable of which in their minds is, I conclude, the one written in capitals,—viz: "And also to vote for office a Royal Arch brother in preference to another man of the same ability." Now this appears evidently designed by the convention for electioneering purposes, rather than to purify the church.

The same paragraph contains the following, "We also add, that we have good reason to believe that Captain William Morgan has been kidnapped and murdered by a large body of masons, and that it has been justified by them generally, and that it is a legitimate consequence of the principles of freemasonry." Now I feel justified in saying that this contains an assertion palpably false; but I hope, for religion's sake, it is not wilfully so. Whatever may be the facts as to the murder of Morgan I am unable to say; but this I am in duty and in justice bound to say,—that freemasons, as far as my acquaintance extends, (which by the way is not very limited,) do as uniformly and decidedly condemn an act of that kind, as any class of citizens whatever; and not only an act of that kind, but any violation of legal or moral order, that may have taken place in relation to that affair.

But the convention go further and say, that they have an "incontestible proof that masonry is an evil." It may be so. But when we examine the constitution of ancient masonry, we are at once convinced that it is founded on the word of God, and is in fact less exceptionable than any other body who are professedly established in the gospel. But that there are unworthy members of this institution, none will pretend to deny, for even among the little twelve of the apostles, was found one that had a devil. And are men more pure and holy now? I trow not. Let these same Baptist churches turn their eyes inward, and examine their own bodies, and then say, if you had your desert, would you not be swept with the besom of destruction, both laity and clergy?

The state of these churches must be deplorable indeed. They have published a certificate, signed by several of their brethren, among whom is at least one of their clergy, saying that the statements of Morgan respecting masonry are true. What shall we say of these men? They have taken the most solemn oaths to keep inviolable the secrets of masonry. Perjured wretches! whether your statement be true or false, you stand convicted in the publick mind, by your own confession, of wilful perjury! And do you still pro-less to be followers of Christ? Do you still presume to break the bread of life to perishing sinners? Do you still keep back from the communion table those who really wear the image of Jesus, because they have not done as you have done! "O tell it not in Gath," lest the enemy of the cross blaspheme!

And what says this convention of those eminent men whose names shed a lustre upon the page of history, and whose virtues will live forever in the memory of their countrymen. A Washington, a Franklin, and a Lafayette,—are they to be denounced as villains and promoters of evil. They were members of the institution which is now denounced as infamous and blasphemous; and also a large proportion of our most pious clergymen, who, to say the least, are as deserving our confidence as the Genesee Baptist convention, or any other persons who acknowledge themselves guilty of perjury.

But the convention have gone further, and "Resolved, that it is the duty of their brethren who are masons, in the presence of the churches to which they respectively belong, to renounce their connexion with the masonick institution and fraternity, and forever cease to meet with, support, or uphold the institution," and in order to enforce the above resolution, they have also, "Resolved, that it is the duty of the churches which have members belonging to the masonick institution, to entreat them in the meekness and gentleness of Christ, to comply with the above resolution; and in case of their utter refusal, to withdraw from them their fellowship." Glorious resolutions! But come, let us reason together. Who told you that it is the duty of your brethren to renounce freemasonry? Was it not Messrs. Miller and Southwick? "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth." And who gave you authority to "lord it over the consciences of men?" Are they not as capable to judge of their duty as you? Now suppose you withdraw your fellowship from your brother, can you withdraw from him the spirit of God? can you make him any less a christian? can you deprive him of communion with his Redeemer? No! For divine truth has said—"he shall be holden up; for God is able to make him stand."

But—"Resolved, that it is inconsistent with the rules of the gospel for any church to receive into its fellowship any man who is a mason, unless he renounce all connexion with freemasonry." Now I ask on what passage of sacred writ is this resolution founded? What does the Bible contain that declares a member of any association whatever, if he be really a child of God by regeneration and baptism, from entering the pale of the visible church? I answer boldly in the fear of God, it contains nothing of the kind. But there is a mistake in the terms, and instead of "the rules of the gospel," they should have said "the intentions of designing men." Why will not this convention honestly state the real object of their meeting, and instead of saying that it is to purify the church, speak truly, and say it is for the purpose of electioneering, and exalting to power, evil minded office-seeking demagogues, who have now no other alternative but to build themselves on the ruins of more deserving men.

That this convention is an electioneering vehicle, is abundantly evident from the mention made of the obligations of masons as it respects elections, which, from its being inserted in capitals, we are at liberty to conclude, lay with the greatest weight on the minds of this pious assembly.—Whether such an obligation does, or does not exist, I am unable to say, but this I say, that I have abundant reason to believe that freemasons knew not of such an obligation, until it was forced upon them by the Genesee Baptist convention. But suppose that such an obligation did exist,—is it in the least exceptionable? Ought not the same charity to exist in all institutions? Will not the members of this same convention "vote to office a Baptist brother in preference to another man of equal abilities?" I ask them in the words of the great apostle to the Gentiles,—“But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother?”

In addressing this Baptist convention, I would ask,—have ye not heard enough of the miseries of the Spanish Inquisition, have ye not, as it were, seen their horrid implements of torture, and heard the dying groans of the wretched beings who have fallen a prey to them? Do you not remember that they too have exerted their power, and all their engines, against the institution of masonry? Why then do you wish to transplant this natural product of Europe into the American soil? Can you expect better success in this land of freedom, whose soil has been enriched by the blood of its defenders, than they experienced under a tyrannical government which they could manage at pleasure? You have woven to yourselves a garment which, if I mistake not, will prove to you as the "giving up of the ghost."

Reflect one moment, and consider if the doing of the convention is the exercise of the "meekness and gentleness of Christ?" Then say, had you not better "cast the beam out of your own eyes," ere you undertake "to pluck the mote out of your brother's eye?" I exhort you seriously to consider on what you are doing, and then after duly examining the matter,—"let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone" at masonry.

To masons I would say,—live to your privileges; purge your institution; lop off decaying branches; dig about and manure your fruitless members; maintain undaunted your course of morality and truth; "let not your good be evil spoken of," nor your institution suffer from the foul intentions of designing men, or the inconsiderate folly of unworthy members; but show yourselves worthy of your vocation, and "peace be with you."

NAKED TRUTH.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

At an emergent meeting of the R. W. Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons for the State of New-York, held at the Grand Lodge Room in the City of New-York, on Tuesday, the 19th day of February, A. L. 5828, the following resolutions were presented and unanimously adopted:—

Whereas this Grand Lodge, duly estimating the great loss which they as Masons have sustained, in union with the great body of their fellow citizens, in the decease of their illustrious Brother and M. W. Past Grand Master, DE WITT CLINTON, therefore

Resolved, that the members of this Grand Lodge do, with their fellow citizens, deeply deplore the loss of a man so highly distinguished for his enlightened, liberal, and philanthropic mind, and whose talents and perseverance have conferred a lasting benefit on his country, which will be to his name, a perpetual monument.

Resolved, that an Oration, commemorative of the virtues and talents of the deceased, be pronounced, and a solemn service performed at the next annual communication of this Grand Lodge.

Resolved, that the officers and member of this Grand Lodge, as a mark of respect to the memory of their deceased P. G. Master, wear a badge of mourning on the left arm for thirty days, and that the Grand Lodge be put in mourning for the period of twelve months, and that the same be recommended to the subordinate lodges.

Resolved, that the foregoing resolutions be communicated to the family of the late M. W. P. G. Master, accompanied by a letter of condolence expressive of the deep sense of sorrow entertained by the members of the fraternity, for the loss of their revered and illustrious Brother.

O. M. LOWNDES, G. Sec'y.

At a regular communication of Cyrus R. A. Chapter, No. 57, held in the city of Schenectady, on the 19th February, 5828, Comp. Giles F. Yates offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

It having pleased the Almighty Disposer of all human events, to cut down in the noontide of his labours and usefulness in this life, our most excellent Companion DE WITT CLINTON, General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of the United States of America, our feelings impel us to perform the duty of offering to his memory, some testimony of our high veneration for his character and talents. Our best offerings are but a feeble tribute to his pre-eminent worth as a citizen, a statesman, a philanthropist and a scholar; and as a true brother of the "mystic tie," who exemplified in his public and private life, the benign principles of our order:—therefore

Resolved, that this Chapter as a portion of that department of the masonic institution of which he was the head, mingle our humble griefs with that deep-toned sentiment of regret, which pervades the whole masonic family in this state, and extends throughout the Union, at this afflictive dispensation of Providence. We always deplore the loss of a great man, who has fully run his career of glory, and departs with declining faculties at the eve of life; but how much greater is the occasion of sorrow for the loss of the illustrious CLINTON, who has been taken from us in "the midst of life" and mental vigour; the sun of whose genius, scarcely at its meridian height, was shining with unobscured and enlightening splendour.

Resolved, that as a token of respect for his memory, this chapter room be dressed in mourning, and that the members of this chapter wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The above proceedings were ordered to be published.

At an extra meeting of St. George's Lodge, No. 8, held at the city of Schenectady, on the 19th February, 5828, it was unanimously

Resolved, that this Lodge cordially concur in the resolutions passed this day by Cyrus R. A. Chapter No. 57, in honour of our late worthy and highly distinguished Brother DE WITT CLINTON, Past Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of this state.

GILES F. YATES, W. M.

JOHN ALLEN, Secretary.

At a meeting of Holland Lodge, No. 16, held in their Lodge Room, at Masonick Hall, in the city of New-York, on the 19th day of February, 5828, the M. W. having announced to the Brethren the decease of their P. M., the late M. W. Brother DE WITT CLINTON, P. G. M. of the State of New-York, the following preamble and orders were submitted and unanimously adopted:

This Lodge, taking into consideration that our deceased Brother, the M. W. DE WITT CLINTON, P. G. M. received the first light of Masonry within its sacred walls, and subsequently, (in the year 5794,) by fulfilling the duties of presiding officer, contributed to elevate it to its present masonic rank; and uniting with the publick at large in deploring his loss as a man and a citizen, and desirous to mark their respect and veneration for his talents and usefulness, do

Order, that the Lodge be put in mourning, for one year from the date of his decease, and that its members wear the usual badge of mourning for one month from the date of this order. By order of the W. M.

GEO. DAVIS, Sec'y.

At an emergent meeting of Solomon's Lodge, No. 6, at Poughkeepsie, in Dutchess county, February 15, A. L. 5828, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

It having been announced to this lodge, that his excellency DE WITT CLINTON, late General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, and Past Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the state of New-York, has in the wisdom of the Great Creator been suddenly and unexpectedly removed by death:

Resolved, that the Lodge, as well collectively as individually, entertain and cherish an affectionate recollection of both the civic and masonic virtues of him, who was our eldest brother, and our endeared friend; and that while we contemplate those virtues with mournful pleasure, we recognize the solemn obligation of emulating them.

Resolved, that, as a testimony of respect for the memory of our late Past Grand Master, the members of this lodge wear for thirty days the usual masonic badge of mourning.

Resolved, that a copy of these proceedings be transmitted by the worshipful master to the afflicted family of the illustrious dead.

S. CLEVELAND, Master.

Grand R. A. Chapter of the District of Columbia.

It having pleased the Almighty to call away, suddenly, from his career of usefulness and honour, in this life, our late Br. and companion, his excellency DE WITT CLINTON, Most Excellent General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States, a bereavement which falls not less heavily on the Masonick Institution, of which he has been, throughout our land, for many years, the ornament and pride, than it does on his country at large; it is fit that the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the District of Columbia, deeply participating in the general sorrow, should obey the dictates of propriety and duty, as well as the impulses of feeling, by rendering to the memory of the illustrious deceased those tokens of respect and veneration due to his public station, and sanctioned by his private virtues. To this end, it is directed that a special convocation of the Grand Chapter of this District, take place at Mason's Hall in the city of Washington, on Monday evening, the 25th inst. at 6 o'clock, of which the officers and members of the said Grand Chapter are requested to take notice; and to which the subordinate Chapters are requested to send deputations. By order of the G. H. P. E. S. LEWIS, G. Sec'y.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

ADIPOCIRE.

When the exhumation of the dead bodies from the burial ground of St. Innocent's, at Paris, led to the discovery of adipocire, or rather to its re-discovery, for it was known to Sir Thomas Brown and Lord Bacon, it produced a strong sensation among the men of science in England. Some went so far as to believe that adipocire might be made on a large scale, and a joint stock company was actually formed for that purpose; several noblemen and men of property subscribed 20,000*l.*, and an establishment was constructed at Bristol, containing a number of locks, each large enough to hold several dead horses, through which a stream of water was constantly flowing. The experiment failed, and the money, of course, was lost; but I am told that the principal superintendent, an able chymist and eminent physician of the present day, asserts, that it failed, not from any absurdity or impracticability in the scheme, but from the impracticable and unmanageable men he had to deal with; and that he is still convinced that, if properly conducted, it would be possible to transmute dead horses into spermaceti candles. If this had been known in the year 1825, we should have had an Adipocire Company, and the shares at a premium.

A gentleman, married, and in embarrassed circumstances, suddenly disappearing, it was concluded that he had gone off to avoid his creditors; on which they met, declared him a bankrupt, ascertained the amount of his property, and declared a dividend. Among the property was a jointure of 200*l.* a year to his wife, which they could legally claim if he was a bankrupt, but if not it continued the property of the widow. Five weeks and four days from the morning of his disappearance, his body was found floating in a neighbouring river, and so putrid that it was identified chiefly by the dress, and the contents of the pockets. And here arose a question, was he dead at the time he was declared a bankrupt, and if so can a dead man be made a bankrupt? One of his relatives, a veterinary surgeon, discovered, on carefully examining the body, that part of the flesh of the loins had been converted into adipocire—this he cut out, carried off, and showed it to Dr. Gibbes, who was at that time superintending the Institution for the Production of Adipocire, and the result of whose extensive experience was, that it was never formed in less than six or eight weeks. This evidence was produced on the trial, and was conclusive—it was clear that the drowned man must have been under water ever since the morning of his disappearance, and, consequently, that he was dead at the time when he was declared a bankrupt. In law, a dead man cannot be made a bankrupt—the bankruptcy was set aside, and the jointure of 200*l.* a year restored to the widow. Lond. pa.

EMBALMING.

We hear that a method of embalming has been discovered by Sir George Stewart Mackenzie, Baronet, which is far superior to any ancient or modern process, as it renders the muscular substance hard without diminution of bulk, and without affecting the natural colour; so that a body preserves its distinguishing features. This being the case, should embalming ever again become fashionable, the new method will supersede every other, on account both of its effect and simplicity, and will be adopted in all cases where it is desired to convey dead bodies to a distance for interment, leaden coffins being unnecessary. We understand, that, on account of this discovery having led to other objects of importance, it will not be published until the experiments now in progress are completed.—Among other objects is one in which the public are much interested; that of preserving subjects in a state fit for dissection; and it is believed that all risk of fatal accidents from scratches with the scalpel will be removed. Should this be the result, it will be an invaluable discovery to the anatomist. Bodies embalmed by the process referred to, are rendered totally unfit for the purpose of dissection; so that it presents to those who wish protection from the invasion of cemeteries by resurrection-men the most perfect security. On this account a knowledge of the process might make the fortune of any apothecary or undertaker in considerable towns or cities, for the expense attending it is not so great as to exclude persons of very moderate income from the benefit. CORAL REEFS.

Captain Basil Hall, in his voyage to the Loo-choo Islands, remarks, that the examination of a Coral Reef, during the different stages of one tide, is peculiarly interesting. When the tide has left it, for some time it becomes dry, and appears to be a compact rock, exceedingly hard and ragged; but as the tide rises, and the waves begin to wash over it, the coral worms protrude themselves from holes which were before invisible. These animals are of a variety of shapes and sizes, and in such prodigious numbers, that in a short time, the whole surface of the rock appears to be alive and in motion. The most common worm is in the form of a star, with arms from four to six inches long; which are moved about in rapid motions, in all directions, probably to catch food. Others are so sluggish, that they may be mistaken for pieces of the rock, and are generally of a dark colour, and from four to five inches long, and two or three round. When coral is broken, about high water mark, it is a solid hard stone, but if any part of it be detached at a spot which the tide reaches every day, it is found to be full of worms of different lengths and colours, some being as fine as a thread, and others resembling snails, and some are not unlike lobsters in shape, but soft and not above two inches long. The growth of coral appears to cease where the worm is no longer exposed to the washing of the sea. Thus a reef rises in the form of a cauliflower, till its top has gained the level of the highest tide, above which the worm has no power to advance, and the reef, of course, no longer extends itself upwards. The other parts, in succession, reach the surface, and there stop, forming, in time, a level field, with steep sides all round. The reef, however, continually increases, and being prevented from going higher, extends itself laterally in all directions. But this growth being as rapid at the upper edge as it is lower down, the steepness of the face of the reef is still preserved.

The accumulation of habitations thus formed by these apparently insignificant animals, sometimes reaches to an immense extent, and constitute the basis of many islands in the China seas, and in the Pacific Ocean. To rear a stupendous fabric from the very depths of the ocean, and raise it several feet above the surface, is a task which might appal the most powerful and civilized nations; yet it is performed with ease by an insect so small, and to appearance so helpless, that we are at first inclined to discredit the fact. But this is not all:—in preparing their own habitations, those seemingly contemptible creatures prepare a future abode for man. When part of the coral reef is once raised above the reach of the tide, and is thus secured from the inroads of the sea, the insect abandons its labours in this direction, and elevates the other parts of the mass until the whole has reached the same height. Sea weeds, which are then thrown on the barren and ragged mass, decay, and aided soon after by the dung of sea fowls, become the ground work of future vegetation. Mosses succeed; manure and seeds are brought at the same time, and by the same individuals; until at length a bed of vegetable mould is formed, capable of producing plants and trees. This simple process seems to be that by which nature enlarges the land, and prepares a place on which man may fix his residence.

AMERICAN CASTOR OIL.

This valuable medicine is made by expressing the oil from the bean of the plant "Palma Christi," and is now cultivated in some of the middle and western states to great advantage. It was not until the foreign countries, on which we heretofore were dependent for this article, laid a high export duty on it, that led to the manufacture of castor oil in the United States, where it is now made in great abundance, of better quality and at a less price. Large quantities of American cold-pressed castor oil were shipped to London in 1826, which paid the shipper a handsome profit, when Parliament deemed it necessary to protect their possessions in the East and West Indies, by increasing the duty on American castor oil, which is now equal to $1 60 per gallon; and even under these disadvantages, it will pay a profit to the shipper. It is supposed that the consumption of castor oil in the United States is, on the most moderate calculation, about one thousand barrels, or thirty thousand gallons a year. The crop of the last season will not, from the best information, exceed two hundred barrels, or six thousand gallons. This great deficiency is owing entirely to the low price the article had fallen to the year previous, when the crop was more than fifteen hundred barrels. Another striking proof of the resources of our country. [Niles.]

SCIENTIFICK EXPEDITION.

The British are about to forestal the tardy movements of our own government, by fitting out an expedition to the South pole. The Chanticleer, of 10 guns, Capt. Henry Foster, is about to be despatched from England, on a scientifick expedition to the southern hemisphere, and around the world. Capt. F. will probably penetrate as far to the south as may be practicable. It is the opinion of men of science, both in this country and in Europe, that important discoveries yet remain to be made beyond New-Holland. South of that continent, there are doubtless many Islands, abounding with seals, turtle, birds, and plants—the waters around which also yield their tribute of marine treasures—whence a rich harvest of their produce may be procured, consisting of feathers, skins, oil, whalebone, fruits, and other valuable commodities. [Ev. Bul.]

REANIMATION.

A case is reported in the Bullet. Univ. by a French physician, M. Bourgeois showing the importance of never abandoning all hope of success in restoring animation. A person, who had been twenty minutes under water, was treated in the usual way for the space of an hour without success; when a ligature being applied to the arm above a vein that had been previously opened, ten ounces of blood were withdrawn, after which the circulation and respiration gradually returned, though accompanied by the most dreadful convulsions. A second and a third bleeding was had recourse to, which brought about a favourable sleep, and ultimate recovery on the ensuing day. The publick will feel much obligated to M. Bourgeois for his perseverance in so interesting a branch of his profession. [London Weekly Review.]

EARTH EATERS.

In M. Malte Brun's "System of Geography," page 389, is an account of the indigenous tribes of Indians in Spanish Guiana. "Some of them," he says "separated from each other by language, are a wandering people completely strangers to agriculture, who live on ants, gum, and earth, and are in short, the very outcasts of the human species,—of this description are the Ottomacks and Yaruras. The earth which is eaten by the Ottomacks is fat and unctuous; a genuine potter's clay, of a greyish yellow tint, owing to the presence of a little oxyde of iron; they select it with a great deal of care, and procure it from particular beds on the banks of the Orinoko and the Meta. They distinguish by the taste one species of the earth from another, for it is not every kind of clay that proves equally agreeable to their palate. They knead this earth into balls of four or five inches in diameter, and roast them before a slow fire until their surface begins to turn red. When they are desirous of eating one of these balls, they wet it again. This savage and ferocious people live on fish, lizards and fern roots when they are to be procured; but they are so particularly fond of clay, that they every day eat a little after their food, during the very season when they have other aliments at their disposal."

THE GATHERER.

QUAKERS.

We have never read a more elegant or more just eulogium than the following notice of the Quakers. It is contained in a note to one of Lawrence's lectures, a work recently published in Salem, Massachusetts.

In complimenting the Quakers for not having followed the warlike and destructive example set before them by the rest of mankind, I ought not to have conveyed my praise in the ironical form of blame; because irony is often understood, even where we may think such a mistake almost impossible—as in the case of the good bishop, who declared himself highly pleased with Gulliver's Travels, but added, that the book contained some things which he had a difficulty in believing. To obviate the possibility of further misunderstanding, I lay aside irony, and state most seriously and sincerely that, whether I regard them as a religious sect or as a body of citizens, whether I look to their private or publick conduct, I hold the Quakers in the highest respect. As christians, they entertain no unintelligible articles of faith; they waste no time in splitting the hairs of theological controversy; their singular and honourable distinction in practical christianity, evinced in blameless lives, in renouncing all force and violence in endeavouring to fulfil literally the Gospel precepts of peace and good will, in active benevolence, in unremitted personal as well as pecuniary co-operation in all measures calculated to diminish the amount of human misery and suffering, and to improve the condition of their fellow creatures. These truly christian merits would redeem much heavier sins than an adherence to the plain and simple garb, and the unceremonious language of George Fox and William Penn.

GEORGE THE THIRD.

The king's recollection of persons' features was no less remarkable than his faculty of remembering their actions. "It was highly interesting," said Cosway, "to observe with what perception he discerned, even at a single glance at a portrait, the resemblance of the person from whom it was painted, provided his majesty knew the party." A manuscript list of the portraits was prepared for their majesties, on their royal visit to the exhibition. The king, however, used to take pleasure in discovering the names of the persons represented without referring to the list. When his majesty happened to fail, then, amidst the surrounding courtiers, it was the painter, and not the royal connoisseur, who was in the wrong. It is due to his majesty's candour, however, to add, that he would address whoever was nearest, and qualify those censures upon the painter, by saying, "Lord B—or Lady C—is difficult—very difficult to paint. Yes! your portrait painters have endless difficulties to surmount. Vandyke often failed in his resemblances. Kneller's men's mouths are all alike; and so are Lely's ladies eyes. English faces are the most difficult to paint of any faces in the world." The year in which Sir Joshua Reynolds's portrait of the Right Honourable Charles James Fox was exhibited at the Royal Academy, had some particular political feature connected with that great statesman, which I cannot bring to my recollection. Some allusions to the circumstance, which led to observations upon the resemblance, several years afterwards, by the late Lord M—y, his majesty observed, "Yes—yes, very like, very like. Sir Joshua's picture is finely painted—a fine specimen of art; but Gillray is the better limner. No man hits off Mr. Fox like him—Gillray is the man—for the man of the people. Hey! my lord—hey! Like as my profile on a Tower halfpenny—hey!"

A young lady, in preparing her stock of riddles, &c. for the approaching Christmas, made the following conundrum: "Why is a cardinal's hat the emblem of one of the worst passions of our nature?" Answer:—"Because, being a red-hat, it must be a hat-red."

POPULAR TALES.

CLOUGH NA CUDDY.

A Killarney Legend.

BY T. CROFTON CROKER.

Above all the islands in the Lakes of Killarney, give me Innisfallen—"sweet Innisfallen," as the melodious Moore calls it. It is in truth a fairy isle, although I have no fairy story to tell you about it; and if I had, these are such unbelieving times, and people of late have grown so skeptical, that they only smile at my stories and doubt them.

However, none will doubt that a monastery once stood upon Innisfallen island, for its ruins may still be seen; neither, that within its walls dwelt certain pious and learned persons called monks. A very pleasant set of fellows they were, I make not the smallest doubt; and I am sure of this, that they had a very pleasant spot to enjoy themselves in after dinner:—the proper time, believe me, and I am no bad judge of such matters, for the enjoyment of a fine prospect.

Out of all the monks you could not pick a better fellow nor a merrier soul than Father Cuddy;—he sang a good song, he told a good story, and had a jolly, comfortable-looking paunch of his own that was a credit to any refectory table. He was distinguished above all the rest by the name of "the fat Father." Now there are many that will take huff at a name; but Father Cuddy had no nonsense of that kind about him; he laughed at it, and well able he was to laugh, for his mouth nearly reached from one ear to the other,—his might, in truth, be called an open countenance. As his paunch was no disgrace to his food, neither was his nose to his drink. 'Tis a question to me if there were not more carbuncles upon it than ever were seen at the bottom of the lake, which is said to be full of them. His eyes had a right merry twinkle in them, like moonshine dancing on the water, and his cheeks had the roundness and crimson glow of ripe arbutus berries.

He eat, and drank, and prayed, and slept,—what then?
He eat, and drank, and prayed, and slept again!

Such was the tenour of his simple life; but when he prayed a certain drowsiness would come upon him, which it must be confessed never occurred when a well filled "black-jack" stood before him. Hence his prayers were short, and his draughts were long. The world loved him, and he saw no reason why he should not in return love its venison and its usquebaugh. But, as times went, he must have been a pious man, or else what befel him never would have happened.

Spiritual affairs—for it was respecting the importation of a tun of wine into the island monastery, demanded the presence of one of the brotherhood of Innisfallen at the abbey of Irelagh, now called Muckruss. The superintendence of this important matter was committed to Father Cuddy, who felt too deeply interested in the future welfare of any community of which he was a member to neglect or delay such mission. With the morning's light he was seen guiding his shallop across the crimson waters of the lake towards the peninsula of Muckruss, and having moored his little bark in safety beneath the shelter of a wave-worn rock, he advanced with becoming dignity towards the abbey.

The stillness of the bright and balmy hour was broken by the heavy footsteps of the zealous father:—at the sound the startled deer, shaking the dew from their sides, sprang up from their lair, and as they bounded off—"Hah," exclaimed Cuddy, "what a noble haunch goes there!—how delicious it would look smoking upon a goodly platter."

As he proceeded, the mountain bee hummed his tune of gladness around the holy man, save when buried in the fox-glove bell, or revelling upon a fragrant bunch of thyme,—and even then, the little voice murmured out happiness in low and broken tones of voluptuous delight. Father Cuddy derived no small comfort from the sound, for it presaged a good metheglin season; and metheglin he considered, if well manufactured, to be no bad liquor, particularly when there was no stint of usquebaugh in the brewing.

Arrived within the abbey garth, he was received with due respect by the brethren of Irelagh, and arrangements for the embarkation of the wine were completed to his entire satisfaction. "Welcome, Father Cuddy!" said the prior, "grace be on you."

"Grace before meat then," said Cuddy, "for a long walk always makes me hungry, and I am certain I have not walked less than half a mile this morning, to say nothing of crossing the water."

A pasty of choice flavour felt the truth of this assertion as regarded Father Cuddy's appetite. After such consoling repast, it would have been a reflection on monastick hospitality to have departed without partaking of the grace-cup:—moreover, Father Cuddy had a particular respect for the antiquity of that custom. He liked the taste of the grace-cup well;—he tried another,—it was no less excellent; and when he had swallowed the third he found his heart expand, and put forth its fibres, as willing to embrace all mankind!—Surely then there is christian love and charity in wine!

I said he sung a good song. Now though psalms are good songs, and in accordance with his vocation, I did not mean to imply that he was a mere psalm-singer. It was well known to the brethren, that wherever Father Cuddy was, mirth and melody were with him. Mirth in his eye, and melody on his tongue; and these, from experience, are equally well known to be thirsty commodities; but he took good care never to let them run dry. To please the brotherhood, whose excellent wine pleased him, he sung, and as "in vino veritas," his song will well become this veritable history.

"Quam pulchra sunt ova
Cum alba et nova
In stabulo scite leguntur:
Et a Margery bella
Quæ festiva puella!
Lardi pinguis cum frustis coquuntur.

"Ut belles in prato
Aprico et lato
Sub sole tam late reident,
Ova tosta in mensa,
Mappa bene extensa
Nitidissima lance consistent."

Such was his song. Father Cuddy smacked his lips at the recollection of Margery's delicious fried eggs, which always imparted a peculiar relish to his liquor. The very idea provoked Cuddy to raise the cup to his mouth, and, with one hearty pull thereat, he finished its contents.

This is, and ever was, a censorious world, often construing what is only a fair allowance into an excess;—but I scorn to reckon up any man's drink like an unrelenting host; therefore, I cannot tell how many brimming draughts of wine, bedecked with the venerable Bead, Father Cuddy emptied into his "soul-case,"—so he figuratively termed the body.

His respect for the goodly company of the monks of Irelagh detained him until their adjournment to vespers, when he set forward on his return to Innisfallen. Whether his mind was occupied in philosophick contemplation or wrapped in pious musings, I cannot declare; but the honest Father wandered on in a different direction from that in which his shallop lay. Far be it from me to insinuate that the good liquor, which he had so commended, had caused him to forget his road, or that his track was irregular and unsteady. Oh no!—he carried his drink bravely, as became a decent man and a good christian; yet, somehow, he thought he could distinguish two moons. "Bless my eyes," said Father Cuddy, "everything is changing now a days!—the very stars are not in the same places they used to be;—I think Camceachta (the plough) is driving on at a rate I never saw it before to-night, but I suppose the driver is drunk, for there are blackguards everywhere."

Cuddy had scarcely uttered these words, when

* O 'tis eggs are a treat
When so white and so sweet
From under the manger they're taken;
And by fair Margery,
Och! 'tis she's full of glee,
They are fried with fat rashers of bacon.

Just like daisies all spread
O'er a broad sunny mead
In the sun-beams so beauteously shining,
Are fried eggs, well displayed
On a dish when we've laid
The cloth, and are thinking of dining.

he saw, or fancied he saw, the form of a young woman; who, holding up a bottle, beckoned him towards her. The night was extremely beautiful, and the white dress of the girl floated gracefully in the moonlight, as with gay step she tripped on before the worthy Father, archly looking back upon him over her shoulder. "Ah, Margery,—merry Margery!"—cried Cuddy, "you tempting little rogue—" Et a Margery bella—Quæ festiva puella.—I see you—I see you and the bottle!—let me but catch you, Margery bella." And on he followed, panting and smiling, after this alluring apparition.

At length his feet grew weary, and his breath failed, which obliged him to give up the chase; yet such was his piety, that unwilling to rest in any attitude but that of prayer, down dropt Father Cuddy on his knees. Sleep as usual stole upon his devotions, and the morning was far advanced when he awoke from dreams, in which tables groaned beneath their loads of viands, and wine poured itself free and sparkling as the mountain spring.

Rubbing his eyes, he looked about him, and the more he looked the more he wondered at the alterations which appeared in the face of the country. "Bless my soul and body," said the good Father, "I saw the stars changing last night, but here is a change!" Doubting his senses he looked again. The hills bore the same majestic outline as on the preceding day, and the lake spread itself beneath his view in the same tranquil beauty, and was studded with the same number of islands; but every smaller feature in the landscape was strangely altered;—what had been naked rocks, were now clothed with holly and arbutus. Whole woods had disappeared, and waste places had become cultivated fields; and to complete the work of enchantment the very season itself seemed changed. In the rosy dawn of a summer's morning he had left the monastery of Innisfallen, and he now felt in every sight and sound the dreariness of winter;—the hard ground was covered with withered leaves;—icicles depended from leafless branches;—he heard the sweet low note of the robin who familiarly approached him, and he felt his fingers numbed by the nipping frost. Father Cuddy found it rather difficult to account for such sudden transformations, and to convince himself it was not the illusion of a dream, he was about to arise; when lo! he discovered that both his knees were buried at least six inches in the solid stone: for notwithstanding all these changes, he had never altered his devout position.

Cuddy was now wide awake, and felt, when he got up, his joints sadly cramped, which it was only natural they should be, considering the hard texture of the stone, and the depth his knees had sunk into it. The great difficulty was, to explain how, in one night, summer had become winter—whole woods had been cut down, and well-grown trees had sprouted up. The miracle, nothing else could he conclude it to be, urged him to hasten his return to Innisfallen, where he might learn some explanation of these marvellous events.

Seeing a boat moored within reach of the shore, he delayed not, in the midst of such wonders, to seek his own bark, but, seizing the oars, pulled stoutly towards the island; and here new wonders awaited him.

Father Cuddy waddled, as fast as cramped limbs could carry his rotund corporation, to the gate of the monastery, where he loudly demanded admittance.

"Holloa! whence come you, master monk, and what's your business?" demanded a stranger who occupied the porter's place.

"Business—my business!" repeated the confounded Cuddy, "why do you not know me? Has the wine arrived safely?"

"Hence, fellow," said the porter's representative in a surly tone, "nor think to impose on me with your monkish tales."

"Fellow!" exclaimed the Father, "mercy upon us that I should be so spoken to at the gate of my own house!"—"Scoundrel!" cried Cuddy, raising his voice, "do you not see my garb—my holy garb!"

"Ay, fellow," replied he of the keys, "the garb of laziness, and filthy debauchery, which has been expelled from out these walls. Know you not, idle knave, of the suppression of this nest of superstition, and that the abbey lands and possessions were granted in August last to Master Robert Collan, by our Lady Elizabeth, sovereign queen of England, and paragon of all beauty, whom God preserve!"

"Queen of England," said Cuddy; "there never was a sovereign queen of England;—this is but a piece with the rest. I saw how it was going with the stars last night—the world's turned upside down. But surely this is Innisfallen Island, and I am the Father Cuddy who yesterday morning went over to the Abbey of Ireland respecting the tun of wine. Do you know me now?"

"Know you! how should I know you?" said the keeper of the abbey—"yet true it is, that I have heard my grandmother, whose mother remembered the man, often speak of the fat Father Cuddy of Innisfallen, who made a profane and godless ballad in praise of fried eggs, of which he and his vile crew knew more than they did of the word of God, and who, being drunk, it was said, tumbled into the lake one night and was drowned; but that must have been a hundred—ay, more than a hundred years since."

"'Twas I who composed that song, in praise of Margery's fried eggs, which is no profane and godless ballad. No other Father Cuddy than myself ever belonged to Innisfallen," earnestly exclaimed the holyman. "A hundred years! What was your great grandmother's name?"

"She was a Mahony of Dunlow, Margaret ni Mahony; and my grandmother—"

"What, merry Margery of Dunlow your great grandmother!" shouted Cuddy; "St Brandon help me! the wicked wench, with that tempting bottle—why 'twas only last night—a hundred years—your great grandmother said you! Mercy on us, there has been a strange torpor over me. I must have slept all this time!"

That Father Cuddy had done so, I think sufficiently proved, by the changes which occurred during his nap. A reformation, and a serious one it was for him, had taken place. Eggs fried by the pretty Margery were no longer to be had in Innisfallen, and, with heart as heavy as his footsteps, the worthy man directed his course towards Dingle, where he embarked in a vessel on the point of sailing for Malaga. The rich wine of that place had of old impressed him with a high respect for its monastic establishments, in one of which he quietly wore out the remnant of his days.

The stone impressed with the mark of Father Cuddy's knees may be seen to this day. Should any incredulous persons doubt my story, I request them to go to Killarney, where Clough na Cuddy—so is the stone called—remains in Lord Kenmare's park, an indisputable evidence of the fact: and Spillane, the bugle man, will be able to point it out to them, as he did to me.

MISCELLANY.

THE LAST HOURS OF WASHINGTON.

[From Custis' Recollections of Washington.]

Twenty-eight years have passed, since an interesting group were assembled in the death room, and witnessed the last hours of Washington. So keen and unpreparing hath been the siege of time, that, of all those who watched over the Patriarch's couch, on the 13th and 14th of December, 1799, but a single personage survives.

On the morning of the 13th, the General was engaged in making some improvement in front of Mount Vernon. As was usual with him, he carried his own compass, noted his observations, and marked out the ground. The day became rainy, with sleet, and the improver remained so long exposed to the inclemency of the weather, as to be considerably wetted before his return to the house. About one o'clock, he was seized with chilliness and nausea, but having changed his clothes, he sat down to his in-door work—there being no moment of his time for which he had not provided an appropriate employment.

At night, on joining his family circle, the General complained of slight indisposition, and, after a single cup of tea, repaired to his library, where he remained writing until between 11 and 12 o'clock. Mrs. Washington retired about the usual family hour, but becoming alarmed at not hearing the accustomed sound of the Library door, as it closed for the night, and gave signal for rest in the well regulated mansion, she rose again, and continued sitting up, in much anxiety and suspense. At length the well known step was heard on the stair, and upon the General's entering his chamber, the lady chided him for staying up so late, knowing himself to be unwell; to which Washington made this memorable reply: "I came so soon as my business was accomplished. You well know, that, through a long life, it has been my unvaried rule, never to put off till the morrow the duties which should be performed to day."

Having first covered up the fire with care, the man of mighty labours sought repose; but it came not as it had long been wont to do, to comfort and restore, after the many and earnest occupations of the well spent day. The night was spent in feverish restlessness and pain. "Tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," was destined no more to visit his couch; yet the manly sufferer uttered no complaint, would permit no one to be disturbed in their rest, on his account, and it was only at day-break he would consent that the overseer might be called in, and bleeding resorted to. A vein was opened, but without affording relief. Couriers were despatched to summon Dr. Craik, the family, and Drs. Dick and Brown, as consulting physicians, all of whom came with speed. The proper remedies were administered, but without producing their healing effects, while the patient yielding to the anxious looks of all around him, waived his usual objection to medicines, and took those which were prescribed, without hesitation or remark. The medical gentlemen spared not their skill, and all the resources of their art were exhausted in unwearying endeavours to preserve this noblest work of nature.

The night approached—the last night of Washington; the weather became severely cold, while the group gathered nearer to the couch of the sufferer, watching, with intense anxiety, for the slightest dawning of hope. He spoke but little. To the respectful and affectionate inquiries of an old family servant, as she smoothed down his pillow, how he felt himself, he answered "I am very ill." To Dr. Craik, his earliest companion in arms, longest tried and bosom friend, he observed: "I am dying, Sir—but am not afraid to die." To Mrs. Washington, he said: "Go to my escritoire, and in the private drawer you will find two papers—bring them to me." They were brought. He continued: "These are my wills—preserve this one, and burn the other." Which was accordingly done. Calling to Colonel Lear, he directed: "Let my corpse be kept the usual period of three days."

Here we would beg leave to remind our readers, that, in a former part of this work, we have said that Washington was old fashioned in much of his habits and manners, and in some of his opinions; nor was he the less to be admired on those accounts. The custom of keeping the dead for the scriptural period of three days, is derived from remote antiquity, and arose, not from fear of premature interment, as in more modern times, but from motives of veneration towards the deceased; for the better enabling the relatives and friends to assemble from a distance, to perform the funeral rites; for the pious watchings of the corpse, and for many sad, yet endearing ceremonials with which we delight to pay our last duties to the remains of those we have loved.

The patient bore his acute sufferings with manly fortitude, and perfect resignation to the divine will, while, as the night advanced, it became evident that he was sinking, and he seemed fully aware that his "hour was nigh." He inquired the time, and it was answered, a few moments to twelve. He spoke no more—the hand of death was upon him, and he was conscious that his "hour was come." With surprising self-possession, he prepared to die. Composing his form at length, and folding his arms upon his bosom, without a sigh, without a groan, the Father of his country expired, gently as though an infant died. Nor pang or struggle told, when the noble spirit took its noiseless flight; while so tranquil appeared the manly features in the repose of death, that some moments had passed ere those around could believe that the Patriarch was no more.

It may be asked, and why was the ministry of religion wanting to shed its peaceful and benign lustre upon the last hours of Washington? Why was he, to whom the observance of sacred things were ever primary duties through life, without their consolations in his last moments? We answer, circumstances did not permit. It was but for a little while that the disease assumed so threatening a character as to forbid the encouragement of hope, yet, to stay that summons which none may refuse, to give farther days to him whose "time honoured life" was so dear to mankind, prayer was not wanting to the Throne of Grace. Close to the couch of the sufferer, resting her head upon that ancient book, with which she had been wont to hold pious communion, a portion of every day, for more than half a century, was the venerable consort, absorbed in silent prayer, and from which she only arose when the mourning group prepared to bear her from the chamber of the dead. Such were the last hours of Washington.

IMPERIAL FATE.

[From Hone's Table Book.]

Let us sit upon the ground,
And tell sad stories of the death of kings:—
How some have been deposed, some slain in war;
Some haunted by the ghosts they have deposed;
Some poisoned by their wives, some sleeping killed;
All murdered:—For within the hollow crown,
That rounds the mortal temples of a king,
Keeps Death his court.—

RICHARD II.

Does any man envy the situation of monarchs? Let him peruse the following statement, which particularizes the deaths of the forty-seven Roman Emperors from Julius Cæsar to Constantine the Great; only thirteen of whom encountered "the last enemy" in the ordinary course of nature:—

B. C.

42. Julius Cæsar was murdered by Brutus and others in the senate house.

A. D.

15. AUGUSTUS CÆSAR died a natural death.

39. Tiberius was smothered with pillows, at the instigation of Macro, the friend of Caligula.

42. Caligula was stabbed by Cherea and other conspirators, when retiring from the celebration of the Palatine games.

55. Claudius was poisoned by the artifice of his wife Agrippina.

69. Nero in the midst of a general revolt was condemned to death by the senate. Upon hearing of which he killed himself with a dagger.

69. Sergius Galba conspired against by Otho, by whose partisans he was beheaded.

70. Otho destroyed himself, to avoid further contest with his competitor Vitellius.

70. Vitellius was massacred by the populace, who threw his dead body into the Tiber.

79. VESPASIAN died a natural death.

81. Titus. It is suspected that his death was hastened by his brother Domitian.

96. Domitian was murdered by Stephanus and other conspirators.

98. NERVA died a natural death.

117. TRAJAN ditto.

138. ADRIAN ditto.

161. TITUS ANTONINUS, called Antoninus Pius, ditto.

180. MARCUS AURELIUS, called Antoninus the Philosopher, ditto.

192. Commodus was strangled by Narcissus and other conspirators.

192. Pertinax was murdered by the soldiers.

195. Didius Julian was beheaded by the soldiers.

211. SEPTIMUS SEVERUS died a natural death.

217. Caracalla and Geta, joint emperor. Geta was killed by his brother Caracalla, who was afterwards killed by Martial.

218. Opilius Macrinus was killed by the partisans of Heliogabalus.

222. Heliogabalus was murdered by the soldiers, who threw his dead body into the Tiber.

235. Alexander was beheaded by the soldiers.

238. Maximin was murdered by his own guards.

238. Maximus and Balbinus, joint emperors, were both murdered by the prætorian guards.

243. Gordian was murdered by order of Philip, whom he associated with him in the command of the empire.

248. Philip was murdered by the soldiers.
 251. Decius destroyed himself, after having been defeated by the Goths.
 253. Gallus was slain in battle, with his competitor Emilianus.
 259. Valerian was taken prisoner by Sapor, king of Persia, who caused him to be cruelly murdered.
 268. Galienus was slain by his own soldiers.
 270. CLAUDIUS died a natural death.
 275. Aurelian was murdered by Menesthus and other conspirators.
 275. TACITUS died a natural death.
 282. Probus was murdered by his soldiers.
 284. Curus and his sons, Carinus and Numerian, joint emperors. The father was struck dead by lightning, and both his sons were murdered.
 304. Dioclesian and Maximian, joint emperors. Dioclesian resigned the empire, and died either by poison or madness. Maximian also resigned, but was afterwards condemned to death by Constantine.
 306. CONSTANTIUS and } joint emperors, both
 311. GALERIUS, } died a natural death.
 343. CONSTANTINE the Great died a natural death.

Where did these events occur? Among the savage tribes of interior Africa, or the rude barbarians of modern Europe? No! but in Rome—imperial Rome—in her “high and palmy state,” when she was mistress of the world, and held within her dominion all the science and literature of which the earth could boast. Surely we may reason with doubt, whether the moral improvement of mankind invariably keeps pace with their intellectual advancement.

THE DRAMA AND ITS PROFESSORS.

[From the London Mirror.]

It is remarkable with what difference actors were treated among the ancients. At Athens, they were held in such esteem, as to be sometimes appointed to discharge embassies and other negotiations; whereas, at Rome, if a citizen became an actor, he thereby forfeited his freedom. Among the moderns, actors are best treated in England; the French having much the same opinion of them that the Romans had; for though an actor of talent, in Paris, is more regarded than here, he nevertheless is deeply degraded. He may die amid applauses on the stage, but at his natural death he must pass to his grave, without a prayer or de profundis, unless a minister of religion receives his last sigh.

Cromwell and his puritans had a holy horror of actors. They pronounced them Sons of Belial! and professors of abomination. During the whole reign of the Republican Parliament, and Protectorate, the theatres of that day were closed, or, if opened by stealth, were subject to the visits of the emissaries of “Praise God Barebones,” “Fight the Good Fight,” and their crew. The actors were driven off the stage by soldiers, and the cant word of that period is still recorded, “Enter red coat, exit hat and cloak.” William Prynne was celebrated for his writings against the immorality of the stage, and the furious invectives of Jeremy Collier are still extant; his pen was roused by Dryden’s Spanish Friar, and Congreve’s witty, but licentious comedies. Collier inveighed without mercy, but he certainly did much to reform the stage. Our Evangelicals and Methodists denounce the histrionick art to this day, with more than the zeal of the church of Rome. But a follower of Wesley or Whitfield would not enter the den of abomination. Here, however, we take care all our comedies shall be purified, and our tragedies free, even from an oath; both are subject to the censor’s unsparing pen, and must be subsequently licensed by the Lord Chamberlain.

The actors in England, have, it is true, only become respectable within the last half century, and though they are termed his majesty’s servants, yet an unrepented statute denounces them as vagabonds. As a body, numerous in itself, they are as free from crime as any other associated body or profession of men, and yet do they “his majesty’s servants” continue to lay under the stigma which the above unrepented act fixes upon them. This is perfectly anomalous, and it was spiritedly denounced by Sir Walter Scott, when on a recent and interesting occasion he nobly and manfully declared “Its professors had been stigmatized; and laws had been passed against them less dishonourable to them than to the statesman by whom they were proposed, and to the legislatures by whom they were passed.” To repeal, therefore, an act nugatory in itself, would not add to the reputation of the profession, nor give a license to further abuse; but it would be an act of justice, and remove a prejudice unjustly attached to the professors of a difficult art.

The critical pen of Mrs. Inchbald justly remarks, “To the honour of a profession long held in contempt by the wise—and still contemned by the weak—Shakspeare, the pride of Britain, was a player.” To the illustrious bard, the modern drama is indebted for its excellence. His writings will remain for ever the grandest monument of a genius which opened to him the whole heart of man, all the mines of fancy, all the stores of nature and gave him power beyond all other writers, to move, astonish, and delight mankind. In the drama, the most interesting emotions are excited; the dangerous passions of hate, envy, avarice and pride, with all their innumerable train of attendant vices, are detected and exposed. Love, friendship, gratitude, and all those active and generous virtues which warm the heart and exalt the mind, are held up as objects of emulation. And what can be a more effectual method of softening the ferocity, and improving the minds of the inconsiderate? The heart is melted by the scene, and ready to receive an impression—either to warn the innocent, or to appal the guilty; and numbers of those have neither abilities nor time for deriving advantage from reading, are powerfully impressed through the medium of the eyes and ears, with those important truths which while they illuminate the understanding, correct the heart. The moral laws of the drama are said to have an effect next after those conveyed from the pulpit, or promulgated in courts of justice. Mr. Burke, indeed, has gone so far as to observe that “the theatre is a better school of moral sentiment than churches.” The drama, therefore, has a right to find a place; and to its professors are we indebted for what may justly be considered one of the highest of all intellectual gratifications.

TYROLEAN WARFARE.

The following passage, from the life of Napoleon, describes the fate of a division of 18,000 men, of the French and Bavarian army, who invaded the Tyrol by the Valley of the Inn, during the campaign of 1805:—

The invading troops advanced in a long column up a road bordered on the one side by the river Inn, there a deep and rapid torrent, where cliffs of immense height overhung both road and river. The vanguard was permitted to advance unopposed as far as Prutz, the object of their expedition. The rest of the army were therefore, induced to trust themselves still deeper in this tremendous pass, where the precipices, becoming more and more narrow as they advanced, seemed about to close above their heads. No sound but of the screaming of the eagles disturbed from their eyries, and the roar of the river, reached the ears of the soldier, and on the precipices, partly enveloped in a hazy mist, no human forms showed themselves. At length the voice of a man was heard calling across the ravine, “Shall we begin?” “No,” was returned in an authoritative tone of voice by one who, like the first speaker, seemed the inhabitant of some upper region. The Bavarian detachment halted, and sent to the general for orders; when presently was heard the terrible signal, “In the name of the Holy Trinity, cut all loose!” Huge rocks, and trunks of trees, long prepared and laid in heaps for the purpose, began now to descend rapidly in every direction, while the deadly fire of the Tyrolese, who never throw away a shot, opened from every bush, crag, or corner of rocks, which could afford the shooter cover. As this dreadful attack was made on the whole line at once, two thirds of the enemy were instantly destroyed; while the Tyrolese, rushing from their shelter, with swords, spears, axes, sashes clubs, and all other rustick instruments which could be converted into weapons, beat down and routed the shattered remainder. As the vanguard, which had reached Prutz, was obliged to surrender, very few of the ten thousand invaders are computed to have extricated themselves from the fatal pass.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1828.

FOREIGN. By the latest arrivals, bringing London and Liverpool papers to the 9th January inclusive, we learn that the ambassadors left Constantinople on the 8th December, without having obtained their passports. The Porte refused to grant them, on the grounds that they could show no orders from their respective courts for the step they were about to take. Orders were however given underhand to respect the vessels of the ambassadors. The Polish army, forty thousand strong, was stated to be on the eve of setting out to join the Russian camp. The Porte was said to be making vigorous preparation for war. Taher Pacha, who was defeated at Navarino, is appointed Capitana Pacha. It is stated on good authority that it was the intention of the Turkish Admiral, had the battle not taken place, to have attempted the destruction of the combined fleet during the night. The report of the destruction of the Greek fleet by Admiral De Rigny, is believed to be without foundation. We are astonished that such a report should have gained any credence; for since the affair at Navarino, the Greeks have looked upon the combined fleets as the saviours of their country, and would be unwilling to offer any provocation for such an act. It is stated that the English ambassador, Mr. Canning, has arrived at Corfu, the Russian, M. Ribeaupierre, at Odessa, and Count Guilleminot, the French, has proceeded directly to Toulon in a Sardinian vessel.

A change in the British ministry is looked upon as inevitable. It has occurred in France, and the deposed ministers are made peers of France, by way of consolation to their wounded feelings.

Spain is still the theatre of intestine commotion. As the French troops are reported to be about retiring from that kingdom, we fear their departure will be the era of more serious evils if possible, than even the imposition of a foreign standing army.

Austria takes a sort of neutral stand in relation to the affairs of Greece; but it is presumed she will act in some measure like the fox in the fable:—when Russia and Turkey have exhausted their strength in a measure so that little more fighting can be expected, she will put on the terrible aspect of war, and carry off the prize. She is determined to fight for nothing but territory.

It is not a little singular that, while the union and magnanimity of the European powers is trumped through the world, and we hear “nothing of them below the clouds,” these same powers have ever before been the strenuous supporters of legitimacy, and studied enemies of limited governments. Are they altered thus strangely? Or do they hope to reap some honour and a good deal of strength from the dismemberment of Turkey. We may be in error, but we believe, had not Britain and France looked with jealousy on the prospect which Russia had of adding so largely to her strength, the world would have never heard of their magnanimity and disinterested philanthropy. The cause is however nominally the cause of correct principles, and even in that light it may be looked upon as an era of no trifling moment to posterity.

MATRIMONIAL SEPARATION. What a fickle little genius is Hymen, and how extremely ready with any reason, no matter how frivolous, to convert his torch into a fire-brand! We learn from an English paper, that a female lately made her appearance before the Leicester police, and stated to the mayor that she wanted to be parted from her husband. Her reasons for making this demand she stated, on inquiry, to be, that her husband had sold all the furniture out of the house, and gone to live at lodgings, and would not maintain her.—And what said the husband,—who was forthwith introduced to show cause why and wherefore? His wife was in the habit of starting off, and leaving his house for days together; and that on her going away this time, which was for five days, he had sold all his furniture and gone to lodgings. He was willing to give her a weekly allowance, but he would not live with her any longer. Now for the rejoinder—Her reasons being required by the mayor for such strange conduct, the answer was,—“Because he cuts all the crust off the loaf!” One would suppose that the Spanish student had again discovered the prison of Asmodeus, and let the little devil out. These are very much like his pranks.

MASONICK SOLEMNITIES IN BUFFALO. The Niagara Chapter, and Western Star Lodge, together with the brethren from the adjacent towns, assembled on Thursday the 21st ult. agreeably to previous arrangements, to testify their respect to the memory of their late illustrious companion and brother, DE WITT CLINTON.

A procession was formed and proceeded from Clinton Hall at 11 o'clock, A. M. in regular masonick order, to the dead march and solemn toll of the bell. In the church with other truly appropriate ceremonies, an address was delivered by the Rev. Brother Spencer, founded on Isaiah, xl, 8:—“The grass withereth, the flower fadeth; but the word of our God standeth forever.”

The Buffalo papers speak highly of the ceremonies and of the address in particular. The Emporium says,—“When the speaker portrayed the admirable traits united in the character of him ‘whose death we all deplore,’ every heart was touched with sympathetick feeling, and beat in unison an agonizing farewell! His admonition to his brethren was faithful; he reminded them of a fact which is often enforced, that the badges which they wore, were those of purity—that their principles were founded in the purest morality—the morality of the bible—and that their present happiness, and future felicity depended, on their living conformably to its precepts; and exhorted them to make it the rule of their lives, relying on the merits of Him who is the way, the truth and the life.”

The weather was so inclement, and the roads so bad, that, few brethren from abroad arrived in season to join in the solemn obsequies.

MISDEMEANOR. The base intrigues of those men who are so desirous of disfranchising freemasons, it seems cannot be supported by the laws of the land. We learn that a bill of indictment was found by the grand jury of the county of Genesee, at their last session, against Sylvester Lincoln, town clerk of Bethany in that county, for misdemeanor, in returning eight respectable men as disqualified, who were drawn as petit jurors. Their disqualification was nothing more nor less than masonry. Among those returned were JOSIAH CHURCHILL esq., formerly member of the assembly for several years, and two deacons of churches in the same town. When such facts stand against the names of men so noisy and loud for the dignity of the laws, their sincerity will be but little credited, even by the most charitable. Such things will never help the cause which fallen editors and repudiated divines are so anxiously looking to for a reinstatement into public notice and confidence. It is becoming so much a common hobby for those whom every other hobby has thrown in the dirt, that its infallibility is even questioned (sinners as they are!) by the women! Lose them and all is lost.

ECCLIASTICAL MONOPOLY. In the midst of the multiplied miseries of Spain, the ecclesiasticks seem to be redoubling their claims on the fortunes as well as consciences of their followers. A late occurrence at or near Madrid will serve to exemplify their avarice, in direct violation of that charity for which they would set themselves down as a paragon to the world.

A capuchin of the Padro convent has two nieces, who, being without fortunes, were placed by him in two respectable families as femmes de chambre. From his own exertions he did much to meliorate their lot, and whenever he had earned a small sum by preaching, he was accustomed to give it to his nieces, or put it in the lottery, to try fortune in their favour. He had the luck at length to draw a prize of 85000 reals, or about $8,500. This sum the generous capuchin was about to divide equally between his nieces, when he was called upon by the convent to deliver it up to the community; alleging that the statutes of Saint Francis forbid any monk to possess a farthing, and declare that the goods of each individual member belong to the convent. The capuchin refused to deliver up the money, pleading that the money was only put into the lottery for his nieces. The affair was not decided; the judgement of the tribunal was expected with much anxiety, and it was believed that it would be carried to Rome for a final decision. From the truly liberal character of the Pope, we have the fullest confidence that he will not suffer a monopoly of such a cast to receive his sanction.

DESPERATE NAVAL BATTLE.—From the New York papers of Thursday evening we learn the following particulars of a naval engagement which took place in the Gulf between the 10th and 13th ult. The Guerrero, Mexican brig of war of 22 guns and 136 men, Capt. David H. Porter, had fallen in with two Spanish Guineamen brigs, on the 9th, which she captured and manned. On the 10th she fell in with two Spanish men-of-war brigs, mounting together 28 guns, and 310 men, both of which she engaged. They succeeded however, after being much damaged, in getting into Mariel. In this engagement, the Guerrero also suffered considerably in her spars and rigging. The firing in this engagement being heard at Havana, the frigate Lealtad of 54 guns and 500 men, immediately put to sea, and being a swift sailer, soon succeeded in overtaking the Guerrero, which was already much crippled from her recent engagements. A battle ensued, which for determined courage against such superior force, has few parallels in history. The action lasted two hours and twenty minutes, one hour and a quarter of which the two vessels were within speaking distance.

During the engagement, the colours of the Guerrero were twice shot away and twice replaced; but the ammunition being entirely expended, Captain Porter ordered the colours to be struck. The frigate continued her fire, supposing them to be again shot away, and after the brig had surrendered, Captain Porter was killed by a grape shot. He was a nephew of the commodore; the latter had also a son on board the Guerrero. A publick funeral was preparing at Havana for the young and gallant officer,—a tribute to his worth we could not have expected from the Spanish. The Herman brig has sailed from Key West, to meet the Casilda, another Spanish frigate, cruising off that port.

TABLE-TALK.

Mr. Brougham was speaking at one o'clock on Tuesday morning, at the Liverpool dinner, and on Wednesday morning, he was walking in Westminster hall. [This is looked on with wonder by the Londoners; but there appears to be a chance for some shuffling in this instance. From London to Liverpool is about 200 miles,—and the time that expired, according to the terms, may have been 35 hours. Now, at the usual rate of steam boat conveyance, a gentleman might leave Albany for New-York, attend a publick dinner there, and come back again with his printed speech in his pocket, a distance of more than 300 miles, in the same period of time.]

—(Q) Ladies! do you know that the present is a leap year? Well,—are you aware of the privileges the year confers on you by law?—for what was “Commun Lawe” two hundred years ago, must be so yet. The following is extracted from an old volume, printed in 1606, entitled “Courtship, Love, and Marriage.”—“Albeit, it hath nowe become a Parte of the Commun Lawe, in Regard to the social Relations of Life, that as often as every besextile Year doth return, the Ladies have the sole Privilege, during the Time it continueth, of making Love unto the Men, which they may do either by Wordes or Lookes, as unto them it semeth proper: and more over no Man will be entitled to the Benefit of Clergy who dothe refuse to accept the Offers of a Ladye, or who dothe in any wise treat her Proposal with Slight or Contumely.” [Beware, ye bachelors; the campaign is already begun, and the Lord only knows how many troops are in the field, or where the first assault may be made.]—Near Worcester, England, may be seen the following notice to deter trespassers on certain grounds:—“Steel traps and spring guns are set in these grounds. N. B. If a man is caught in this trap, it will break a horse’s leg.”—It is stated in a letter from Holland, that last year, in a population of more than six millions, there were but two executions.—A widower, 45 years of age, in one of the New-York morning papers, advertises for an interchange of sentiments with a lady of congenial feelings and disposition. By his address being directed to widows, we take it for granted that all unmarried ladies are interdicted.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Saturday, Feb. 23. In senate, the following bills were read a third time and passed: to authorize and regulate the inspection of shingles; to prevent the destruction of fish in Beach pond, situated in the counties of Westchester and Putnam. The remainder of the day was spent in a discussion of the bill to fix the salaries of the chancellor and justices of the supreme court.

In assembly, the following bills were read a third time and passed; to amend the charter of the New-York hospital; to alter the time of holding the annual meeting of the supervisors in the county of Orleans; for the construction of a lateral canal from the Cayuga and Seneca canal to East Cayuga village; providing for the building of a bridge over Oak Orchard Creek in the county of Orleans.

Monday, Feb. 25. In senate, it was resolved, that a committee be appointed to inquire and report upon the expediency of repealing the charter of the Life and Fire insurance company, the Hudson insurance company, the Mount Hope loan company, the United States lombard association, and the Franklin manufacturing company of the city of New-York. The bill authorizing the supervisors of Jefferson county to levy a tax, was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, Mr. Savage gave notice of his intention to bring in a bill effectually to suppress the exhibition of shows. A return was received from the savings bank in Brooklyn; ordered printed.

Tuesday, Feb. 26. In senate, resolved, that the canal board report to the senate the amount of the various kinds of property which passed Buffalo, Port Byron, Utica and West Troy on the Erie and Champlain canals during the last year. The bill to fix the salaries of the chancellor, justices of the supreme court, and circuit justices, was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, the bill to incorporate the Monroe Bank was finally passed, yeas 90, noes 12; 26 members absent. An act for the relief of Louisville academy was read a third time and passed. On motion of Mr. Granger, resolved that the canal board be requested to embrace in their report under the resolution of this house of the 19th inst., their opinion of the repairing of the Buffalo harbour, and whether the same should be considered as attached to the Erie canal. The bill for the payment of certain moneys to the minor children of Dr. WITT CLINTON, elicited a debate in committee of the whole that occupied the attention of the house the remainder of the day. The bill passed the committee, and was ordered engrossed for a third reading.

Wednesday, Feb. 27. In senate, it was resolved that the petition of Stephen Ross and others, for a side cut of the canal near Lansingburgh, be referred to the canal commissioners, with direction to report to the senate their opinion thereon, and the effect that the said canal may have upon the interests of the state.

In assembly, a communication was received from the comptroller transmitting a report from the commissioners of the fund for the relief of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier, during the late war, and referred to a select committee. A bill for the relief of James Mallory and others was read a third time and passed. The remainder of the day was spent in debating on the bill for the payment of certain moneys to the minor heirs of Dr. WITT CLINTON, which was read a third time, and lost; but a motion for reconsideration was unanimously adopted, consequently the bill still lies on the table.

Thursday, Feb. 28. In senate, the bill to divide the town of Halfmoon, in Saratoga county was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, reports were received from the Middle district bank, and the bank of Albany; ordered printed. Bills read a third time and passed: for the relief of the vestry of St. John’s church in Brooklyn; authorizing the canal commissioners to pay Asa Broadwell the balance due to him; granting additional powers to the commissioners of the land office; to correct an error in an assessment in the fourth ward of the city of Albany; and to incorporate the Hudson horticultural society. The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. D. M. Wescott in the chair, on the bill to suppress duelling. Much debate and some political cross-firing followed till after the usual hour of adjournment, on the motion of Mr. Williams to lay the bill on the table, which was lost. The report of the committee was finally agreed to, and the bill was ordered engrossed for a third reading.

Friday, Feb. 29. In senate, the annual report of the regents of the university, accompanied by the returns of most of the incorporated academies, of meteorological observations taken at their respective institutions, was received and ordered printed.

In assembly, returns were received from the bank of America, the City bank, the Union bank, the Merchants bank, and the Farmers’ bank in the city of New-York, and a report from the Dutchess county bank, which were severally ordered printed. Bills read a third time and passed: relative to the Fulton bank in the city of New-York; and to suppress duelling.

POETRY.

STANZAS,

ON THE DEATH OF ADMIRAL SIR PETER PARKER.

BY LORD BYRON.

There is a tear for all that die,
A mourner o'er the humblest grave;
But nations swell the funeral cry,
And triumph weeps above the brave.

For them is sorrows purest sigh
O'er ocean's heaving bosom sent:
In vain their bones unburied lie,
All earth becomes their monument!

A tomb is theirs on every page,
An epitaph on every tongue;
The present hour, the future age,
For them bewail,—to them belong.

For them the voice of festal mirth
Grows hushed, their name the only sound;
While deep remembrance pours to worth
The goblet's tributary round.

A theme to crowds that knew them not,
Lamented by admiring foes,
Who would not share their glorious lot?
Who would not die the death they chose?

And, gallant Parker! thus enshrined
Thy life, thy fall, thy fame shall be,
And early valour, glowing, find
A model in thy memory.

But there are breasts that bled with thee
In wo, that glory can not quell;
And shuddering hear of victory,
Where one so dear, so dauntless, fell.
When shall they turn to mourn thee less?
When cease to hear thy cherished name?
Time can not teach forgetfulness,
When grief's full heart is fed by fame.

Alas! for them, though not for thee,
They can not choose but weep the more;
Deep for the dead the grief must be,
Who ne'er gave cause to mourn before.

CAUTION FOR YOUTH.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

My little dears, who learn to read,
Pray early learn to shun
That very silly thing indeed,
Which people call a pun.
Read Entick's rules, and 'twill be found
How simple an offence
It is to make the self-same sound
Afford a double sense.

For instance, ale may make you ail,
Your aunt an ant may kill,
You in a vale may buy a veil,
And Bill may pay the hill.
Or if to France your bark you steer,
At Dover it may be,
A peer appears upon the pier,
Who, blind, still goes to sea.

Thus one might say, when to a treat
Good friends accept our greeting,
'Tis meet that men who meet to eat,
Should eat their meat when meeting.
Brawn on the boards no bore indeed,
Although from bow prepared;
Nor can the fowl on which we feed
Foul feeding be declared.

Thus one ripe fruit may be a pear,
And yet be pared again,
And still be one, which seemeth rare,
Until we do explain.
It therefore should be all your aim
To speak with simple ease;
For who, however fond of game,
Would choose to swallow hair?

A fat man's gait may make us smile,
Who has no gate to close!

The farmer sitting on his stille,
No stylish person knows.
Perfumers men of scents must be;
Some Scilly men are bright;
A brown man oft deep read we see,
A black a wicked wight.

Most wealthy men good manors have,
However vulgar they;
And actors still the harder slave,
The oftener they play.
So poets can't the baize obtain,
Unless their tailors choose;
While grooms and coachmen not in vain
Each evening seek the meas.

The dyer who by dying lives,
A dire life maintains;
The glazier, it is known, receives
His profits from his panes.
By gardeners thyme is tied 'tis true,
When Spring is in its prime;
But time or tide won't wait for you
If you are tied to time.

Then now you see, my little dears,
The way to make a pun;
A trick which you, through coming years,
Should sedulously shun.
The fault admits of no defence;
For wheresoe'er 'tis found,
You sacrifice the sound for sense,
The sense is never sound.

So let your word and actions too,
One single meaning prove;
And, just in all you say or do,
You 'll gain esteem and love;
In mirth and play no harm you 'll know,
When duty's task is done;
But parents ne'er should let you go
Un-pun-ished for a pun.

ADDRESS TO THE MOON.

"Daughter of heaven, fair art thou, &c."

OSSIAN.

Daughter of beauty, born of heavenly race,
Sweet is the silence of thy midnight face,
Fair in the east appears thy silvery ray,
The gems of evening hail thee on their way,
The bending clouds their darker tints destroy,
Smile in thy face, and brighten into joy.
Who, in the sky, can match the queen of night?
The stars obscured are feeble in thy sight;
Far from thy glance a bashful mien they keep,
And hide their eyes like modesty asleep;
Where, when thy face of beauty melts away,
Where dost thou fly, and whither dost thou stray?
Hast thou a hall like Ossian there to go,
Or dost thou dream within the shade of wo?
Hath every sister lost a heavenly throne,
Or why, at eve, rejoicest thou alone?
Yes, sweetest beam, thy glories now are low,
And soft thou leavest heaven to tell thy wo!
But thou shalt also know eternal wane,
The twilight sky shall court thy steps in vain;
Thy sinking in the west no more to rise,
Will cause the stars to triumph in the skies;
They, whom thy lovely beams could once destroy,
Will lift their heads, and weave the song of joy!

MATRIMONIAL FELICITY.

FROM THE NEW-YORK COLLEGIATE MISCELLANY.

"But happy they! the happiest of their kind!
Whom gentler stars unite, and in one fate
Their hearts, their fortunes, and their being blend;
'Tis harmony itself that binds their peace."

THOMPSON.

"Think you a little din can daunt mine ears,
That you do tell me of a woman's tongue?"

SHAKESPEARE.

The devil was missing one Sunday morn;
And where do you think he tarried?
Why! in the house ('tis true as you're born)
Of a couple newly married.

He liked it at first: and why, forsooth?
They were so kind and so loving!
Ergo, so happy, (for that's a truth
Which never, you know, needs proving)—

That he longed between them, like Adam and Eve,
A trouble or two to be sowing,
For no bad purpose, I'd have you believe,
But to keep his hand agoing.

But scarce had he made himself at home,
When he saw that a storm was brewing;
Satan wondered to see it work and foam;
Said he,—“this is none of my doing.

“This beats!—why below I've never heard such,
Where they halloo with might and main.
I'm used to a noise,—but too much is too much!
So I 'll even pop down again!”

OMNIPRESENCE.

FROM THE NEW-YORK MORNING COURIER.

And art thou here—Eternal!—thou
Before whose thunder-circled brow
The spirit eyes of heaven
In silence bow—upon whose throne
May never gaze the living one—
Whose morn and even,
And day and year, and first and last,
Are one eternity,
While time rolls on, unheeded past
The great immensity—
Whose will the sea's strong confines broke,
At whose light whisper death awoke—
Oh, where may be
Thy all-terrible lordliness,
While earth is with thy presence blessed?

Tremble, vain mortal, in thy pride,
At the Jehovah by thy side.
The lightnings' flash from yonder sky
Are to the glances of his eye
A feeble beam:
One ray from the eternal fane
Would wither, turn to dust again
Existence's dream
Ye need not rise in trembling to
Yon azure sphere;
Ye need not seek his shrine below
To find him here,—
But by the path and by the bed
Jehovah deigns with dust to tread.

Oh, if when pleasure's cup is full,
Thy world so bright and beautiful
Should win idolatry,—
Quick wrap in clouds the fairy scene,
And snatch each loved one from between Us and thy majesty.

NORRIS.

FOUND IN AN ANCIENT ENGLISH CHURCH-YARD.

Here lies the bodie of old Will Loveland,
He's put to bed at last with a shovel, and
Eased of expenses for raiment and food,
Which all his life tyme he would fain have eschewed:
He grudged his house keeping—his children's support,
And laid in his meates of the cage magge sorte;
No fyshe or fowle touched he, when 'twas dearly bought,
But a green taile, or herrings, a score for a groate.

No friend to the nee'tv.

His wealth gathered speedy,
And he never did naught but evil;
He lived like a hogg,
And dyed like a dogg,
And now he rides post to the devil.

MASONICK RECORD.

ODE,

For the opening of the Masonick Hall, New-York, 5827.

Can costliest gems that grace a monarch's brow,
Or waving plumes on the proud victor's crest;
Can aught on earth such heaven born joy bestow,
As that which lives within a mason's breast?
Best gift of the Eternal Good,
Bond of the enlightened Brotherhood!

The sympathy that yields a smile or tear,
As fortune doles the various lot to man;
To virtuous suffering bends the attentive ear,
And as the tale unfolds extends the hand,
With the warm grasp of Brotherhood
And bounty of the Eternal Good.

What cheers the path through life's uneven vale,
Whether suns brighten or black clouds descend;
What guides our bark through zephyr or through gale,
And bids us still with holy hope depend
On him the great Eternal Good,
Whose arm protects the Brotherhood?

And while this day an altar we erect,
In order due, taught by the widow's son,
In honour of the world's Grand Architect,
Like our wise Master, Royal Solomon,
We'll bow before the Eternal Good,
With praises from the Brotherhood.

The orphan's cry, the widowed mother's prayer,
Within these walls shall ne'er be heard in vain;
The rightful objects of the lodge's care,
Their tears shall cease, and smiles shall beam again.
Such duty hath the Eternal Good
Enjoined upon the Brotherhood.

And, as in ancient times our chosen band,
With cleaving day and pillar of fire by night,
Were guided to the promised land,
So shall the consecrated Sons of Light
Still trust in him the Eternal Good
Whose presence guides the Brotherhood.

THE PRINCIPLES OF MASONRY.

An Address on the Principles of Masonry, delivered in the Church at Frankfort, Kentucky, on the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist, June 24, A. L. 5823, at the request of the Lodge, No 4:

BY AMOS KENDALL.

Brethren, there is no vice more easily contracted, more difficult to conquer, or more fatal to all the nobler parts of man, than intemperance. It would seem, that the grand enemy of our race, could not have invented a more effectual weapon to extirpate from the human bosom, all propensity to goodness, and present man as a being degraded and lost beyond redemption. Fenced round with temperate habits, many virtues flourish in the human heart, yielding the fruits of peace and joy. But the maddening draught breaks down every barrier which philosophy, masonry or religion erects, lets in every loathsome and destructive vice, and doubly ruins man. Heaven has placed reason in the watchtower of the human frame, as the wakeful sentinel to guard the avenues of our souls and repel the inroads of appetite and passion. But he who takes the intoxicating cup, stabs this faithful sentinel, throws open the citadel of his heart, and yields himself a willing victim to the enemies of his nature. How did Alexander weep over his murdered friend, whom in a drunken, furious moment, he had stabbed! How does every intemperate man mourn over the follies, the vices, and the crimes, into the commission of which, this habit leads him! Whether we regard it as reducing the man of sense to the simplicity of a child, or rousing the peaceful citizen to the fury of a madman, or casting God's image, a senseless beast, into the grovelling dirt, this vice is every way loathsome and detestable. How can man respect or woman love a drunkard, a brute so lost! What regard can he have for a wife, children, friends or country? In sober moments, must he not look with utter loathing even on himself, and be acutely conscious, that he does not deserve the respect, protection or society of men!

Masonry condemns this vice in the severest terms. Its practice is hostile to all her principles, and utterly prostrates all her benign influences. Her gentle admonitions are drowned in the noise of a debauch, and she ceases to reason with the intoxicated madman. To attempt exciting a sense of virtue and decency among cups, is as vain as attempting to drown the rattling thunder with the musick of the lute. Masons should avoid this vice as a deadly enemy. Its approaches are artful and insidious. There is a kind of gentlemanly drunkenness, which sometimes presents us the silly, good natured shadows of respectable citizens walking our streets, half beasts and half men—beasts, with the power of speech! Is there any thing great, good or honourable in this? I pity degraded reason when I see it thus, and wish from my heart, that the bodies from which it is so nearly expelled, might, for a time, assume the hoofs and hair of that quadruped to which their minds are so analogous. How can a man thus degrade himself, as if there were pleasure or honour in playing the brute? Masons who do it repeatedly and habitually, show little respect for the principles they profess, and prove themselves unworthy of our order.

Not second to this vice, is the practice of profanity. For using the name of Deity on every trivial occasion, there is no excuse. If the profane man disbelieve the existence of a God, how ridiculous it is to swear by his name! If he believe it, how horrible is his crime! The mason has not the paltry apology of the atheist, and cannot shield himself from criminality, under the poor plea that he has merely been ridiculous; for in becoming a mason, he solemnly acknowledges his belief in the existence of a Deity. That very book which he has adopted as the rule of his faith, tells him in Sinai's thunders, "thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain;" and in the christian dispensation, it says to him in milder tones, "swear not at all." With the admission that God exists, and with these injunctions from his own mouth, how can a mason be profane! When he looks round and sees all nature, in the spirit of harmony and benevolence, from her hills and dales, in her winds and clouds, from her sun, planets and stars, shout a God, how can he use that sacred name, which ought never to be uttered but with love and reverence, to give bitterness to angry curses, or add importance to the most trivial remark? If some masons believe what they profess, how thoughtless, or how heaven-daring is their conduct! If, without thinking of the Great Supreme, they use his sacred name, they are criminally thoughtless; and if they do think of him, they are bidding heaven defiance, and attempting to hurl back the Thunderer's bolt! The Bible tells us, that "for every idle word, God will bring us into judgement." What then will be the fate of those who wilfully and perseveringly use a word infinitely worse than idle! My brethren, if any of you are addicted to this vice, it is your duty instantly to abandon it. Every time you needlessly utter the name of God, you violate the principles of masonry, and break a direct command of God himself.

Masonry is not confined to things present, nor from man only does she look for a reward. The happiest life is often chequered with good and evil, and an unjust world sometimes covers the most virtuous actions with infamy. But masons should not be influenced by the plaudits or the censures of a moment. It is painful to a good heart to bear the scorn of mankind; but what is that to the pangs of guilt! If a virtuous action bring censure and a virtuous one praise, which should a good mason or a good man choose? What is censure to a pure heart? It may give pain; but it cannot kindle the consuming fire of self-condemnation. What is praise to a guilty soul! It is oil poured upon glowing coals. But rewards and punishments are not equal here, and masonry as well as religion points to another world, where all shall receive strict justice, tempered only with mercy to the repenting soul. It shews us a ladder spanning with the rounds of Faith, Hope and Charity from earth to heaven. After having mounted that ladder, when Faith is lost in sight, Hope is swallowed up in fruition, and Charity alone remains, it is then and there, the perfect mason finds the reward of all his toils and sufferings. You have participated in a masonick funeral. You have thrown sprigs of evergreen into the grave of a deceased brother. Did those sprigs inculcate no lesson? Did the act of casting them into the narrow mansion, seem as indifferent to you as the rattling of the clods upon the coffin? No; if you thought as a mason, it was the evidence of your hope that our deceased brother was not left there to rot, but was then flourishing an immortal evergreen on the mountains of eternal light, beneath a sky whose sun-beams are love and whose showers are charity.

It is solemn to be the actors in such a scene; but what is that to being its object! Each one of us, my brethren, must be stretched in the black coffin, lifeless and pale, and yonder sun's light shut out from us forever. We must be borne to the grave and let down by others' hands into the damp, narrow mansion. Sprigs of evergreen, wet with affection's tears, will drop around us, and clods will rattle on our coffins, as if knocking at death's door to welcome a returned brother clod. Nothing but a pile of earth will witness where we are, and in a few revolving years even that will sink, and men with careless foot will tread above our heads, unconscious that a fellow mortal sleeps below. Ah, what a sleep is that! How dreadful, how mysterious, and how long! When shall we awake! how will this world then look! and what will be our destiny! To prepare for these scenes is the business of life. Our residence on earth is but a pilgrimage which we are directed to make, not like the Mussulman's, to visit and decorate the senseless marble which contains the ashes of a deceased prophet; but to discipline our own hearts and scatter joy and happiness through the whole extent of our journey.

My brethren, forms are important because they cover substance; but while we observe the forms, let us not forget the substance of masonry. Our principles teach us to forgive injuries and live as brothers, admonishing each other with mildness and correcting each others' faults with charity. Are these duties performed! Can we receive every mason as a brother! Can we forgive all injuries, bury revenge, extinguish hatred, and do good to him who has injured us? Alas! how obstinate is the heart of man! how unwilling to submit to those rules, the excellence and justice of which it readily acknowledges; how ready to rebel against the dictates of reason and philosophy, and the injunctions of masonry and religion! But it becomes us to struggle with our evil propensities, check every unruly passion that invades our hearts, and endeavour to bear about us that serenity of mind which pervades heaven. Then will the performance of every duty be accompanied with a foretaste of our celestial reward. Then, resting on Hope's firm anchor and spreading the wings of Faith, we may hail death as a kind angel who cuts the cords that bind us to life's torturing rack, and soar above the starry canopy, where the bright gates of the celestial temple wide unfolding, will receive us into the blissful presence of our Eternal Grand Master.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

At a special meeting of the Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons of the State of Maryland, convened at the Masonick Hall, in Baltimore, the 21st day of February, A. L. 5828—

The M. E. Grand High Priest announced to the Grand Chapter the great loss that the Masonick Family, and especially the companions of this degree, have sustained in the sudden translation from his sphere of usefulness here, to the Grand Chapter above, of our distinguished companion, the M. E. DE WITT CLINTON, General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons in these United States; and this Grand Chapter being duly impressed and bowed down by this bereavement, with which it hath pleased the Supreme Architect of the Universe to afflict them: therefore

Resolved, that this Grand Chapter sincerely sympathize with the General Grand Chapter and the Masonick Fraternity at large, together with the family of the deceased, in the death of the illustrious companion DE WITT CLINTON.

Resolved, that in token of our estimation of his character and virtues, and grief for the loss of our distinguished companion and General Grand High Priest, the Grand Chapter Room be clothed in mourning for six months.

Resolved, that the M. E. Grand High Priest be requested to transmit a copy of these proceedings to the General Grand Chapter, and to the family of the deceased, and that they be published in the several papers of this city. By order,
TH. PHENIX, G. Sec'y.

The Holy and Undivided Trinity Encampment in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, convened on the evening of the 21st February, when the following resolutions were read and unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, that, most highly appreciating the character and merits of DE WITT CLINTON, our distinguished countryman, late Governor of New-York, and General Grand Master of the General Grand Encampment of the United States, we, the members of the Holy and Undivided Trinity Encampment located in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, do most cordially unite with the Sir Knights of associated encampments in lamenting the decease of this our illustrious Commander and most eminent Sir Knight.

Resolved, that as an expression of our esteem the Encampment and its furniture be decked with the usual badges of mourning, to continue six months from this date. Extract from the minutes.
ROBERT PIGGOT, Recorder.

At a meeting of Enos Lodge No. 323, at the Masonick Hall, in Bath, Steuben county, February 25, A. L. 5828:—

Resolved, that the members of this Lodge sincerely deplore the death of our eminent and worthy brother, DE WITT CLINTON, late governor of this state.

Resolved, that we lament this afflictive dispensation, not merely from the masonick virtues and elevation of the deceased, but from a high sense of his publick and private worth, as exemplified in the numerous responsible stations to which he has been repeatedly called by the voice of his fellow citizens, and which he has filled with such distinguished honour to himself and to his country.

Resolved, that we fully approve the proceedings of the meeting of our fellow citizens, held on Thursday evening last, and that, as a testimony of respect to the memory of the departed GREAT MAN, we will wear the usual badge of mourning on the left arm, for thirty days.

Resolved, that these proceedings be signed by the secretary, and published.
REUBEN ROBIE, Sec'y.

At an emergent meeting of the members of Olive Branch Chapter, No. 99, and Bloomburgh Lodge, No. 310, held at the lodge room in Bloomburgh, Sullivan county, February 16, 5828; M. E. Samuel G. Dimmick in the chair.

A communication having been received of the very sudden death of the R. W. MARTIN HOFFMAN, Past Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of this State,—and of the R. W. DE WITT CLINTON, Past Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of this State, and M. E. H. P. of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, it was on motion of Comp. A. C. Niven,

Resolved, that we deeply deplore the loss which we have sustained by the decease of our Past Grand Masters DE WITT CLINTON, and MARTIN HOFFMAN, whose virtues and talents, as men and as masons, have shed a lustre upon the masonick institution.

Resolved, that as a mark of regard for the memory of these illustrious dead, the brethren and companions of this lodge and chapter, together with all sojourning brethren and companions, be recommended to assume the usual badge of mourning for sixty days.

At an extra meeting of Sullivan Lodge, No. 272, convened at the lodge room in the village of Monticello, Sullivan county, February 19, 5828:—

Resolved unanimously, that the brethren of this lodge, as a testimony of their respect and affection for their deceased brother, DE WITT CLINTON, and of heartfelt sorrow for his sudden and ever to be lamented loss, will assume the usual badge of mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

At a meeting of the Niagara Royal Arch Chapter and Western Star Lodge, of the village of Buffalo, in the county of Niagara, convened on the 18th Feb. for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of paying due respect to the memory of our illustrious fellow citizen and brother, DE WITT CLINTON, late Governor of this State and General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, who departed this life at the city of Albany on the 11th inst:—

Resolved, that the companions and brothers of this chapter and lodge, assemble on Thursday, the 21st inst. at the lodge room in Buffalo, and from thence proceed to the Episcopal church, when an eulogy will be pronounced on the talents and virtues of the deceased, and that the companions and brethren of the neighbouring chapters and lodges, and brethren generally, are respectfully invited to unite with us in celebrating the funeral obsequies of our deceased brother.

Resolved, that the companions and brethren of this chapter and lodge, will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days, and that the neighbouring brethren be invited to do the same. By order.

J. G. CAMP, B. WILCOX,
B. CARYL, D. BURTON,
Z. BARKER, G. W. ALLEN,
M. CASE, Committee.

At an adjourned meeting of the Niagara Chapter and Western Star Lodge, held on the evening of the 18th February, 5828, it was further

Resolved, that the lodge room be dressed in mourning, for the space of three months, in honour of the deceased, and as a testimony of deep regret for his sudden death.

Resolved, that the citizens of the village of Buffalo, and the surrounding country, who feel disposed to unite in the solemnities of the day, be invited to attend on the above occasion. By order of the committee.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

TALMA'S HEART.

The great French tragedian died of stricture of the rectum, which reduced that intestine to the diameter of three lines, causing great accumulation above it and ultimately rupture of the coats, with effusion into the peritoneal cavity. He laboured under another complaint, however, which must, sooner or later, have caused his death, and which is more interesting, as having been more immediately connected with his profession. The heart adhered to the pericardium at its apex, forming a dark coloured tumour, connected with the ventricle, and which in reality was a true aneurism. The walls of this sac appeared to consist of the pericardium and serious membrane of the heart glued together, and containing layers of fibrin, while the muscular fibres of the ventricle, considerably attenuated, were partially extended over the tumour. The size of the aneurism was about that of a small egg; it had displaced the point of the left ventricle, which was thus thrown a little forward. The origin of this pathological condition of the heart, which was not suspected during his late illness, may perhaps fairly be dated from the following occurrence related by Talma's family. Some years ago after great exertion in playing the character of Hamlet, he suddenly felt a sensation of burning heat in the region of the heart, and a sensation which lasted one or two days, but which did not attract any serious attention. From this time he frequently suffered from palpitation, particularly after professional exertions. It is probable that, in a mind like Talma's, passions though artificially excited by the cunning of the scene, and the intense and absorbing manner in which he entered into the character he represented, may have produced the same effect upon his frame, as moral impressions, from external causes, are wont to do to others; thus assimilating in their effects the real and imaginary in the miseries of life. It is probable, too, that had this great tragedian not laboured under the obstruction which proved fatal, he would have expired in one of those tempests of passion which held the spectators in dreadful admiration, and thus (to borrow the enthusiastic language of his countrymen) he would have died au milieu de la gloire.

SHEEP AND WOOL.

[Further translated from the "Bulletin des Sciences."]

Dry pastures, fallow lands and lands covered with stubble afford the best nourishment for sheep. The plants and grasses that grow on marshy, wet soils, commonly contain acid, deleterious substances, which occasion diseases. Disorders are also produced by the grass being too often wet by the dew, or by frequent rains. Many sheep farmers believe that their flocks have no need of drink when they are in pastures. This opinion is erroneous. It is seldom that plants contain juice enough to quench their thirst. [There are different opinions on this subject here as well as in Germany. We have known sheep kept in a pasture, where there was no water, for six or eight weeks in succession, in a dry season; they appeared to thrive, and when put into another pasture where there was water, manifested no desire to drink.]

Acorns and the leaves of the elm and poplar are excellent food in the winter, to correct the disposition which sheep may have to the scab and other diseases. Many people give their sheep grain in order to increase their gain in wool. They are in error; grain increases the greasiness and quantity of the wool, but makes it coarser, and thereby diminishes the value of the fleece. Sheep require cleanliness and air: in dry weather they do not need to be shut up, for they fear the cold less than any other animal. The practice of keeping sheep confined amongst heaps of manure, deprived of air and exercise, is a fatal one.

M. Ribbe speaks of the small pox (petite-verole), prevailing among the sheep in Germany, and says vaccination is the best means of preserving them from it. He does not think that salt is indispensable for sheep.

The greatest market for wool is that of Breslau, in Prussian Silesia. The quantity brought to the fairs in that city in June and October, 1820, was 190,000 bales. There are annual fairs for the sale of wool, &c. at Berlin, Dantzic, Magdeburg, Leipzig, Bautzen, Vienna, Pest, &c. Much of the wool of Germany is exported to England.

CASE OF PRECOCIOUS GROWTH.

Bar Eckhofefer was born in 1806, of healthy and robust parents, of ordinary stature. Her mother had had six children, all of whom had been very strong. At birth, the subject of the present account was twenty-three inches long, and weighed about two pounds more than an ordinary infant. The fontanels of the cranium were not ossified. The growth of the child was very rapid. From the eighth day the mother's milk was deemed insufficient, and broth was given to it. Fifteen days after birth, four teeth appeared; but, excepting the unusual growth of the child, nothing extraordinary was remarked, until the seventh month. At this time she was weaned, and although her food was not of a very digestible quality, her health continued uninterrupted. She now began to walk. The incisor teeth now protruded through the gums, and the hair, which had hitherto been fair, became brown, and grew so fast as to reach the middle of the back. At nine months old she exhibited every sign of puberty. After the ninth month she did not for some time grow with such rapidity, but at six years of age she was three feet nine inches in height, and weighed 4 pounds (Venetian weight.) In the 12th year she died of fever.

EXTERNAL APPLICATION OF INTERNAL MEDICINES.

M. Bally, physician of La Pitie, continues to experiment on this subject. He considers that, as obstacles frequently present themselves to the internal exhibition of medicines, we ought to seek some other plan. The epidermis would, in most instances, prove a great obstacle to the introduction of medicines through the skin; this, therefore, is removed by the previous application of a blister, to permit more free absorption. The following are some of the principal results:—The salts of morphine quickly show their influence on the brain and nervous system. The pupils contract, the eyes become brilliant dysurid and ischurid: nausea and vomiting freely are sometimes induced. A sense of itching exists to a troublesome degree, chiefly in the nasal fossæ, and frequently numerous papulæ appear on the skin. The extract of Belladonna rubbed on the dorsal side of the feet, produces all the effects which result from it when internally prescribed; such as extreme dilation of the pupils, and a diminution of the powers of vision. BONES OF THE MAMMOTH.

The fossil remains of this colossal animal lately discovered by our countrymen in the Burman empire, imbedded with those of the rhinoceros, ruminating animals, tortoises, and crocodiles, have given rise to much curious speculation among the geologists of France. It seems that up to this moment the mammoth's bones had never been discovered in equatorial regions. It was thought therefore, to have been designed by nature to inhabit cold countries, like the fossil elephant, which was discovered entire on the banks of the Lena, covered with a coat of thick fur. Geologists regard this discovery as very important, as it must give rise to fresh discussions and inquiries, which, if they determine nothing, will at least amuse for a while; and may, in the end, lead to something like a satisfactory conclusion.

ARTIFICIAL LEECHES.

This instrument has been invented by M. Salandiere, and acts as an equivalent to leeches. Its advantages consist in extracting the precise quantity of blood that is wanted to be taken from the patient; in withdrawing the fluid with every desirable degree of despatch and gentleness; in not causing that repugnance, which naturally attends the application of disgusting insects or worms; in not causing any injury; and, finally in being practicable in every station, climate, situation, and country. This instrument is manufactured at Paris by the Engineer Dumontiez. [Medical Repertory.]

THE GATHERER.

DRAMATIC SKETCH OF A THIN MAN.

A long lean man, with his limbs rambling—no way to reduce him to compass, unless you could double him like a pocket rule—he'd lie on the bed of Ware like a cross on a Good Friday bun—standing still, he is a pilaster without a base—he appears rolled out or run up against a wall—so thin that his front face is but a moiety of a profile—if he stands cross-legged, he looks like a Caduceus, and put him in a fencing attitude, you would take him for a piece of chevaux-de-frise—to make any use of him, it must be as a ponton or a fishing-rod—when his wife's by, he follows like a note of admiration—see them together, one's a mast and the other all hulk—she's a dome, and he's built together like a glass-house—when they part, you wonder to see the steeple separate from the chancel, and were they to embrace, he must hang round her neck like a skein of thread on a lace-maker's bolster—to sing her praise, you should choose a rondeau; and to celebrate him, you must write all Alexandrines.

ROGERS, LORD DUDLEY AND WARD.

The author of the "Pleasures of Memory" was not, when I knew him, some years ago, the indefatigable punster it is now the fashion to represent him. Even then, it was the fashion to liken the pale visage of the poet to all sorts of funeral things, Tristissima mortis imago! But Ward's (now Lord Dudley) were the most felicitous resemblances.—Rogers had been at Spa, and was telling Ward that the place was so full, that he could not so much as find a bed to lie in, and that he was obliged on that account, to leave it. "Dear me," replied Ward, "was there no room in the churchyard?" At another time, Murray was showing him a portrait of Rogers, observing, that "it was done to the life." "To the death, you mean," replied Ward.—Amongst other amusing sallies of the same kind, was his asking Rogers—"Why don't you keep your hearse, Rogers!—you can well afford it."

MASTER M'GOING'S MAXIMS.

[From the Boston Literary Gazette.]

If you have a puny enemy, buy him; if a potent one, beat him.

A debauchee is loved by only half of the world—a drunkard despised by the whole.

Post-notes are the best plaster for outward wounds, but the essence of Two-lips the sovereignest thing on earth for inward bruises.

Ambition has a keen scent, but a short sight; it can smell a crown, but sees not the hair-suspended sword above it.

Love never stands upon ceremony but vanity can never dispense with it.

Time may retrieve every thing—but nothing can retrieve time.

Reproach is like a harrow tooth—it opens interstices to sow the seeds of Repentance.

Political Colossuses in other countries are wonders, in ours weasels.

Modesty to the female character is like saltpetre to beef, imparting a blush while it preserves its purity.

Love is like a cat's paw;—it conceals its fangs till it has fastened on its prey.

HOW TO TREAT AN AUDIENCE.

An actor in a German Theatre, a short time ago, having been much hissed by the audience, and supposing it to arise from an unjust prejudice on their parts, suddenly came forward, and addressed them as follows:—"Gentlemen—It is evident that you have come here with a determination of hissing, abusing, and ridiculing me; this is your only intention—this is your only desire; mine is, that you may all break your necks in going out of the Theatre. I have not another word to say to you." He then, with the utmost coolness, continued his part. [Furet de Londres.]

CHARLES V.

When the emperor Charles the fifth retired from the throne, his habit of teasing mankind seems to have followed him into the convent. He was one morning extremely solicitous to awaken a young monk to go to matins at a very early hour. The monk, scarcely roused by his efforts, said to him with some asperity, "Is it not enough for your majesty to have so long disturbed the peace of the universe, but must you also break in upon the repose of a poor insignificant monk?"

FACETIOUS PREACHERS.

There are some persons, who may think that, "Dullness is sacred in a sound divine," and that the most rigid austerity of manners should always be preserved in the pulpit. There has, however, been a species of preachers, who, while they enlightened and instructed their auditors by their moral obligations, and by teaching the great truths of Christianity, have done it by comparisons the most simple, and have even sometimes descended to amuse with their jokes. There are very few who have not heard of the Reverend Rowland Hill. In preaching a charity sermon at Wapping, he commenced by saying—"I come to preach to sinners—to great sinners,—yea, to wapping sinners." [Percy Anecdotes.]

DIVINE WORSHIP.

When Archbishop Fenelon was Almoner to Louis XIV. his majesty was astonished one Sunday to find, instead of the usual crowded congregation, only himself and his attendants, the priest, and the other officers of the chapel. "What is the meaning of this?" said the king; the prelate answered, "I caused it to be given out, that your majesty did not attend chapel to-day, in order that you might see, who came here to worship God, and who to flatter the king."

ART OF DRINKING WINE.

The order of taking wine at dinner has not been sufficiently observed in this country. "There is," as the immortal bard beautifully expresses it, "a reason in roasting eggs;" and if there is a rationale of eating, why should there not be a system of drinking? The red wines should always precede the white, except in the case of a French dinner, when the oysters should have a libation of Chablis, or Sauterne. I do not approve of white Hermitage with oysters. The Burgundies should follow—the purple Chambertin or odorous Romanee. A single glass of Champagne or Hock, or any other white wine, may then intervene between the Cote Rotie and Hermitage; and last, not least in our dear love, should come the cool and sweet-scented Claret. With the creams and the ices should come the Malaga, Rivesaltes, or Grenache; nor with these will Sherry or Madeira harmonize ill. Last of all, should Champagne boil up in argent foam, and be sanctified by an offering of Tokay, poured from a glass so small, that you might fancy it formed of diamond. [Literary Pocket Book.]

On a country shop Keeper.

Cottons and cambricks all adieu,
And muslins too farewell,
Plain, striped, and figured, old and new,
Three quarters, yard, or ell—
By yard and nail, I've measured ye,
As Customers inclined,
The Church yard has now measured me,
And nails my coffin bind—
But my kind and worthy friends,
Who dealt with me below,
I am gone to measure time's long end,
You'll follow me, I know.

SOVEREIGN REMEDIES.

For the gout, toast and water; for bile, exercise; for corns, easy shoes; for blue beavils, blue ruin; for rheumatism, new flannel and patience; for the toothach, pluck it out; for debt, oxalick acid; and for love, matrimony.

It was a maxim of Thomas Orr, Marquess of Dorset, "that never was that man merry that had more than one woman in his bed; one friend in his bosom; one within his heart;" and of the Icqmans, that "a good name is the embalming of the virtuous to an eternity of love and gratitude among posterity."

POPULAR TALES.

THE LADY OF GOLLERUS.

BY T. CROFTON CROKER.

On the shore of Smerwick harbour, one fine summer's morning just at day-break, stood Dick Fitzgerald, "shogging the dudeen," which may be translated, smoking his pipe. The sun was gradually rising behind the lofty Brandon, the dark sea was getting green in the light, and the mists clearing away out of the valleys, went rolling and curling like the smoke from the corner of Dick's mouth. "Tis just the pattern of a pretty morning," said Dick, taking the pipe from between his lips, and looking towards the distant ocean, which lay as still and tranquil as a tomb of polished marble. "Well, to be sure," continued he, after a pause, "tis mighty lonesome to be talking to one's self by way of company, and not to have another soul to answer one—nothing but the child of one's own voice, the echo! I know this, that if I had the luck, or may be the misfortune," said Dick, with a melancholy smile, "to have the woman, it would not be this way with me!—and what in the wide world is a man without a wife? He's no more surely, than a bottle without a drop of drink in it, or dancing without musick, or the left leg of a scissars, or a fishing line without a hook, or any other matter that is no ways complete. Is it not so?" said Dick Fitzgerald, casting his eyes towards a rock upon the strand, which, though it could not speak, stood up as firm, and looked as bold, as ever Kerry witness did. But what was his astonishment, at beholding, just at the foot of that rock, a beautiful young creature combing her hair, which was of a sea-green colour; and now the salt water shining on it, appeared, in the morning light, like melted butter upon cabbage. Dick guessed at once that she was a Merrow, although he had never seen one before, for he spied the cohuleen driuth, or little enchanted cap, which the sea people use for diving down into the ocean, lying upon the strand, near her; and he had heard, that if once he could possess himself of the cap, she would lose the power of going away into the water: so he seized it with all speed, and she, hearing the noise, turned her head about, as natural as any christian. When the Merrow saw that her little diving-cap was gone, the salt tears—doubly salt, no doubt, from her—came trickling down her cheeks, and she began a low mournful cry with just the tender voice of a new-born infant. Dick, although he knew well enough what she was crying for, determined to keep the cohuleen driuth, let her cry never so much, to see what luck would come of it. Yet he could not help pitying her; and when the dumb thing looked up, in his face, and her cheeks all moist with tears, 'twas enough to make any one feel, let alone Dick, who had ever and always, like most of his countrymen, a mighty tender heart of his own. "Don't cry, my darling," said Dick Fitzgerald; but the Merrow, like any bold child, only cried the more for that. Dick sat himself down by her side, and took hold of her hand, by way of comforting her. 'Twas in no particular an ugly hand, only there was a small web between the fingers, as there is in a duck's foot; but 'twas as thin and as white as the skin between egg and shell. "What's your name, my darling?" says Dick, thinking to make her conversant with him; but he got no answer; and he was certain sure now, either that she could not speak, or did not understand him: he therefore squeezed her hand in his, as the only way he had of talking to her. It's the universal language; and there's not a woman in the world, be she fish or lady, that does not understand it. The Merrow did not seem much displeased at this mode of conversation; and making an end of her whining all at once—"Man," says she, looking up in Dick Fitzgerald's face, "Man, will you eat me?" "By all the red petticoats and checkaprons between Dingle and Tralee," cried Dick, jumping up in amazement, "I'd as soon eat myself, my jewel! Is it I eat you, my pet!—Now, 'twas some ugly ill-looking thief of a fish put that notion into your own pretty head, with the nice green hair down upon it, that is so cleanly combed out this morning!" "Man," said the Merrow, "what will you do with me, if you won't eat me?" Dick's thoughts were running on a wife: he saw, at the first glimpse, that she was handsome; but since she spoke, and spoke too like any real woman, he was fairly in love with her. 'Twas the neat way she called him man, that settled the matter entirely. "Fish," says Dick, trying to speak to her after her own short fashion; "fish," says he, "here's my word, fresh and fasting, for you this blessed morning, that I'll make you mistress Fitzgerald before all the world; and that's what I'll do." "Never say the word twice," says she; "I'm ready and willing to be your's, Mister Fitzgerald; but stop, if you please, till I twist up my hair." It was some time before she had settled it entirely to her liking; for she guessed, I suppose, that she was going among strangers, where she would be looked at. When that was done, the Merrow put the comb in her pocket, and then bent down her head and whispered some words to the water that was close to the foot of the rock. Dick saw the murmur of the words upon the top of the sea, going out towards the wide ocean, just like a breath of wind rippling along; and, says he, in the greatest wonder, "Is it speaking you are, my darling, to the salt water?" "It's nothing else," says she, quite carelessly, "I'm just sending word home to my father, not to be waiting breakfast for me; just to keep him from being uneasy in his mind." "And who's your father, my duck?" says Dick. "What!" said the Merrow, "did you never hear of my father? he's the king of the waves, to be sure!" "And yourself, then, is a real king's daughter?" said Dick, opening his two eyes to take a full and true survey of his wife that was to be. "Oh, I'm nothing else but a made man with you, and a king your father;—to be sure he has all the money that's down in the bottom of the sea!" "Money repeated the Merrow, "what's money?" "Tis no bad thing to have when one wants it," replied Dick; "and may be now the fishes have the understanding to bring up whatever you bid them?" "Oh! yes," said the Merrow, "they bring me what I want." "To speak the truth, then," said Dick, "tis a straw bed I have at home before you; and that, I'm thinking, is no ways fitting for a king's daughter; so if 'twould not be displeasing to you, just mention a nice feather bed, with a pair of new blankets; but what am I talking about! may be you have not such things as beds down under the water!" "By all means," said she, "Mr. Fitzgerald—plenty of beds at your service. I've fourteen oyster beds of my own, not to mention one just planting for the rearing of young ones." "You have," says Dick, scratching his head and looking a little puzzled. "'Tis a feather bed I was speaking of—but clearly, yours is the very cut of a decent plan, to have bed and supper handy to each other, that a person when they'd have the one, need never ask for the other." However, bed or no bed, money or no money, Dick Fitzgerald determined to marry the Merrow, and the Merrow had given her consent. Away they went, therefore across the Strand, from Gollerus to Ballyrunnig, where Father Fitzgibbon happened to be that morning. "There are two words to this bargain, Dick Fitzgerald," said his reverence looking mighty glum. "And is it a fishy woman you'd marry!—the Lord preserve us!—Send the scaly creature home to her own people, that's my advice to you, wherever she came from." Dick had the cohuleen driuth in his hand, and was about to give it back to the Merrow, who looked covetously at it, but he thought for a moment, and then, says he—"Please your reverence, she's a king's daughter." "If she was the daughter of fifty kings," said Father Fitzgibbon, "I tell you, you can't marry her, she being a fish." "Please your reverence," said Dick again, in an under tone, "she's as mild and as beautiful as the moon." "If she was as mild and as beautiful as the sun, moon, and stars, all put together, I tell you Dick Fitzgerald," said the priest, stamping his right foot, "you can't marry her, she being a fish!" "But she has all the gold that's down in the sea only for the asking, and I'm a made man if I marry her; and," said Dick, looking up slyly, "I can make it worth any one's while to do the job." "Oh! that alters the case entirely," replied the priest; "why there's some reason now in what you say: why didn't you tell me this before?—marry her by all means if she was ten times a fish. Money, you know, is not to be refused in these bad times, and I may as well have the hanel of it as another, that may be would not take half the pains in counseling you that I have done." So Father Fitzgibbon married Dick Fitzgerald to the Merrow, and like any loving couple, they returned to Gollerus well pleased with each other. Every thing prospered with Dick—he was at the sunny side of the world; the Merrow made the best of wives, and they lived together in the greatest contentment. It was wonderful to see, considering where she had been brought up, how she would busy herself about the house, and how well she nursed the children; for, at the end of three years there were as many young Fitzgeralds—two boys and a girl. In short, Dick was a happy man, and so he might have continued to the end of his days, if he had only the sense to take proper care of what he had got; many another man, however, beside Dick, has not had wit enough to do that. One day, when Dick was obliged to go to Tralee, he left the wife minding the children at home after him, and thinking she had plenty to do without disturbing his fishing tackle. Dick was no sooner gone, than Mrs. Fitzgerald set about cleaning up the house, and chancing to pull down a fishing net what should she find behind it in a hole in the wall, but her own cohuleen driuth. She took it out and looked at it, and then she thought of her father the king, and her mother the queen, and her brothers and sisters, and she felt a longing to go back to them. She sat down on a little stool, and thought over the happy days she had spent under the sea; then she looked at her children, and thought on the love and affection of poor Dick, and how it would break his heart to lose her. "But," says she, "he won't lose me entirely; for I'll come back to him again, and who can blame me for going to see my father and my mother after being so long away from them?" She got up and went towards the door, but came back again to look once more at the child that was sleeping in the cradle. She kissed it gently, and as she kissed it, a tear trembled for an instant in her eye, and then fell on its rosy cheek. She wiped away the tear, and turning to the eldest little girl, told her to take good care of her brothers, and to be a good child herself, until she came back. The Merrow then went down to the strand. The sea was lying calm and smooth, just heaving and glittering in the sun, and she thought she heard a faint sweet singing, inviting her to come down. All her old ideas and feelings came flooding over her mind; and Dick and her children were at the instant forgotten, and placing the cohuleen driuth on her head, she plunged in. Dick came home in the evening, and missing his wife, he asked Kathelin, his little girl, what had become of her mother, but she could not tell him. He then inquired of the neighbours, and he learned that she was seen going towards the strand with a strange-looking thing like a cocked hat in her hand. He returned to his cabin to search for the cohuleen driuth. It was gone, and the truth now flashed upon him. Year after year did Dick Fitzgerald wait expecting the return of his wife, but he never saw her more. Dick never married again, always thinking that the Merrow would sooner or later return to him, and nothing could ever persuade him but that her father the king kept her below by main force; "for," said Dick, "she surely would not of herself give up her husband and her children." While she was with him, she was so good a wife in every respect, that to this day she is spoken of in the tradition of the country as the pattern for one, under the name of the LADY OF GOLLERUS.

[From the Manuscript.]

THE ILLUSTRIOUS DEAD

All that's bright must fade,
The brightest still the fleetest:
All that's sweet was made,
But to be lost, when sweetest.

T. MOORE.

There is something sublimely affecting in the contemplation of the illustrious dead. We can follow ordinary persons to the grave, and hallow their sleeping remains; we can mingle our tears with the bereaved, and pour in their bleeding hearts the balm of consolation; but their death leaves no permanent impression, like the murmuring stream that washes the traces from the sand. But when we bend over the ashes of those who towered among us as pyramids in wisdom and usefulness, whose path was illuminated by their genius and virtues, and whose life and departure have been consecrated by the prayers of thousands whom they have blessed; we almost feel as if the world had suffered a momentary shock, and we looked despairingly around to remedy the loss. The fall of a solitary rock, the prostration of a single edifice, may produce a momentary tremour; but it is only when the mountain totters, and the city is engulfed in ruins, that the soul is electrified with dismay.

This reverential homage to the memory of the truly great is the adoration which is paid to intelligence and virtue, and is, in some degree, an evidence of the immortality of the mind. It is not the unmeaning respect rendered to the individual, but to the principles which have elevated, the virtues which have adorned, and the benefits which have immortalized his character; and these consecrated by our best wishes and feelings, are embalmed in pious recollection, and preserved by the sculptor and historian from the shades of oblivion. Every nation has shed its tears over those who, having been sent by heaven to illuminate their country, have retired from the world, to give place to the exertions of others. They are like the stars of heaven, which as fast as one declines, others rise to diffuse their light. Great and good men may be indeed regarded, as the instruments of Providence in the melioration of the world. They are the moral angels deputed to enlighten and purify society, arouse the ambition dormant in the human breast, and fire, by their example, to brilliant and praiseworthy deeds, transmitting their blessing to the latest posterity. Yet they are never appreciated till their mortal career is closed. Familiarized with seeing them, with catching from their lips the treasures of intelligence, with living as it were in the sunshine of their superiority, we never knew their loss till they are set upon our sight, and every object around is involved in darkness. When we see the death-pall covering the ashes of the renowned, and a nation's tears are beheld falling upon their sod from the eyes of its noblest citizens, it is then they find "an epitaph in every mind, and a tomb in every heart." The instantaneous burst of feeling, "How can such men be dispensed with?" is answered by the reply—that the Omniscient has done this to convince us he can do without them—that his means are as endless as his purposes—that he can raise up others more powerful than they, and that he can render even their death instrumental in the furtherance of his designs.

In the death of illustrious men we view the imbecility of all human plans. So supremely dependent seems success on the efforts of human sagacity, that we calculate the issue, by the talents of those concerned. National prosperity appears identified with the genius of its statesmen, the policy of its rulers, and the mental powers of its literary men. All the light that streams from literature and science—all the social gifts which impart gladness to the domestic circle, and fill the soul with silent and unspeakable enjoyment—all the privileges which flow from the hallowed fountain of civil and religious liberty, are supposed entirely indebted to the wisdom and worldly prudence and the calculation of a few enlightened philosophers. But when the wisdom that should have counselled is speechless, and the influence which sustained it is palsied by the spear of death, when the genius that should have enlightened, is quenched in its orbit, and the heart that would have administered happiness, has frozen in its tabernacle who does not perceive the folly of dependences so frail, so flattering, and so false? When the enlightened statesman, on whom are suspended the destinies of his country, falls a victim to the destroyer, and the judicious policy he has pursued, bids fair to be blasted by the gathering political storm: when the eloquent counsellor who is both the guardian of justice and the advocate of suffering, is swept from the ranks which he ornaments as well as defends: when literature is bereft of its firmest and loftiest pillar: when the illustrious physician bows to the stroke which he has averted from the hearts of others; and when the useful divine, cut off in the prime of his usefulness, resigns the earthly for the heavenly fold of his Redeemer, are we not taught the fallacy of human policy, and the vanity of the wisest calculations? These pillars are removed, that we may perceive that they are not our supporters:—These luminaries are quenched, that we may realize, they are not the source of wisdom. Powerful means, like these, must be used to eradicate our worldly dependence, and found our hopes on a better and more durable foundation. The heart be often wrung with disappointment, that the mind may contemplate a superintending Providence—an Omniscient Intelligence controlling our concerns, eliciting good from evil, light from darkness, and consolation from the thorns of sorrow.

The death of the illustrious tends to excite a spirit of publick sympathy. Oppressed by its own griefs, the heart is too selfish to feel for the publick weal, and make its interests, in any degree, its own. In lamenting the departure of a great man, devoted to the publick good, all are led to feel their relation to the community; and in sympathizing for the loss of one equally endeared to all, they foster a sympathetic spirit in the distresses of others. The illustrious dead are regarded as a sort of family relative. They are the ties which entwine the reserve of ignorance with the warmth of consanguinity, and connect the enjoyments of private life with those of the community. They are the common centres about which the publick hopes and fears revolve: and if they expire, like fallen stars, in darkness, while every eye is fastened on them, it is no wonder that the tears of mourning should stream from every eye.

In the demise of the great, we contemplate the intellectual glory to which they have been admitted. Though towering far beyond the mind of the multitude, they were still imperfect beings, dazzled by the same phantoms, deceived by the same hopes, and limited by the same narrow boundaries. Imbued with the literature and erudition of the age, they felt the infancy of mind, and the barriers which opposed its perfection. To suppose that those faculties are torpid, and those principles dead, would be an imputation on the goodness of the Supreme Being. It is a conclusion, warranted by supernatural testimony, that they have joined kindred spirits in the light of celestial intelligence, and are exercising their faculties in the highest possible perfection. As every thing in nature rises to its level, so the intellect of the pious will seek its own element in glory. Occupied in a sphere adapted to its capacities, the soul may cultivate its own peculiar taste, only freed from the corruptions enfeebling mortality. Why may not the distinguished in intellect mingle together in celestial unison, and "differing from others as other stars in glory," be especially favoured with the contemplation of those mysteries, to be hidden perhaps from less aspiring minds? What a refined association, when the bards of profane, shall mingle their pious songs with those of sacred poetry: when the holy historians, philosophers, and literaries of all ages and nations shall commune together in mind: when the wise, the eloquent, and the powerful of the earth, shall meet the apostles, the prophets, and the princes of inspiration! It will be an intellectual feast worthy of enkindling our most burning anticipations; for their expansion of faculty must equal their glory. No mortal eloquence can describe such a meeting! Not the loftiest angel could depict the heart-entrancing blessedness that must emanate from a state like this!

It is profitable to meditate upon the illustrious dead that the heart may be excited to imitate their virtues. We are more satisfied with admiring than rivaling the excellent. Cold sentiments evaporate from the lips, but virtuous principles seldom take root in the heart. We think that the height of the illustrious is too lofty to reach; and commending them for supernatural gifts, we are cowardly contented to occupy the valley. But we should remember, that the deservedly renowned are often more indebted to persevering industry, than remarkable mental endowments; and that it is in the cultivation of the faculty in which we excel, that we may be enabled to attain greatness of character. But it is not by a single step that the lofty mountain is ascended, but by gradual advances unremittingly up its side. Thousands that have gone before us, may ascribe their success to progressive attainments in wisdom and virtue; and myriads that will come after us, will arrive by the same road, to conspicuity.

What should then retard our pace, or intimidate our exertions? We are not required to pursue the bubble reputation, which breaks as soon as formed, but the honourable distinction of great and good men who laboured more to deserve than seek after fame. The example they have taught, shines before us like a pillar of fire, to encourage our advances. We feel the world trembling and crumbling beneath us; and we hear the deathbell of our hopes on every passing breeze. We see that nothing is immortal but lives devoted to usefulness and piety, in enlightening the wanderer, solacing the mourner, and alleviating the toils of the pilgrimage of life. Let no earthly fascination, no corrupting sentiment, no hollow example, seduce us from the narrow path, and plunge us into whirlpools of inevitable ruin. As citizens of heaven, aspiring after an immortal crown, let us vigorously press forward to our imperishable reward. Then, whether living in obscurity, we pine away in poverty and neglect: though our names are ungraven on obelisks, or monuments, yet we shall live in the affections of the amiable and the virtuous; we shall receive the commendation of the searcher of hearts; and on every bosom shall our epitaph be written:—

They have gone from the world in the light of their fame,
Like the star that is lost in the morning's pure flame,
The brightest that shone at even:
But they live in the home of the blessed on high,
And their star is now hid in the glorious sky,
By the holy light of heaven.

TO PRINTERS.

The following elegant and amusing paper was written in 1801, for the Boston Palladium, by Fisher Ames. It is well worth a re-publication annually, not only for its finished composition, but because it contains a sensible reproof to those caterers for the press who feed their readers with little else than dire catastrophes and horrible events, instead of occupying their columns with useful and necessary information; it is, moreover, still more applicable now, than it was twenty-seven years ago.

[Essex Register.]

It seems as if newspaper wares were made to suit a market, as much as any other. The starers, and wonderers, and gapers, engross a very large share of the attention of the sons of the type. Extraordinary events multiply upon us surprisingly. Gazettes, it is seriously to be feared, will not long allow room to any thing, that is not loathsome or shocking. A newspaper is pronounced to be very lean and destitute of matter, if it contains no account of murders, suicides, prodigies or monstrous births.

Some of these tales excite horror, and others disgust; yet the fashion reigns, like a tyrant, to relish wonders, and almost to relish nothing else. Is this a reasonable taste; or is it monstrous and worthy of ridicule? Is the history of Newgate the only one worth reading? Are oddities only to be hunted? Pray tell us, men of ink, if our free presses are to diffuse information, and we, the poor ignorant people, can get it no other way than by newspapers, what knowledge we are to glean from the blundering lies, or the tiresome truths about thunder storms, that, strange to tell! kill oxen or burn barns; and cats, that bring two-headed kittens; and sows, that eat their own pigs! The crowing of a hen is supposed to forebode euckoldom; and the ticking of a little bug in the wall threatens yellow fever. It seems really as if our newspapers were busy to spread superstition. Omens, and dreams, and prodigies, are recorded, as if they were worth minding. One would think our gazettes were intended for Roman readers, who were silly enough to make account of such things. We ridicule the papists for their credulity; yet, if all the trumpery of our papers is believed, we have little right to laugh at any set of people on earth; and if it is not believed, why is it printed?

Surely, extraordinary events have not the best title to our studious attention. To study nature or man, we ought to know things that are in the ordinary course, not the unaccountable things that happen out of it.

This country is said to measure seven hundred millions of acres, and is inhabited by almost six millions of people. Who can doubt, then, that a great many crimes will be committed; and a great many strange things will happen every seven years. There will be thunder showers, that will split tough white oak trees; and hail storms, that will cost some farmers the full amount of twenty shillings to mend their glass windows; there will be taverns, and boxing matches, and elections, and gouging, and drinking, and love, and murder, and running in debt, and running away, and suicide. Now, if a man supposes eight, or ten, or twenty dozen of these amusing events will happen in a single year, is he not just as wise as another man, who reads fifty columns of amazing particulars, and, of course, knows that they have happened!

This state has almost one hundred thousand dwelling houses: it would be strange, if all of them should escape fire for twelve months. Yet is it very profitable for a man to become a deep student of all the accidents, by which they are consumed? He should take good care of his chimney corner, and put a fender before the back log before he goes to bed. Having done this, he may let his aunt or grandmother read by day, or meditate by night, the terrible newspaper articles of fires; how a maid dropped asleep reading a romance, and the bed clothes took fire; how a boy, searching in a garret for a hoard of nuts, kindled some flax; and how a mouse, warming his tail, caught it on fire, and carried it into his hole in the floor.

Some of the shocking articles in the papers raise simple, and very simple wonder; some terror; and some horror and disgust. Now what instruction is there in these endless wonders? Who is the wiser or happier for reading the accounts of them? On the contrary, do they not shock tender minds, and addle shallow brains? They make a thousand old maids, and eight or ten thousand booby boys, afraid to go to bed alone. Worse than this happens; for some eccentric minds are turned to mischief by such accounts, as they receive of troops of incendiaries burning our cities: the spirit of imitation is contagious; and boys are found unaccountably bent to do as men do. When the man flew from the steeple of the North church fifty years ago, every unlucky boy thought of nothing but flying from a sign-post.

It was once a fashion to stab heretics; and Ravallac, who stabbed Henry the fourth, of France, the assassin of the duke of Guise, and of the duke of Buckingham, with many others, only followed the fashion. Is it not in the power of newspapers to spread fashions; and by dinning burnings and murders in every body's ears, to detain all rash and mischievous tempers on such subjects, long enough to wear out the first impression of horror, and to prepare them to act what they so familiarly contemplate? Yet there seems to be a sort of rivalry among printers who shall have the most wonders and the strangest and most horrible crimes. This taste will multiply prodigies. The superstitious Romans used to forbid reports of new prodigies while they were performing sacrifices on such accounts.

Every horrid story in a newspaper produces a shock; but, after some time, this shock lessens. At length, such stories are so far from giving pain, that they rather raise curiosity, and we desire nothing so much, as the particulars of terrible tragedies. The wonder is as easy as to stare; and the most vacant mind is the most in need of such resources as cost no trouble of scrutiny or reflection: it is a sort of food for idle curiosity, that is ready chewed and digested.

On the whole, we may insist, that the increasing fashion of printing wonderful tales of crimes and accidents, is worse than ridiculous, as it corrupts both the publick taste and morals. It multiplies fables, prodigious monsters, and crimes, and thus makes shocking things familiar; while it withdraws all popular attention from familiar truths, because it is not shocking.

Now, Messrs. Printers, I pray the whole honourable craft, to banish as many murders, and horrid accidents, and monstrous births and prodigies from their gazettes, as their readers will permit them; and, by degrees, to coax them back to contemplate life and manners; to consider common events with some common sense; and to study nature where she can be known, rather than in those of her ways, where she really is, or is represented to be inexplicable.

Strange events are facts, and as such should be mentioned, but with brevity, and in a cursory manner. They afford no ground for popular reasoning, or instruction; and therefore the horrid details, that make each particular hair stiffen and stand upright on the reader's head, ought not to be given. In short, they must be mentioned; but sensible printers and sensible readers, will think that way of mentioning them the best, that impresses them least on publick attention, and that hurries them on the most swiftly to be forgotten.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1828.

Annual Address before the Medical Society of the State of New-York; delivered February 6, 1828: by T. RO-MEYN BECK, M. D., President of the Society. pp. 23, 8vo. Websters and Skinners, Albany.

We have perused this pamphlet with no little interest. After a very brief and appropriate introduction the doctor assumes for the leading topic of his discourse the subject of Medical evidence in courts of justice. This naturally leads him to trace up the bearing and authority, the importance and necessity, and the provisions made in some countries for the purpose of having this evidence free from the injurious effects of too much discretion in judicial officers, or a deficiency of skill in the medical operator or inspector, in legal investigations.

He then speaks of the knowledge necessary to discharge conscientiously the duties required of a medical witness, and brings home the proper application to the members of the profession. In this point of his subject he is very clear, and produces the strongest evidence that a man may be a judicious, correct, and excellent practitioner of medicine, and yet be incompetent as a witness in certain cases. We shall quote the proposition of some regulations to avoid the evil resulting from such incompetency, in the doctor's own words.

"I have no novel proposition to offer on this subject. It is one that has been sanctioned by the experience of several continental countries, and has certainly led to the distribution of equal justice. It has done more. In the opinion of competent judges, it has led to the diminution of crimes, evidently from an apprehension of the certainty of their detection. I refer to the appointment of medical men in a county, a district, or a part of the state, who shall be specially charged with this duty.

"The first germ of this regulation appears in the German code which I have already noticed. It has for centuries, been the practice in Austria to appoint individuals to superintend these examinations and to report on them. In 1606, the illustrious Henry the Fourth of France, gave letters patent to his first physician, by which he conferred on him the power of appointing two surgeons in every city and important town, whose duty it should exclusively be to examine all wounded or murdered persons, and to report thereon. It was soon discovered that in many instances, the investigation would be incomplete, unless physicians were associated with them, and accordingly in 1692, this was ordained by the council of state. The form of the reports to be made by them, and the circumstances to be noticed, make a part of every work now published on the continent, concerning legal medicine.

"The advantages of thus designating individuals would seem to be striking and prominent. It would lead to more accurate study of the science. It would afford numerous and favourable opportunities of improving it. It would in a great degree, prevent that disputation about facts, which produces so many unpleasant collisions in courts of justice. It would spare to many, the performance of the most unpleasant duties, often amidst the circle of their practice, and hence liable to injure its extent or impair its usefulness. At present, under existing laws, all are liable to be summoned, yet as the calls to duty are rare, many neglect to prepare themselves. But under a different order of things, the incumbent, if assigned to a sufficiently large district, would be aware that his aid would be frequently required, and he would properly qualify himself for the task. He would also appear in a judicial capacity and in the discharge of his appointed duty, and would not be looked upon with that evil eye, which not unfrequently follows for years the physician, who it is insinuated, might have avoided the inquiry concerning the life of a neighbour.

"It speaks something for the suggestion which I have made, that even in England, wedded as they are to their institutions, and averse to borrow from other countries, a wish has sometimes been breathed in its favour by some of her writers.

"It may however be urged, that the time has not yet arrived for such an arrangement. If so, and we are to proceed according to former customs, it certainly appears necessary that examinations of the dead should be made with great deliberation and accuracy. And nothing can be more conducive to this end, than that two or more professional men should be associated together. They will assist each other not merely mechanically, but by suggesting various points of inquiry. While he, who is most skilled in anatomy, is pursuing his dissection, the other may note the appearances as they successively present themselves—and the same course may be adopted while performing chymical experiments. The advantage will thus be attained, of having a complete account prepared at the moment of observation, which may be afterwards reviewed both in coming to a decision on the case and in giving evidence before a jury. We all recognize the utility of discussion, in enabling us to weigh the merits of conflicting arguments, and the application of this may prevent many regrets, as well as prepare the mind for any difficulties that may be suggested. It should be recollected, that the opinion of a medical man before a coroner's jury, may consign an individual to a prison for months and heap on him the imputation of the most horrid crimes. How necessary then that his decision be strongly fortified by facts and by authority."

From a series of plain and at the same time truly philosophical directions to medical witnesses, he proceeds to canvass some points upon which the opinions of legal men are found to differ from the received medical authorities of the present day. He defends the hydrostatic test resorted to in cases of infanticide, from the doubts thrown upon it in consequence of the opposition made to it by Doctor William Hunter. He next very strenuously opposes the idea which legal men attach to the term a "lucid interval," in cases of insanity. The opinion, that an action which when committed by a sane person, would be criminal, is the same when perpetrated during the supposed lucid interval, he shows to be contrary to sound sense, as well as the opinion of most medical writers who have approached the subject. It is also opposed to the opinion of some eminent jurists, though hitherto the weight of opinion has preponderated against that held by medical writers. He then proceeds:—

"Leaving the consideration of these points, and which I fear has proved tedious, I proceed to mention that the medical witness is often placed in a delicate situation from the circumstances under which he is summoned. He is a witness for one or other party—for the prosecution or for the prisoner; and he is so summoned in the belief that his evidence will favour the side by which he is produced. It would be desirable, that at least the person who has made the previous examination before the coroner's jury, should be divested of this, so far as to enable him to give a full and fair statement of all the circumstances that make for either side. I am aware that he can now do so, and indeed his oath obliges him to it. He ought to put the judge and jury in possession of the "whole truth," even if he be not questioned to that extent. But often the technicalities of an examination, and particularly by an adverse counsel, overcome that self possession which is so essential. Pressed by perplexing questions, and probably irritated in his feelings, he is apt to make declarations more strongly corroborative of opinions that he has formerly advanced, and as his examination advances, he may incur the charge of being biased, more than facts will warrant.

"Would not this difficulty be avoided by having the written report to which I have referred, presented to the court, as the medical facts in the case? The examiner before the coroner's jury will always have time to prepare this deliberately and cautiously—he can state in it his doubts, and mention the circumstances which are favourable or unfavourable to the accused person. He can avoid all imputations of being a partizan, and having once signed it as his deliberate opinion, he ought of course not to be allowed to alter or amend without showing the most satisfactory reasons."

The address concludes by summing up the annals of the institution for the past year, in which the speaker hints at his predilections on some local divisions among the profession; but with a delicacy truly amiable and praiseworthy.

We will not be accused of venturing beyond our depth in giving our opinion of this work; for the style and manner are made perfectly comprehensible to the most limited capacity. It is not encumbered and obscured by any pedantick use of technical terms, but directly the contrary; a faculty of simplifying, and reducing scientific terms to common language, is discernible throughout. With the reputation of Doctor Beck the publick are already intimately acquainted, and in this instance he has given them no reason to call in question the share of applause they have heretofore awarded to the fruits of his scientific and literary researches.

Our legislative report is unavoidably postponed till our next.

FOREIGN. By the arrival of the Sully, Captain Macy, French dates to the 17th of January, and English to the 11th have been received. A change is certainly to be made in the British ministry, Lord Goderich having resigned, and the Duke of Wellington has the charge of forming a new cabinet. The same changes in the French cabinet continue to disappoint the expectations of the knowing ones. In Spain, the council of Castile has been warmly discussing the project of an act of amnesty. A majority is said to be in favour of a general amnesty to all parties and all opinions, since 1808. Portugal remains in statu quo, waiting the arrival of Don Miguel. Russia makes but slow movements towards the execution of her apparent plans; the army of the Pruth, however, receives continued reinforcements.— Prussia has an agent at Stockholm, purchasing cannon and ammunition on account of the government. Lord Cochrane has been accused of an attempt to persuade the primates of the isle of Naxos, that it was the intention of the allies to place them again under the Ottoman yoke. He has firmly contradicted the accusation. The grand sultan is still making preparations for war. He still persists that the ambassadors of the three powers have acted contrary to instructions. The United States' sloop of war Warren has been very busy chastising the pirates in the neighbourhood of Smyrna. She had fired upon the town of Myconi to obtain the restitution of some of the goods taken from American vessels, which were thereupon restored. Several houses were injured but no lives were lost. Captain Kearney had destroyed a number of the pirates, and rendered great services to the Americans and others. It now remains to be learned whether he will be rewarded for these services, in the same manner as Commodore Porter was in a similar instance.

ANOTHER GREAT MAN FALLEN. It is our painful duty to announce another witness to the vanity of human greatness, when put in comparison with the hand of death.—Major General JACOB BROWN, commander in chief of the armies of the United States, died at his residence in the city of Washington, on Sunday the 24th ultimo, after an illness of but three or four days. General Brown was a native of this state, and was born and educated a quaker. His pacific principles could not however deter him from espousing the cause of his bleeding country during the last war, and his rise in reputation and power have very few parallels in our history. They were not the meed of favouritism, as too many public honours are in all governments, but richly and fairly earned in the field and camp.

We cannot but feel a pride even amid the gloom his death casts around us, that our state has produced a BROWN,—a name to stand on the same page with her SCHUYLER, her HERKIMER, her HAMILTON, and a host of others who have honoured her by birth or adoption, and will be enduring lights in the firmament of her fame.

LITERARY NOTICES.

93 The Boston Literary Gazette, a new weekly paper first started in that city appears to pursue a different course opinion rather than ~~the~~ the day. We had imbibed an editors which reached us before hand; we are glad to say it has been completely changed, some the perusal. Some of the editor's eccentricities in the line of affected verbosity, have been taken for genuine fustian by these over grave readers. On the whole we are much pleased with the original matter contained in it, whether communicated or editorial, and these constitute a very large portion of the whole paper. Criticism is much needed in this country, and a proper execution of the plan laid down by the editor may do much towards correcting the loose and promiscuous character of our literature. We have as much first rate literary talent as any other nation, could we find some proper person or persons, with dexterity enough to separate the wheat from the chaff. The Literary Gazette richly deserves a liberal patronage from the literary community, and in the same proportion we venture to say will be its good effects upon the publick taste.

✂ The Meteor, a beautiful periodical pamphlet, has been received. The contents are entirely original sketches, of a character which richly deserve, but unfortunately receive but little of the publick patronage. We hope the fears of the publishers may be disappointed, and that a more liberal support may encourage them to continue their series. The contents are,—The Old Indian; the Muser; Burns; the Vision; and Carthian, a very chastely written poetick sketch. The typographical execution is neat, and in the best style of the present improved taste. It is published by R. D. Hart, No. 278, Broadway, New-York.

— The Aurora Borealis has come to us per mail, a phenomenon never before dreamed of, even in our most imaginative reveries. We have the assurance that it may be seen, not in the heavens, but on our table, once a week for the future, let the weather be what it will. It is a new hebdomadal, established at Plattsburgh in this state, advocating the cause of the present administration of the general government.

✂ We have also received a number of the Selma Courier, printed at Selma, Alabama. The Courier is for the election of General Jackson to the presidency.

✂ The Mechanick's Free Press, a new weekly publication lately established in Philadelphia, and edited by a committee of the Mechanick's Library company of that city, is a well filled medium sheet, quarto form, and we wish it a liberal support.

TESTIMONIAL OF RESPECT. The counsellors attending the February term of the supreme court, in this city, have resolved to procure a full length portrait of our respected and venerable fellow citizen, ABRAHAM VAN VECHTEN, with a view of placing it in the court room. as a token of regard for the private virtues of that patriarch in the profession. It is perhaps needless for us to observe that to such a measure there will be but one unanimous response from the profession, individually or collectively; and that will be one cordial assent. It is not the less gratifying to our citizens in general, than to the members of the bar, to see true worth so duly appreciated.

TABLE-TALK.

The invention of lithographick printing has so facilitated the art of forgery in London, that bankers are constantly in danger of taking spurious bills of exchange. A person's signature has recently been so exactly copied that the writer did not know which was the genuine bill.—A Mrs. Fortune, in London, was lately delivered of female twins. [Miss-Fortunes never come single sure enough.]—The London cockneys are famous for giving the letter v the sound of w. One of this race was observed by a witty gentleman while in company with him not long since at Vauxhall, to repeat the phrase Wauzhall a number of times. It is very true, replied the gentleman, it is walks all, indeed.

—The following was given as the fortieth toast at a late publick dinner:—Our wives—may we not forget that they are waiting for us.—It is said there are seventeen men now living on the island of Nantucket, over eighty years of age. A certain editor in copying the statement omitted the age of these venerable men, and came near putting a pretty hoax upon the benevolent feelings of the old bachelors.—Only seventeen men, and that too in a population of nearly ~~four hundred~~ souls! They must be in a situation little betsible, convert them to matrimony: ~~as he set on~~ plain, these philanthropick wights now stand "as you were."—A citizen, accustomed to the signature of the firm in which he was a partner, being lately required to sign a baptismal register of one of his own children, entered it as the son of Smith, Jones, & Co. [Such partnerships are seldom acknowledged in a manner quite so official.]—A wag who keeps an oyster cellar in Newark, New-Jersey, advertises among other things, "wild fowls domesticated, and stool-pigeons trained to catch voters for the next president—warranted to suit all parties."—A person in Boston offers for sale two pews in different churches in that city, cheap for cash or lottery tickets!—The Middletown Gazette mentions that in cutting an elephant's tusk, at a comb factory in that city, a few days since, two iron bullets were discovered imbedded in it—the surface of the tusk being perfectly smooth.—The Little Falls People's Friend mentions a man in that village, who lately sold his wife for five dollars in cash, and two dollars store pay.—Adam and Eve are nominated for electors of president,—Mr Adam in Pennsylvania, and Mr. Eve in Kentucky. Adam is a Jackson man, and Eve is for Adams.—Mrs. Simpson paid a new year's visit to her husband, who was in jail for felony, in Davies county, Indiana, and the jailer good naturedly allowed her to remain in the jail with him over night. Early next morning, she bid him an affectionate adieu, and departed in tears. Sometime after, the jailer discovered that he had departed, and that she was left in unrivalled possession of the breeches!—A chancery suit is now pending in England, which was commenced in 1615. The dispute is relative to the right of representation to a lectureship in Warwick, the salary of which is £60 a year. The costs already exceed £15,000, and the present chancellor, in order to prevent the needless waste, has promised to look into the case!—Said Sambo to Cuffee during the late muddy walking,—“ Me wishe hab de Injun rubbum ober-shoe, dis wet wedder.” “ I tell you how you get him berry sheap,” says Cuffee, “ pull off youm shoe and tockin, and den youm hab him, water proof.”

"So let's to business; why this general call?
If these are freeholders I see in shrouds,
And 'tis for an election that they bawl,
Behold a candidate with unturned coat!
Saint Peter, may I count upon your vote?"

BYRON'S VISION.

NOMINATION. We learn that a meeting of the inhabitants of the village of Batavia, have nominated Solomon Southwick, as a fit person to administer the government of the state of New-York, and that his excellency that is to be, has with much diffidence consented to be a candidate at the next general election. A meeting was about to be called by these same citizens of Batavia, to discuss the claims of the west to the nomination for lieutenant governor.

DIED.

In this city, on the 29th ult. JANE C. EIGHTS, youngest daughter of the late Abraham Eights, of this city.

In this city, on the 27th ult. of a lingering consumption.
Mr. SAMUEL WEBSTER, aged 25 years, son of the late Mr.
George Webster.

In this city, on Sunday morning last, captain JACOB VANDENBURGH, of the firm of H. & J. Vandenburg.

In this city, on the 5th inst. Mr. JOHN HANSEN, aged 27 years.

At Gibbonsville, on the 3d inst. after a severe illness, Mr. JOHN W. DANA, in the 40th year of his age, formerly merchant of this city, and much respected by a numerous circle of friends and acquaintances.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to the late firm of R. STARK & Co. in the above Foundry, continue to execute orders for Plain and Ornamental Type, Brass Rule, and Metal Cuts. Also, for Presses and Ink, Chases, composing Sticks, Cases and Stands, Galleys, and printing materials of every description, at short notice, and on terms as liberal as those of other Foundries.

Many new articles have been added to this Foundry within the last year—among which are new founts of Small Pica and Bourgeois. Also, Small Pica, Brevier and Minion full face capitals for captions, and full face two line letter of all the different sizes from Pica to Pearl. Likewise Canon, Double Great Primer, Double Pica, Great Primer and Pica Antiques, with lower case to each, and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil one capitals. Also, many elegant Borders and News-work clash. The capitals of which are stereotyped from wood those cast in copper matrix, are the case with knives, but all are cut the edges rounded, as the case with knives, but all are cut large job letter and cuts are all cast in moulds and matrices, from metal bodies, and with the exactness of the smaller type.

Have also cast a new and very beautiful English Script, on inclined body, orders for which can be executed by the first of April. By being cast on inclined body, the face is not exposed as on square body, where most of the letters are kerner'd; and the mould in which it is cast having a notch or shoulder in the side the type are kept perfectly in line. No expense has been spared, and it is confidently believed, that this Script will be found the most elegant type ever cast in this country, or in Europe.

Type cast at this foundry is warranted equal at least in hardness and durability, to any cast in this country. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the fonts regularly put up. It is intended to keep such a supply on hand as to be able to furnish orders without the usual delay. Orders by mail, or left at the Foundry, No. 8, Liberty street, will receive prompt attention.

POETRY.

FOR THE MASONICK RECORD AND SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

THE UNFORTUNATE MINSTREL.

A minstrel sat lone on a surge beaten shore
As the mists of dim twilight his brow were surrounding;
He heard in the distance the sullen winds roar,—
Saw the tide swelling billows in restlessness bounding.

The danger he felt not—he thought of his home,—
Of the days of his childhood—of hopes that were o'er—
Of a father, a mother, a cottage and lawn—
And a grave, in the land he must visit no more.

That grave—oh that grave!—It did cruelly close
On a heart that had loved him in life's morning hour;
In time, and in distance, despair sought repose;
But time, no—nor distance had weakened its power.

The chill frosts of grief had his locks whitened o'er;
The flash of his dark eye was clouded and dim;—
Have ye seen the untimely, stript, autumn-struck bower?
Thus changed was that minstrel, from what he had been.

Faintly rose on the night-wind the notes of his lyre
In an air that o'er madness itself cast a spell;
He had sung it the day he saw Mary expire—
'Twas the song of her birth day—her requiem knell.

Where now is that bard? Ah! the sea is his grave!
He saw not, he felt not, its storm-driven spray;
From the sand he was swept by the merciful wave,
And left, not to linger out life's saddening day. W

THE FALLEN ANGELS.

BY EDMUND READE.

Night rose frightened from her sleep,
Where, athwart the boundless deep,
Palled o'er shapeless chaos, she
Had slumbered from eternity.
First was heard a far off sound
Of war cries in the distance drowned,
And a light like burning flame
O'er the red horizon came!
Then wildly drifted in the stream
Of that fiery spreading gleam,
With a sound as if a world
Were from its foundations hurled;
Thicker than the stars undying,
Or the sands, or rent leaves flying,
Swept before the whirlwind strong,
Rushed the rebel hosts along!
Vainly hurrying on they strove
To escape the ruin from above,
Downward came the whelming force,
Myriads crushing in its course,
From that form divine which trod
Once so high before their God!
Vain they struggled 'gainst the blow,
Dashed headlong on the rocks below;
Vainer still their curse or prayer,
As they writhed in madness there.

One there came, the last: oh! how
That godlike form was fallen now!
No longer on its waste path,
O'er his head his shield was flung;
From his crest the singed plume hung,
With a pale and angry glare
Streaming to the troubled air.
In his hand the shivered spear;
But that proud brow showed not fear
Though his name for this vain strife
Was ever blotted out from life;
Though from heaven a rebel thrown,
Fallen, and blasted, and alone:
Though the ruins round him broke,
And the lightning's scathing stroke;
And cleaving through his track to hell,
The thunder bolts in flinders fell!
In that eye defiance glared,
And indomitable will,
And pride and passion burning still;
And a hate that had not spared

A revenge, had fate so given,
To which his punishment were heaven!
One fierce gesture back he threw,
As a record in His view,
That he bore a soul unbent—
Pride that never could relent—
And alone would rather be
Throned in hell's sublimity,
Than above, o'er heaven's bright crowd,
To a higher yet have bowed!
Down plunged then his indignant fall,
And black chaos folded all.

THE DEATH COACH.

BY T. CROFTON CROKER.

'Tis midnight!—how gloomy and dark!
By Jupiter, there's not a star!—
'Tis fearful!—'tis awful!—and hark!
What sound is that comes from afar?

Still rolling and rumbling, that sound
Makes nearer and nearer approach;
Do I tremble, or is it the ground?—
Lord save us! what is it?—a coach!

A coach!—but that coach has no head;
And the horses are headless as it;
Of the driver the same may be said,
And the passengers inside who sit.

See the wheels! how they fly o'er the stones!
And whirl as the whip it goes crack:
Their spokes are of dead men's thigh bones,
And the pole is the spine of the back!

The hammer cloth, shabby display,
Is a pall rather mildewed by damps;
And to light this strange coach on its way,
Two hollow skulls hang up for lamps!

From the gloom of Rathcooney churchyard,
They dash down the hill of Glanmire;
Pass Lota in gallop as hard
As if horses were never to tire!

With people thus headless 'tis fun
To drive in such furious career;
Since headlong their horses can't run,
Nor coachman be heady from beer.

Very steep is the Tivoli lane,
But up hill to them is as down;
Nor the charms of Woodhill can detain
These Dullahans rushing to town.

Could they feel as I've felt—in a song—
A spell that forbade them depart;
They'd a lingering visit prolong,
And after their head lose their heart!

No matter; 'tis past twelve o'clock;
Through the streets they sweep on like the wind,
And, taking the road to Blackrock,
Cork city is soon left behind.

Should they hurry thus reckless along,
To supper instead of to bed,
The landlord will surely be wrong,
If he charges them wealth an increase;
As till now, all who drove to his door
Possessed at least one crown apiece.

Up the Deadwoman's hill they are rolled;
Boreenmannah is quite out of sight;
Ballintemple they reach, and behold!
At its churchyard they stop and alight.

"Who's there?" said a voice from the ground;
"We've no room, for the place is quite full."
"O room must be speedily found,
For we came from the parish of Skull.

Though Murphys and Crowleys appear
On headstones of deep lettered pride;
Though Scannells and Murleys lie here,
Fitzgeralds and Toomies beside;

Yet here for the night we lie down,
Tomorrow we speed on the gale;
For having no heads of our own,
We seek the Old Head of Kinsale.

ANGEL VISITS.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

"No more of talk, where God or angel guest
With man as with his friend familiar used
To sit indulgent, and with him partake
Rural repast." MILTON.

Are ye for ever to your skies departed?
Oh! will ye visit this dim world no more?
Ye whose bright wings a solemn splendour darted
Through Eden's fresh and flowering shades of yore?
How are the fountains dried on that sweet spot,
And ye—our faded earth beholds you not!

Yet, by your shining eyes not all forsaken,
Man wandered from his paradise away;
Ye, from forgetfulness his heart to waken,
Came down, high guests! in many a later day,
And with the patriarchs under vine or oak,
Midst noontide calm, or hush of evening spoke.

From yon the veil of midnight darkness rending,
Came the rich mysteries to the sleeper's eye,
That saw your hosts ascending and descending,
On those bright steps between the earth and sky:
Trembling he woke, and bowed o'er glory's trace,
And worshiped, awe-struck, in that fearful place.

By Chebar's brook ye passed, such radiance wearing;
As mortal vision might but ill endure;
Along the stream the living chariot bearing
With its high crystal arch, intensely pure!
And the dread rushing of your wings that hour,
Was like the noise of waters in their power.

But in the Olive Mount, by night appearing,
Midst the dim leaves, your holiest work was done!—
Whose was the voice that came divinely cheering,
Fraught with the breath of God to aid his Son?—
Haply of those that on the moonlit plains,
Wafted good tidings unto Syrian swains.

Yet one more task was yours!—your heavenly dwelling
Ye left, and by the unsealed sepulchral stone
In glorious raiment sat; the weepers telling
That He they sought, had triumphed, and was gone!—
Now have ye left us for the brighter shore,
Your presence lights the lonely groves no more!

But may ye not, unseen, around us hover,
With gentle promptings and sweet influence yet?
Though the fresh glory of those days be over,
When midst the palm trees, man your foot steps met—
Are ye not near when faith and hope rise high,
When love by strength o'er masters agony?

Are ye not near when sorrow unrepining,
Yields up life's treasures unto Him who gave?
When martyrs, all things for His sake resigning,
Lead on the march of death, serenely brave?
Dreams!—but a deeper thought our souls may fill,
One, one is near—a Spirit holier still!

MASONICK RECORD.

ACT OF THE ASSOCIATE SYNOD,

CONCERNING THE MASON OATH.

First published in the Scots Magazine, for August 1757.

Edinburgh, 25th August, 1757.

Whereas an oath is one of the most solemn acts of religious worship, which ought to be taken only upon important and necessary occasions; and to be sworn in truth, in judgement, and in righteousness, without any mixture of sinful, profane, or superstitious devices:—

And whereas, the synod had laid before them, in their meeting at Stirling, on the 7th March, 1745, an overture concerning the masonick oath, bearing, That there were very strong presumptions, that among masons an oath of secrecy is administered to entrants into their society, even under a capital penalty, and before any of those things which they swear to keep secret be revealed to them; and that they pretend to take some of these secrets from the Bible; besides other things, which are ground of scruple, in the manner of swearing the said oath; and therefore overturing, that the synod would consider the whole affair, and give directions with respect to the admission of persons engaged in that oath to sealing ordinances:—

And whereas, the synod in their meeting at Stirling, on the 26th of September 1745, remitted the overture concerning the mason oath, to the several sessions subordinate to them, for their proceeding therein, as far as they should find practicable, according to our received and known principles, and the plain rules of the Lord's word, and sound reason:—

And whereas, the synod, in their meeting at Edinburgh, on the 6th of March, 1755, when a particular cause about the mason oath was before them, did appoint all the sessions under their inspection, to require all persons in their respective congregations, who are presumed or suspected to have been engaged in that oath, to make a plain acknowledgement, whether or not they have ever been so: and to require that such as they may find to have been engaged therein, should give ingenuous answers to what further inquiries the sessions may see cause to make, concerning the tenour and administration of the said oath to them; and that the sessions should proceed to the purging of what scandal they may thus find those persons convicted of, according to the directions of the abovementioned act of Synod, in September 1745:—

And whereas, the generality of the sessions have, since the aforementioned periods, dealt with several persons under their inspection about the mason oath; in the course of which procedure, by the confessions made to them, they have found others, beside those of the mason craft, to be involved in that oath: and the synod, finding it proper and necessary to give more particular directions to the several sessions, for having the heinous profanation of the Lord's name by that oath, purged out of all the congregations under their inspection: Therefore, the synod did, and hereby do appoint, that the several sessions subordinate to them, in dealing with persons about the mason oath, shall particularly interrogate them, if they have taken that oath, and when and where they did so? If they have taken the said oath, or declared their approbation of it, oftener than once, upon being admitted to a higher degree in a mason lodge; if that oath was not administered to them, without letting them know the terms of it, till in the act of administering the same to them? If it was not an oath binding them to keep a number of secrets, none of which they were allowed to know before swearing the oath?

Moreover, the synod appoint, that the several sessions shall call before them all persons in their congregations who are of the mason craft, and others whom they have a particular suspicion of, as being involved in the mason oath, except such as have been already dealt with, and have given satisfaction upon that head; and that, upon their answering the first of the foregoing questions in the affirmative, the sessions should proceed to put the other interrogatories before appointed: as also, that all persons of the mason craft, applying for sealing ordinances, and likewise others concerning whom there may be any presumption of their having been involved in the mason oath, shall be examined by the minister if they have been so: and upon their acknowledging the same, or declining to answer whether or not, the ministers shall refer them to be dealt with by the sessions, before admitting them to ordinances: and that all such persons offering themselves to the sessions for joining in covenanting work, shall be then examined by the sessions, as their concern in the aforesaid oath.

And the synod farther appoint, that when persons are found to be involved in the mason oath, according to their confessions, in giving plain and particular answers to the foregoing questions, and professing their sorrow for the same; the said scandal shall be purged by a sessional rebuke and admonition; with a strict charge to abstain from all concern afterwards in administering the said oath to any, or enticing any into that snare, and from all practices of amusing people about the pretended mysteries of their signs and secrets. But that persons who shall refuse or shift to give plain and particular answers to the foregoing questions, shall be reputed under scandal incapable of admission to sealing ordinances, till they answer and give satisfaction as before appointed.

And the synod refer to the several sessions, to proceed unto higher censure as they shall see cause, in the case of persons whom they may find involved in the said oath, with special aggravation, as taking or relapsing into the same, in opposition to warnings against doing so.

And the synod appoint, that each of the sessions under their inspection shall have an extract of this act, to be inserted in their books, for executing the same accordingly.

AN IMPARTIAL EXAMINATION

OF THE ACT OF THE ASSOCIATE SYNOD AGAINST THE FREEMASONS.

First published in the Edinburgh Magazine, for October, 1757.

The society of freemasons, which, notwithstanding the opposition of human power, civil and ecclesiastick, has now subsisted for many ages, and always maintained its inseparable character of secrecy, prudence, and good manners, stands at this day in such high repute, that an apology in its behalf is certainly unnecessary.

Publick esteem has always been reputed a crime in the eyes of malevolence; and virtue and goodness have always been held as declared enemies, by hypocritical sanctity and bigot zeal. To such impure sources alone can be attributed a very extraordinary act lately pronounced against this venerable society, by the synod of the associate brethren, and published in the Scots Magazine for August 1757. From this act the practices of this holy association appear so agreeable to those of the Roman Catholick church, that they afford a shrewd suspicion, that the principles from which such practices result, are of the same nature, and have the same dangerous tendency, with those professed by the Roman See.

In the year 1738, his Holiness, at Rome, by the plenitude of the apostolick power, issued a declaration, condemnatory of the society of freemasons; with an absolute prohibition to all the faithful in Christ, to enter into, promote, or favour that society, under no less penalty than an ipso facto excommunication; and the help of the secular arm is commanded to enforce the execution of this declaration. By an edict, consequent to this declaration, informations are commanded, under the severest corporeal punishment; and encouraged by an assurance from the Infallible Chair, "That oaths of secrecy in matters already condemned are thereby rendered void, and lose their obligation." Let it be recorded in history, to the honour of their holinesses, the associate synod of Scotland, that, in the year 1757, they also thundered out their tremendous Bull against the freemasons; whereby all their votaries are enjoined to reveal every thing, which, under the sanction of a solemn oath, they are obliged to conceal: they are thereafter to abstain from such societies themselves, nor are they to entice others to enter into them, under the terrible certification of being reputed under scandal, debarred from sealing ordinances, and subjected to higher censure, as there should appear cause.

The professed reasons which brought the fraternity under the papal displeasure were, that they confederated persons of all religions and sects, under a shew of natural honesty, in a close and inscrutable bond, and under certain ceremonies; which, by an oath taken on the Bible, they obliged them, by the imprecation of heavy punishments, to preserve with inviolable secrecy.

These urged by the Seceders, as the motive of their proceedings, are, That the masons administered their oath of secrecy under a capital penalty, without first declaring what the matters to be concealed are; and that some of these things are taken from the Bible. And the publishers of the Scots Magazine very quaintly insinuate another reason, that the whole matters thus communicated under the strictest ties of secrecy, are a bundle of trifles and inconsistencies, unworthy the solemnity of an oath: this they do by a reference made to a pretended discovery of the secrets of masonry, published in their Magazine, 1755, p. 133, and communicated to them, it may be presumed, by the same correspondents.

The great conformity betwixt these two Bulls, leaves small room to doubt but the last, as well as the first, would have had the sanction of corporeal punishments, if God, for the curse of mankind, had strengthened the hands, and seconded the intolerating views of its authors with secular power.— They have not, however, omitted what was within their grasp; but have attempted to erect a dominion over the consciences of mankind, by assuming a power of dispensing with human obligations. This is a privilege, which, however envied, the reformed clergy have hitherto left, together with his pretended infallibility, in the possession of their elder brother at Rome; till in this more enlightened age, these bold assertors of the Christian rights have dared to reclaim and vindicate it as their own; for, should antichrist enjoy any benefit which the saints are not better entitled to?

This is not the least engine which has been successfully employed to rear up and support the enormous fabric of the Roman hierarchy. The most solemn treaties betwixt princes and states, the allegiance of subjects to their sovereigns, the obligations of private contracts, the marriage vow, and every other the most sacred bond of human society, are dissolved, and fly off at the breath of this dispensing power, like chaff before the wind: and to this, as to their native source, may be ascribed those many wars and devastations, rebellions, massacres, and assassinations, with which every page of the history of the Christian world is defiled.

Is it possible that a doctrine, attended with such a train of dreadful consequences, can have any foundation either in reason or revelation?

(Conclusion in our next.)

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

At an extra meeting of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the District of Columbia, convened in Washington city, February 25, 1828, by special order of the M. E. G. H. P. for the purpose of evincing its sorrow for the sudden and lamented decease of our late brother and companion, the M. E. General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States, DE WITT CLINTON, and of adopting measures to testify its profound respect for his memory: on motion, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from among us our worthy and most distinguished brother and companion, DE WITT CLINTON, General Grand High Priest of Royal Arch Masons, which exalted station he had for many years filled with honour to himself and advantage to the whole masonick fraternity throughout the United States: and whereas the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia, deeply penetrated with the loss which the masonick institution in this country has sustained in the decease of so eminent a member, and so valuable an officer, are desirous of evincing the regard in which he was held by them:

Resolved, unanimously, that the officers and members of this Grand Chapter will wear the usual badge of Royal Arch mourning, for the space of thirty days, as a testimonial of their veneration and respect for the memory of the deceased.

Resolved, that the officers and members of the Chapters under the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, be requested, in like manner, to wear mourning for the same space of time, and to clothe their respective chambers in suitable apparel.

Resolved, that a publick address, on the merits and character of the deceased, be pronounced by some worthy companion Royal Arch Mason, at as early a day as may be convenient; and that a masonick procession, to embrace all companions and brethren in the District, resident and sojourning, take place, under the direction of this Grand Chapter, on the day of the address, and move from Masons' Hall to the place of its delivery.

Resolved, that the Grand Council, the High Priests of the several subordinate Chapters, and the Grand Secretary, be a committee to make every necessary arrangement for the purposes above mentioned.

Resolved, that the Grand Secretary transmit a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter, and to the family of the deceased, and that the same be published in the papers of this city. Attest,

EDWARD S. LEWIS, G. Sec'y.

At a regular communication of M'Donough Chapter, held at the chapter room in the village of Keeseville, Essex county, on the 27th February, A. L. 5828, the attention of the Chapter having been called to the mournful consideration of the death of our worthy companion DE WITT CLINTON, a committee was appointed consisting of companions Tomlinson, Allen, and Williams, to draft resolutions expressive of the sentiments of this Chapter on the occasion. The committee having retired for a short time, returned and reported as follows:—

Whereas, by a sudden dispensation of Divine Providence in the death of our worthy and beloved companion DE WITT CLINTON, General Grand

High Priest of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States, our country has been deprived of one of its most disinterested benefactors, science of one of its brightest ornaments, and our fraternity of one of its most distinguished patrons: And whereas, in common with our brethren and companions throughout our land, and in common with the whole community, (while we bow with reverence and submission to this mournful dispensation) we feelingly lament his premature removal from amongst us, in the midst of his usefulness, and while the fruits of his genius had but in a measure imparted the salutary influence which they are yet destined to exercise over the interests of his native state—an influence which will ever preserve the recollection of his memory green in our remembrance. In view, therefore, of his illustrious character, and as a just tribute of respect for his memory,

Resolved unanimously, that the companions of this chapter wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

HUNGER.

One of the first propensities of animals, and which, as being essential to their very existence, may be considered the most important, is the gratification of hunger; through the agency of which the vital principle is preserved, and the several parts of the animal system kept in due tone. To promote this sensation, nature has caused the stomach of animals to secrete a very active fluid, denominated the gastric juice, which possessing a solvent power over various substances, contributes in a very remarkable degree to their digestion. As soon, therefore, as the latter process has been completed, and the stomach becomes empty, the gastric fluid acts directly upon its internal coats, and causing their fibres to contract, it produces that pain or disagreeable sensation which we denominate hunger; and as this is only to be relieved by a fresh application of extraneous matter, animals are instinctively taught to seek out those substances which, under the denomination of food, are the best calculated to relieve the uneasiness; nature having bestowed on them the faculty of taste, to enable them to discriminate and avoid injurious articles and to relish their food, so that it be taken in due portions, and be sufficiently divided, previously to its undergoing those future processes upon which its ultimate digestion is made to depend.

SUPPLY OF WATER.

The supply and distribution of water in a large city, since the steam engine was added to the apparatus, approaches closely to the perfection of nature's own work in the circulation of blood through the animal body. From the great pumps or a high reservoir, a few main pipes issue to the chief divisions of the town; these send suitable branches to every street, the branches again divide for the lanes and alleys, and at last into every house a small leaden conduit rises, which, if required, carries its precious freight into the separate apartments, and yields it there to the turning of a cock. A corresponding arrangement of drains and sewers, constructed with the greatest exactness in obedience to the law of level, receives the water again after it has answered its purposes, and carries it to be purified in the great laboratory of the ocean. And so admirably complete and perfect is this counter-system of sloping channels, that a heavy shower may fall, and after washing and purifying every superficial spot of the city, and sweeping completely all the subterranean passages, it may, within the space of an hour, be again collected in the river passing by. It is the recurrence of this almost miracle, of extensive, sudden, and perfect purification, which has made London the most healthy, although the largest city in the world. English citizens have now become so habituated to the blessings of a supply of pure water, more than sufficient for all their purposes, that it causes them no more surprise than the regularly returning light of day or warmth of summer. But a retrospect into past times may still awaken us to a sense of our obligation to advancing art. How often, formerly, did periodical pestilences arise from deficiency of water, and how often has fire devoured whole cities, which a timely supply of water might have saved. Kings have been accounted worthy of almost divine honours for having constructed aqueducts to lead the pure stream from mountains into the peopled towns. In the present day, only he who has travelled on the sandy plains of Asia or Africa, where a well is more prized than mines of gold, or who has spent months, on ship-board, where the fresh water is often doled out with more caution than the most precious product of the soil, or who has vividly sympathized with the shipwrecked man spreading out his garments to catch the rain from heaven, and then, with mad eagerness, sucking the delicious moisture into his cracked lips—only he can appreciate fully the blessing of that abundant supply which most of us now so thoughtlessly enjoy. The author will longer remember the intense momentary regret with which, on once approaching a beautiful land after months spent at sea, he saw a little stream of water sliding over a rock into the salt waves; it appeared to him that he was witnessing a most precious essence, by some accident, pouring out to waste.

PAPER FROM STRAW.

We have on our table a slip of paper manufactured from straw, at the mill of Col. Magaw, near Meadville. The specimen before us, though without sizing may be written upon without the ink spreading in the least: it is somewhat rough, but being the first that was made, great improvement may be expected to be made upon it. Should the expectation of its ingenious inventor not be wholly realized, should it not be capable of being manufactured into so delicate a paper as that we at present possess, he may nevertheless, expect to obtain an abundant compensation for his labour and his pains, by making large quantities of wrapping paper. Col. Magaw, we understand, is about applying for a patent for this discovery. [Harrisburg Argus.]

STEAM ARTILLERY.

In the steam artillery, which Mr. Perkins is constructing for the French government, he guarantees the perfect safety of the generator, its indestructibility, the ability to keep the steam up at any required temperature for any length of time, and its great economy. The piece of ordnance is to throw sixty balls of four pounds each in a minute, with the correctness of the rifled musket, and to a proportionate distance. A musket is also attached to the same generator for throwing a stream of lead from the bastion of a fort, and is made so far portable as to be capable of being moved from one bastion to another. This musket is to throw from one hundred to one thousand bullets per minute, as occasion may require, and that for any length of time.

VACCINATION.

Nothing can be more striking than the comparison of the success of Vaccination in Sweden and in France. In the former 15,000 perished annually by small pox. In 1810, only 6,000 died from that cause; in 1822, eleven, and in 1823, thirteen! whilst at Paris, during these two years, the mean annual amount of deaths, from small pox, was 1,448. Thus, the capital of France loses, by the small pox, 119 times more children than are destroyed by it in the whole kingdom of Sweden.

NEEDLES.

Persons employed in grinding needles are usually seriously injured, and become consumptive, by inhaling the steel dust thrown off in the operation. To prevent this, a magnet is now suspended over the wheel, which attracts the particles and prevents all injurious effect. This is one of the many modern applications of science, to the purposes of humanity.

GREAT FALL OF RAIN AT BOMBAY.

In a letter from Mr. Scott, jr. of Bombay, he says, that during the first twelve days of the rainy season, thirty-three inches of rain fell, and that then all the roads became like rivers. In England the average fall for the whole year is thirty-two inches—the quantity which fell in Bonbay in the course of twelve days. [Ed N. Ph. Journal.]

REMEDY FOR POISON.

The following singular remedy is much used by the Hottentots, and by many of the colonists, who have borrowed it from them. When a person is bit by any of the more venomous snakes, a fowl is instantly procured, and the fleshy part of the breast being cut open, it is pressed fresh and palpitating to the envenomed wound. The virus is by this means, rapidly abstracted; and if the poison be very deadly, the fowl speedily exhibits clear proof of its malignancy, becomes drowsy, droops, its head, and dies. It is withdrawn, and a second is cut open and applied in the same manner; a third, if requisite; and so on, until it appears, from the decreased influence in the poison on the fowls, that its destructive virulence is effectually subdued. The worst crisis is then considered to be past, and the patient in most cases recovers.

THE GATHERER.

ISLAND OF SCIO.

Scio is one of the most beautiful and celebrated islands in the Archipelago. It is near the coast of Natolia; in length about thirteen leagues, and six in breadth. The productions are oranges, citrons, vines, mastick, game, and all the necessaries of life. The principal trade is in silk. The population is about 10,000 Turks, 30,000 Latians, who have a bishop, and 10,000 Greeks, who have also a bishop. The plague in 1788 destroyed 14,000 persons. The foreign commerce is very considerable. They export manufactured cottons, silk, velvet, gold and silver wove damasks, &c. to Asia, Egypt, and the states of Barbary. The Genoese were many years in possession of the island, but the Turks drove them out in 1595. The Venetians took it 1694, but the Turks retook it in 1698. Scio is the capital. It is a large beautiful city, with a fort and harbour. The Greek bishop is rich. The inhabitants believe that Homer was born in this island. They have a place near the city which they call the schools of Homer, but there is no reason for supposing Homer was ever upon the spot. It has been described by modern travellers, to be a place where they made sacrifices to Pan, or some other rural divinity. In this island there are several Greek families who claim nobility as the descendants of the Genoese Justinians. There are about 200 Christian temples in this island, and thirty religious houses for Christian men and women. The superstition of the Greeks and Turks is a remarkable feature in the general association. Mahomet the Second granted the Sciots many privileges, which the Grand Seigneur has never infringed. The Greeks, in every other part of the Turkish empire, are reputed slaves. In Scio they have a magistrate, named the Consul, who administers justice upon principles of liberty unknown to the Greeks in other parts. It is nineteen leagues from Smyrna, and eighty-four from Constantinople, longitude 43° 50' west, latitude, 38° 8' north.

BALLAD SINGERS.

The ballad singer is a town crier for the advertising of lost tunes. Hunger hath made him a wind instrument; his want is vocal, and not he. His voice had gone a begging before he took it up, and applied it to the same trade; it was too strong to hawk mackerel, but was just soft enough for Robin Adair. His business is to make popular songs unpopular; he gives the air, like a weathercock, with many variations. As a key, he has but one—a lute-key for all manner of tunes; and as they are to pass current amongst the lower sorts of people, he makes his notes like a country banker's, as thick as he can. His notes have a copper sound, for he sounds for copper; and for the musical divisions he hath no regard, but sings on, like a kettle, without taking any heed of the bars. Before beginning he clears his pipe with gin; and he is always hoarse from the thorough draft in his throat. He hath but one shake, and that is in winter. His voice is flat from flatulence; and he fetches breath, like a drowning kitten, whenever he can. Notwithstanding all this, his musick gains ground, for it walks with him from end to end of the street. He is your only performer that requires not many entreaties for a song; for he will chant, without asking, to a street cur or a parish post. His only backwardness is to a stove after dinner, seeing that he never dines; for he sings for bread, and though corn has ears, sings very commonly in vain. As for his country, he is an Englishman, that by his birthright he may sing whether he can or not. To conclude, he is reckoned passable in the city, but is not so good off the stones. [Hood's Whims.]

A DOCTOR'S COMPLAINT.

[Found in a newspaper of 1768.]

If I go to a patient one mile I charge 8d; the advice, bleeding, or vomiting, 8d. more; the time generally taken up in this service, in the winter, is about half a day, people being unwilling a doctor should come away without some little stay; sometimes no medicine is left, so that I get only 8d. for my forenoon's service. Common labourers have 1s. 8d. and seldom work above six hours. My shoemaker charges me 3s. for small children's shoes, and 8d. more for boys of six years old; two pair of which he easily makes in a day. My blacksmith charges me 5s. for shoeing my horse, and I have paid 8s. for his forenoon's service in altering my iron by a charcoal fire. The tavernkeeper four or three pence at least, for New-England; a gallon of which cost them 1s. 6d., so that they gain upwards of £10 per barrel, inclusive of retail and leakage; higher than doctors sell spirits of wine camphorated, and for cash in hand, without taking notes or booking. I was called to other day to bleed my shoemaker's wife; I desired him to mend my boot the whilst, I charged him 8d. He charged me 1s., so that I imagine his ends and wax were thought to be more valuable than the wear of my lancet. Hundreds of such instances might be offered to demonstrate the valuelessness of learning is sinking into obscurity, and that if any one designs to live now-a-days he must metamorphose himself into a tradesman.

ECONOMY.

M. Say, the celebrated French writer on political economy, has the following story:—"Being in the country, I had an example of one of those small losses which a family is exposed to through negligence. From the want of a latch of small value, the wicket of a barn yard, (looking to the fields) was left open; every one who went through, drew the door too, but having no means to fasten it, it remained flapping; the poultry escaped, and were lost. One day a fine pig got out and ran into the wood, and immediately all the world was after it; the gardener—the cook—the dairy maid, all ran to recover the swine. The gardener got sight of him first, and jumped over a ditch to stop him, he sprained his ankle, and was confined a fortnight to the house. The cook on her return, found all the linen she had left to dry by the fire, burned; and the dairy maid having ran off before she tied up the cows, one of them broke the leg of a colt in the stable. The gardener's lost time was worth twenty crowns, valuing his pain at nothing; the linen burned, and the cloth spoiled, were worth as much more.—Here is a loss of forty crowns, and much pain, trouble, vexation, and inconvenience, for the want of a latch, which would not cost three pence, and this loss, through careless neglect, falls on a family little able to support it."

MAHOMEDAN AND CHRISTIAN SLAVERY.

Sir John Malcom, in his interesting "Sketches of Persia," says—"Slaves in Mahomedan countries are only liable, for any crimes they commit, to suffer half the punishment to which a free man would be subject. This law proceeds on the ground of their not being supposed on a par, as to knowledge or social ties, with other parts of the community." The Christian legislators of our West India Islands reverse this principle, there being scarcely an offence enumerated in the slave codes which is not punished with far greater severity on the ignorant and degraded negro, than on the educated and fortune-favoured white. If our vanity would allow us to make the admission, there is many a striking lesson of justice, as well as of morality, to be learnt from the Mussulman and the Heathen.

FIGHTING INSECTS.

It has been said that man is the only animal that makes war on his own species. But the insects, who out do us in many things, vie with us in that species of folly too. The manties have their forelegs somewhat in the shape of a sabre, so that they can cut off their antagonist's head, or cleave him down the middle. The Chinese children treat these animals like gamecocks, keeping them in cages for fighting. The scorpions seem peculiarly gifted with this human propensity. M. Maupertuis placed a hundred in one box, and the event was that they all destroyed each other. Spiders fight together till they have no legs left; and some caterpillars are professed cannibals, feeding on each other, as Saint Jerome tells us our ancestors, the Dalriads of Mr. Pinkerton, did in old times.

YOUNG WOMEN'S KISSES.

The notion of prolonging life by inhaling the breath of young women was (observes Mr. Wadd) an agreeable delusion easily credited; and one physician, who had himself written on health, was so influenced by it, that he actually took lodgings in a boarding-school, that he might never be without a constant supply of the proper atmosphere. Philip Thicknesse, who wrote "The Valetudinarian's Guide," in 1779, seems to have taken a dose whenever he could. I am myself (says he) turned of sixty, and in general, though I have lived in various climates, and suffered severely both in body and mind, yet having always partaken of the breath of young women, whenever they lay in my way, I feel none of the infirmities, which so often strike the eyes and ears in this great city (Bath) of sickness, by men many years younger than myself.

A BOLD AND HAPPY REPLY.

During the reign of that superlative wretch, Henry VIII., a friar named Peyto was threatened by his detestable tool, Cromwell, for having preached with too much freedom: and the preacher was told by the courtier that he deserved to be enclosed in a sack and thrown into the Thames. Peyto replied with a sarcastick smile, "Threaten such things to rich and dainty folks, who are clothed in purple, fare deliciously, and have their chief hopes in this world: we esteem them not. We are joyful that for the discharge of our duty we are driven hence. With thanks to God, we know that the way to heaven is as short by water as by land, and therefore care not which way we go."

NAPOLEON.

The frugality of Napoleon was such, that his taste gave the preference to the most simple and the least seasoned dishes; as œufs au miroir and haricots en salade. His breakfast was almost always composed of one of these dishes, and a little Parmesan cheese. At dinner he ate little, rarely of ragouts, and always of wholesome things. I have often heard him say, "that however little nourishment people took at dinner, they always took too much." Thus his head was always clear, and his labour easy, even when he rose from table. Gifted by nature with a perfectly healthy stomach, his nights were as calm as those of an infant; nature, also, had bestowed on him a constitution so admirably suited to his station, that a single hour of sleep would restore him after twenty-four hours fatigue. In the midst of the most serious and urgent events, he had the power of resigning himself to sleep at pleasure, and his mind enjoyed the most perfect calm, as soon as directions were given for the necessary arrangements.

APATHY.

The first sense that a man has of the better part of his life being over, and the afternoon of his day come, is the consciousness of the matter of his hopes being quite exhausted. He may continue in the cheerful participation of all his habitual pleasures, seem mirthful to his companions, and still taste with relish his accustomed enjoyments; but a cold inward pressure, which resolution cannot remove, makes him to feel that the spring of his life hath spent its elasticity, and can never prompt to adventure without crouching.

POPULAR TALES.

THE LAST VOYAGE.

BY MRS. OPIE.

We cannot fail to observe, as we advance in life, how vividly our earliest recollections recur to us, and this consciousness is accompanied by a melancholy pleasure, when we are deprived of those who are most tenderly associated with such remembrances, because they bring the beloved dead "before our mind's eye," and beguile the loneliness of the present hour, by visions of the past. In such visions I now often love to indulge, and in one of them, a journey to Y— was recently brought before me, in which my ever-indulgent father permitted me to accompany him, when I was yet but a child.

As we drove through C—r, a village within three miles of Y—, he directed my attention to a remarkable rising, or conical mound of earth on the top of the tower of C—r church. He then kindly explained the cause of this singular, and distinguishing appearance, and told me the traditional anecdote connected with it; which now, in my own words, I am going to communicate to my readers.

It is generally supposed, that great grief makes the heart so selfishly absorbed in its own sufferings, as to render it regardless of the sufferings of others; but the conduct of her, who is the heroine of the following tale, will prove to this general rule an honourable exception.

I know nothing of her birth, and parentage, nor am I acquainted even with her name—but I shall call her BIRTHA—the story goes, that she lived at C—r, a village three miles from Y— in N—, and was betrothed to the mate of a trading vessel, with the expectation of marrying him, when he had gained money sufficient, by repeated voyages, to make their union consistent with prudence.

In the meanwhile, there is reason to believe that BIRTHA was not idle, but contrived to earn money herself, in order to expedite the hour of her marriage; and at length, her lover (whom I shall call William) thought that there was no reason for him to continue his sea-faring life, but at the end of one voyage more, he should be able to marry the woman of his choice, and engage in some less dangerous employment, in his native village.

Accordingly, the next time that he bade farewell to BIRTHA, the sorrow of their parting hour was soothed by William's declaring, that, as the next voyage would be his last, he should expect, when he returned, to find every thing ready for their marriage.

This was a pleasant expectation, and BIRTHA eagerly prepared to fulfil it.

By the time that BIRTHA was beginning to believe that William was on his voyage home, her neighbours would often help her to count the days which would probably elapse before the ship could arrive; but when they were not in her presence, some of the experienced amongst the men used to express a hope, the result of fear, that William would return time enough to avoid certain winds, which made one part of the navigation on that coast particularly dangerous.

BIRTHA herself, had, no doubt, her fears, as well as her hopes; but there are some fears which the lip of affection dares not utter, and this was one of them.

BIRTHA dreaded to have her inquiries respecting that dangerous passage, answered by "Yes, we know that it is a difficult navigation;" she also dreaded to be told by some kind, but ill-judging friends, to "trust in Providence;" as, by such advice, the reality of the danger would be still more powerfully confirmed to her. This recommendation would to her have been needless, as well as alarming; for she had, doubtless, always relied on Him who is alone able to save, and she knew that the same "Almighty arm was underneath" her lover still, which had hitherto preserved him in the time of need.

Well—time went on, and we will imagine the little garden before the door of the house which BIRTHA had hired, new gravelled, fresh flowers sown and planted there; the curtains ready to be put up; the shelves bright with polished utensils; table linen, white as the driven snow, enclosed in a newly-purchased chest of drawers; and the neat, well chosen wedding-clothes, ready for the approaching occasion: we will also picture to ourselves, the trembling joy of BIRTHA, when her eager and sympathizing neighbours rushed into her cottage, disturbing her early breakfast, with the glad tidings, that William's ship had been seen approaching the dangerous passage with a fair wind, and that there was no doubt but that he would get over it safe, and in day-light! How sweet is it to be the messenger and the bearer of good news, but it is still sweeter to know that one has friends who have pleasure in communicating pleasure to us!

But BIRTHA's joy was still mingled with anxiety, and she probably passed that day in alternate restlessness and prayer.

Towards night the wind rose high, blowing from a quarter unfavourable to the safety of the ship, and it still continued to blow in this direction when night and darkness had closed on all around.

Darkness at that moment seemed to close also upon the prospects of BIRTHA! for she knew that there was no beacon, no landmark to warn the vessel of its danger, and inform the pilot what coast they were approaching, and what perils they were to avoid; and, it is probable, that the almost despairing girl was, with her anxious friends, that livelong night a restless wanderer on the nearest shore.

With the return of morning came the awful confirmation of their worst fears!

There was no remaining vestige of William's vessel, save the top of the mast, which shewed where it had sunk beneath the waves, and proved that the hearts which in the morning had throbbed high with tender hopes and joyful expectations were then cold and still "beneath the mighty waters!" How different now was the scene in BIRTHA's cottage, to that which it exhibited during the preceding morning.

That changed dwelling was not indeed deserted, for sympathizing neighbours came to it as before; but though many may be admitted with readiness when it is a time for congratulation, it is only the few who can be welcome in a season of sorrow; and BIRTHA's sorrow, though quiet, was deep—while neither her nearest relative, nor dearest friend, could do any thing to assist her, save, by removing from her sight the new furniture, or the new dresses, which had been prepared for those happy hours that now could never be hers.

At length, however, BIRTHA, who had always appeared calm and resigned, seemed cheerful also! still she remained pale, as in the first moments of her trial, save when a feverish flush occasionally increased the brightness of her eyes; but she grew thinner and thinner, and her impeded breath made her affectionate friends suspect that she was going into a rapid decline.

Medical aid was immediately called in, and BIRTHA's pleased conviction that her end was near, was soon, though reluctantly confirmed to her, at her own request.

It is afflicting to see an invalid rejoice in knowing that the hour of death is certainly approaching; because it proves the depth and poignancy of the previous sufferings; but then the sight is comforting and edifying also. It is comforting, because it proves that the dying person is supported by the only "help that faileth not;" and it is edifying, because it invites those who behold it to endeavour to believe, that they also may live and die like the departing Christian.

But it was not alone the wish "to die and be with Christ," nor the sweet expectation of being united in another world to him whom she had lost, that was the cause of BIRTHA's increasing cheerfulness, as the hour of her dissolution drew nigh. No—

Her generous heart was rejoicing in a project which she had conceived, and which would, if realized, be the source of benefit to numbers yet unborn. She knew from authority which she could not doubt, that had there been a proper land-mark on the shore, her lover and his ship would not, in all human probability, have perished.

"Then," said BIRTHA, "henceforth there shall be a land-mark on this coast! and I will furnish it! Here at least, no fond and faithful girl shall again have to lament over her blighted prospects, and pine, and suffer as I have done."

She sent immediately for the clergyman of the parish, made her will, and had a clause inserted to the following effect: "I desire that I may be buried on the top of the tower of C—r church! and that my grave may be made very high, and pointed, in order to render it a perpetual land-mark to all ships approaching that dangerous navigation where he whom I loved was wrecked. I am assured, that, had there been a land-mark on the tower of C—r church, his ship might have escaped; and I humbly trust, that my grave will always be kept up, according to my will, to prevent affectionate hearts, in future, from being afflicted as mine has been; and I leave a portion of my little property in the hands of trustees, for ever, to pay for the preservation of the above-mentioned grave, in all its usefulness!"

Before she died, the judicious and benevolent sufferer had the satisfaction of being assured, that her intentions would be carried into effect.

Her last moments were therefore cheered by the belief, that she would be graciously permitted to be, even after death, a benefit to others, and that her grave might be the means of preserving some of her fellow-creatures from shipwreck and affliction.

Nor was her belief a delusive one—The conical grave in question gives so remarkable an appearance to the tower of C—r church, when it is seen at sea, even at a distance, that if once observed it can never be forgotten, even by those to whom the anecdote connected with it is unknown—therefore, as soon as it appears in sight, pilots know that they are approaching a dangerous coast, and take measures to avoid its perils.

But if the navigation on that coast is no longer as perilous as it was, when the heroine of this story was buried, and the tower of C—r church is no longer a necessary land-mark, still her grave remains a pleasing memorial of one, whose active benevolence rose superior to the selfishness both of sorrow and of sickness; and enabled her, even on the bed of death, to contrive and will for the benefit of posterity.

It is strange, but true, that the name of this humble, but privileged being, is not on record; but many whose names are forgotten on earth, have been, I doubt not, received and rewarded in heaven.

HISTORICAL.

BATTLE OF LEXINGTON.

And wild and high the Cameron's gathering rose,
The war-note of Lochiel, that Albion's hills
Have heard; and beard too have her Saxon foes,
How in the noon of night that pibroch thrills—
BYRON.

Whoever, for the first time, may chance to pass through the village of Lexington cannot but be impressed with a sort of local awe, as he approaches the field where the first blood was shed, in one of the greatest revolutions the world ever saw. Of a still summer afternoon, the New Hampshire wagoner is often seen turning off from the road, with his whip in his hand, to read the inscription on the monument, of which he has just caught a glimpse among the trees. He enters the enclosure with awakening attention. The tranquillity of the spot, the vicinity of the church, with which the green common is connected, and the bordering trees, which cast their lengthening shadows on the granite pillar, conspire to solemnize the scene, and open the mind of the stranger to a deep impression, as his eye catches the first lines of the inscription—

"Sacred to liberty and the rights of mankind,
The freedom and independence of America."

A thrilling interest arises in his mind, as he proceeds to the names of the simple yeomen who gave up their lives on that momentous occasion, and are sleeping in the dust beneath his feet. His thoughts recur involuntarily to the alarming scene of war, which burst out upon that field, sending horror and grief into the hearts of the inexperienced cottagers. Imagination pictures the ghastly countenances of the slain, and he seems to hear the wild shout of the conquerors, whose bayonets are reeking in their blood. He looks round for some loitering villager to give him an account of the place or battle, no circumstance of which, however trivial, but he will listen to with eagerness.

The rural town of Lexington contains less than two thousand inhabitants, yet possesses peculiar characteristics, which render it in some measure worthy to be the scene of the great event which distinguished it. All its citizens are agriculturists. Even in the earliest period of its history, before it became a township, when the old town of Cambridge swallowed up all the neighbouring territory, it was known by the name of "Cambridge Farms." This characteristic, joined with a healthy competence and equal distribution of property, led from its very settlement to principles of independence and liberty. This place has always been highly republican and patriotic; and considering its vicinity to the metropolis, and other confused trading towns, singularly distinguished for an universal equality of rank in society, and freedom from that obscuring of the human race, which loiter about the heels of the wealthy.

It is well known what excitement prevailed and spread unopposed among a social and united people, while the British troops were stationed in Boston, antecedent to the breaking out of the revolutionary war. Our fathers had time to consider what they were about to attempt, and to fortify their minds with cool determination. Children gathered closely round their parents; mothers grew pale for apprehension; but our fathers beheld them with a quiet though firm and unshaken aspect. They beheld the gathering of mighty clouds, whose effects they could not wholly foresee, yet the language of their hearts was, "Let it come." "The air of this wide, romantick land breathes liberty. The wolf and the catamount of our forest, and the bison-robed Indian have taught it to us. Our ancestors marked not their age with the character of adventure, and ploughed not the distant ocean, to plant us here in servitude."

At dead of the night which preceded the battle of Lexington, 800 British grenadiers and regulars leaped silently into boats, crossed over Charles River bay to Lechmere point, and with great wariness and expedition, struck across through bushes and marsh mud, to gain the high road which led to Lexington and Concord. But the vigilant colonists were not unapprised of their motions. As soon as a regular had leaped into a boat, a fleet horse was in the wind to carry the alarm into the country.—Suddenly the sleeping hills re-echoed to the clang of the church bell; shrill war-notes whistled among the valleys, and the gloominess of night gave wild presentiment of more gloomy reality. Then was the time for the dark spirit to arouse its sleeping energies. The cottager awakes, and fancies that he already hears the clang of arms, and the ruthless shout of the fierce grenadier, as he rushes to sheath his bayonet in the bodies of his wife and children. He springs from his couch, buckles on his leathern girdles, already supplied with the ammunition of death, and grasps his faithful musket; then turning to cast a look, perhaps the last, upon his wife and children, their faces pale with emotion, and more anxious for him than themselves, strengthen the nerves of his resolution. They cling to him: he conjures them to be quiet, and he will defend them, and rushes from his cottage.

The drum is heard which calls him to the field. By the light of the moon he hastens thither. The night is still again—no sound of the enemy is heard—an awful suspense ensues. Soon, however, horses' hoofs are heard—a breathless courier arrives announcing the near approach of 1500 of the enemy. And what could fifty militia yeomen, drawn up in battle array on the field of Lexington, think of doing with 1500 British infantry, by thus boldly intercepting their progress, while not another one of their countrymen had taken up arms or ever shed a drop of English blood? what but an utter recklessness of life, an enthusiastick ardour to be the first in their country's defence, a mad determination to thwart the first encroachment of tyranny, heightened by the midnight scene and the sudden outrage of a mercenary foe, could have induced them to take such a stand? Yet it was well. Now that the mighty struggle is over, which made us free, we applaud such ready and Spartan spirit; such promptness and daring in our fathers to go forward and resist, like the band of Leonidas, the first approaches of oppression.

Parker, their captain, charged them to keep their ground and not to give the first fire. "Let us not,"

said he, "begin the quarrel; but if they will have war, here let it be determined. Let them prick a vein of us, if they dare. Should we fall, it is in no common cause; on no trifling occasion. We shall be revenged." The enemy were now within one hundred rods, and their bright arms were just seen glimmering in the moonlight. They had heard the war-drum of the villagers, halted, charged their pieces, and were now coming up in double quick time. What could have been their thoughts on thus discovering this handful of yeomen quietly drawn up in silent and motionless array on the open field to meet them, notwithstanding all the wariness and expedition of their march from the metropolis under cover of the night? The enemy came up shouting to within ten rods of the unshrinking villagers. "Disperse, you rebels!" bellowed out the English colonel, with his opprobrious appellations, firing his pistol at them, brandishing his broadsword, and in the same breath ordering his foremost ranks to fire. The first platoon fired over the heads of the villagers, who still remained silent and undismayed. A second more general discharge was made directly among them. Seven Americans fell to the earth. The rest broke and dispersed with a retreating fire, which, however, only wounded a few of the enemy. The British kept up their fire as long as they could see one to fire at.

"After the first fire," says J. Munroe, one of the surviving villagers, "I thought, and so stated to E. Munroe, who stood next to me on the left, that they had fired nothing but powder; but on the second firing, Munroe said that they had fired something more than powder, for he had received a wound in his arm; and now, said he, 'I'll give them the contents of my gun.' We then both took aim at the main body of the British troops,—the smoke prevented our seeing any thing but the heads of some of their horses—and discharged our pieces. After the second fire of the British troops, I distinctly saw J. Parker struggling on the ground, with his gun in his hand, apparently attempting to load it. In this situation, the British came up, run him through with the bayonet and killed him on the spot. After I had fired the first time, I retreated about ten rods, and then loaded my gun a second time with two balls; and on firing at the British, the strength of the charge took off about a foot of my gun barrel." (Hist. Battle at Lexington by E. Phinney.) The conquerors, on gaining the field and thus opening the flood gates of the revolutionary war, drew up on the battle ground, fired a volley, and gave three huzzas, and soon after were on the highway again for Concord. The villagers closed warily upon their rear; and made prisoners of six regulars, who loitered behind.

On the return of the enemy from Concord, in the afternoon of the same day, the vanquished villagers had completely rallied, and with the yeomanry of all the surrounding towns, took them at much better advantage than in the morning, plying in flank and rear, from stone-wall ramparts, and the trunks of trees, in the true Indian style. Their fire was continual and deadly, yet would have been much more so, had not Lord Percy re-enforced the enemy from Boston, with one thousand men and some field pieces. These now roared against the Americans. Houses were pillaged and in flames, and women and children, hurried away to the woods. The royal forces collected on a commanding hill about a mile below the church, recruited themselves there, and by night succeeded in reaching Bunker hill. Forty-nine Americans fell in this battle, and sixty-five of the British. It was not great in profusion of blood, but only for the occasion, on which it was fought, and the circumstances which attended it.

It has been said by one of our first orators, that when our country shall have grown mightier in future times, and national history shall have poured out its tomes, and the dusk of antiquity shall have begun to gather round and consecrate the leading events of her earliest establishment, when our children's children shall have multiplied, this battle will be compared to that of the Spartans of Leonidas, and Lexington and Thermopylae will be pronounced together. But, although this may be too much for the present, even in the warmest panegyrics of the offspring of the patriots, who fell on this occasion, yet there is certainly a similarity in the two events.

The British foe did not indeed equal the millions of Xerxes, yet came like them from a distant country to enslave a free people, who were inferior in wealth and numbers. Leonidas and his little band marched forth boldly and alone to battle, first to resist the mighty intruder and give him a sample of the freeborn character of those he was about to cope with. These heroes made a bloodier and longer resistance against the proud invaders than the yeomanry of Lexington, yet they were enabled to do so from the peculiar advantage of their situation in a narrow pass, while the latter met their foe in the open fields. Leonidas and his band were all slain except one man; and if Parker and his band of yeomen were not all strewn upon their native soil, it was not that they did not sufficiently expose themselves, were not sufficiently daring, or that the bright bayonets, which were leveled against their unshrinking ranks, were not sufficiently numerous, or that the bullets, which whistled about their ears, were not sufficiently plentiful. Some of the veterans who composed this remarkable band, are yet living with their offspring upon the soil which they then so bravely defended. I have often listened to the tales of this and other scenes of revolutionary warfare. There is one very old lady, living now in the same bevel-roofed house, on the highway to Concord, about a mile above the village, which she dwelt in on the day of the battle, who has often amused me with an account of her adventures on that occasion. I do not mention her in context with those aged veterans to diminish aught of their martial character, but merely to illustrate a little further the scene in which they acted.

"I heard the guns," says she, "at about day-break, but being unapprehensive of danger, did not, like most of our neighbours, move off for fear of the enemy; especially as my father was confined to his bed of a severe sickness, so that in fleeing from the house we must leave him behind, which I could not consent to. Our domesticks had already absconded we knew not whither. I, therefore, and my husband, who, on account of a certain indisposition, was incapacitated for military service, remained in the house with our father, while the enemy passed; which they did without offering us any injury. I remember well, their exact order, red coats, glittering arms, and appalling numbers.—Some time after, on their arrival at Concord, a report of musketry was once more heard, and in broken and incessant volleys. It was a sound of death to us. All now was trepidation, fever, and rushing to arms; women and children bewildered and scouring across the fields. With much ado, we succeeded in yoking our oxen and getting father on his bed into an ox-cart, and thus moving him off as carefully as we could to a neighbour's house, at some distance from the highway, on which we expected the enemy to return. Before leaving our house, I secured some of the most valuable of my effects, putting my large looking glass between two feather beds, and fastening all the windows and doors. The house we carried father to, had been already vacated, and here I was left alone with him. The dreadful sound of approaching guns was still ringing in my ears. Bewildered and affrighted, I betook myself into the house cellar, there to await my fate. Occasionally, I ventured to peep out to discover the approach of the enemy. After remaining some time in this dreadful state of fear and suspense, I at last discovered the enemy coming down a long hill on the highway, partly upon a run and in some confusion, being closely beset by 'our men' in flank and rear. The terrific array of war soon came fully into view, and as soon passed off again from before my eyes, like a horrid vision, leaving only a cloud of smoke behind and the groans of the dying, who were strewn in its wake.

"After the rattle of musketry had grown somewhat weaker from distance, and my heart became more relieved of its apprehensions, I resolved to return home. But what an altered scene began to present itself, as I approached the house—garden walls thrown down—my floors trampled upon—earth and herbage covered with the marks of hurried footsteps. The house had been broken open, and on the door-step—awful spectacle—there lay a British soldier dead, on his face, though yet warm, in his blood, which was still trickling from a bullet-hole through his vitals. His bosom and his pockets were stuffed with my effects, which he had been pillaging, having broken into the house through a window. On entering my front room I was horror-struck. Three mangled soldiers lay groaning on the floor and weltering in their blood, which had gathered in large puddles about them. 'Beat out my brains, I beg of you,' cried one of them, a young Briton, who was dreadfully pierced with bullets, through almost every part of his body, 'and relieve me from this agony.' You will die soon enough, said I, with a revengeful pique. A grim Irishman, shot through the jaws, lay beside him, who mingled his groans of desperation with curses on the villain who had so wounded him.—The third was a young American, employing his dying breath in prayer. A bullet had passed through his body, taking off in its course the lower part of his powder-horn. The name of this youthful patriot was J Haywood, of Acton. His father came and carried his body home; it now lies in Acton grave-yard. These were the circumstances of his death; being ardent and close in the pursuit, he stopped a moment at our well to slake his thirst. Turning from the well, his eye caught that of the Briton, whom I saw lying dead on the door-step, just coming from the house with his plunder.—They were about a rod from each other. The Briton knew it was death for him to turn, and the American scorned to shrink. A moment of awful suspense ensued—when both simultaneously levelled their muskets at each other's heart, fired and ell on their faces together. My husband drew the two Britons off on a sled, and buried them in one of our pastures where they now lie, beneath a pine tree which has grown up out of their grave. The Irishman was the only one of the three that survived." [Harvard Register.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS. We have had occasion to refer to the proceedings of the different legislative bodies of the Mexican republic, as they have related to the Masonick Order and its adherents. The first notice we gave something like a year ago, which was an announcement of a signal defeat of the enemies of Masonry in the general congress of that republic. Several months subsequent to this, the congress of the state of Vera Cruz, a subject state of that nation, entered its testimony against freemasonry in an act of proscription, which liberal act was soon followed by an insignificant and imbecile attack on Mr. Poinsett, minister of the United States to Mexico. The next information we have, was a recent and more serious commotion raised by the party who opposed Mr. Poinsett, denominated Escoceses, which has however resulted in the utter discomfiture of their plans, and proved their hypocrisy beyond a doubt. A bill was pending before the general congress for the suppression of all masonick societies; but the state congress of Vera Cruz, not satisfied with the provisions of the bill, made a report, or rather an exposition to the general government, of a tone and character that told too plainly what subsequent events proved to be true,—that their aim was a monopoly in the affairs and offices of the general government. They recommended that the secretaries of despatch should be removed, and "that their places should be bestowed on men of known probity and merit;"—that a passport should be granted without loss of time to the envoy from the government of the United States, Mr. Poinsett;—and cap the climax, as is usual in all such disinterested persecutions, by some flaming protestations of patriotic zeal. Disappointed in these attempts, the Escoceses took up arms for the dismemberment of the federal government, and the patriotic legislature of the state of Vera Cruz followed suit. The rebellion continued for fifteen days; and was put down with the loss of but few lives. General Biavo the vice president of the Union, Barragan, governor of the state of Vera Cruz, and colonel Santa Anna, have been taken prisoners and before this have probably suffered death for their treason. They were the ring leaders. Since these events, the legislature of Vera Cruz has become wonderfully loyal to the general government,—publicly "eating their own words,"—throwing the blame on Barragan and pleading "compulsion"—repealing the act passed last summer against freemasons and lodges,—and it was expected soon to see a "manifesto" eulogizing our minister, Mr. Poinsett, as much as it has heretofore abused him. If this has proved any thing political respecting the masonick order, we leave it for the impartial to judge, whether of the two parties respected and adopted the duties of good citizens, the masons,—or their persecutors, the Escoceses.

POETRY. The quantity of this article of domestic manufacture now in market seems to augur well for printers, if not for readers. Matter is never so dull as entirely to exhaust the patience of printers, if so be that they labour in hope of some substantial edification in the form of cash. It would be well if readers were thus supported through the trials which so perpetually beset them on every side.

It would seem that modern scribblers, after numberless attempts to scratch out something in the shape of reason, had abandoned the project as hopeless, and come to the unanimous conclusion to attempt nothing hereafter but rhyme. Here again, it were something more tolerable, had they succeeded universally even in this undertaking; for to our ear, which, if we say it ourselves, is not so dull as to mistake blank verse for rhyme, ten to one who undertake, at the risk of an enormous expenditure of ink, and the consumption of numberless reams of foolscap, to manufacture the fabric usually termed verse, fail, and produce a mixture, a sort of nondescript in literature, which is neither rhyme nor reason.

It really appears to us not so difficult a task to compose in rhyme as some imagine, but we will readily grant that poetry and rhyme are far from being synonymous terms. Yet it is an ornament much neglected by our best poets, perhaps on the ground that good poetry will sanction almost any defect. In the several articles we have selected for our present number, we find several such oversights, which to say the least are blemishes which might have been avoided by proper care. For instance, the word eye cannot be called a rhyme to the last syllable of the word poetry; sighs with the same of harmonies; nor gone with flown, let the writers be Mrs. Hemans, Percy Bysshe Shelley, or any other gifted poet. The article with the caption, "A Parthian Glance," while it bears witness to the genius of Mr. Hood as a comick poet, carries another and no less complimentary proof of his correct musical ear, in its exact and judicious rhyme. Not an exception to the last observation is to be met with in the whole article. The truth is that the inattention of some first rate-poets to these minutiae have furnished an excuse for every one who dabbles in iambs and dactyls;—and when you tell them of their defects in rhyme, they refer you directly to Byron, or Mrs. Hemans, or Scott, or some other eminent author as a standard for their blunders. By the same rule, even Pope's "Universal Prayer," and "Messiah" would become a ready excuse for the murdered syntax perpetrated by every ignoramus in America or England. To say that such trifling defects in rhyme are enough to condemn the writings of those who have licensed them, would be folly; but this we may safely say,—that composition can not be called finished poetry, which pretends to be rhyme and is not. We advise all aspirants for poetick fame to habituate themselves to a critical revision of their own productions, even in the most minute parts; there is no danger of their being too scrupulous.

Of all living poets, we believe that Moore is the most accurate in points of this kind. He however, has now and then a slip of the thought, in common with others of peculiarly high standing. Moore was so particular in one instance as to mention an error of this kind in a note at the end of Lalla Rookh, where it was discovered too late to correct it in the proper place; and this error was nothing more than coupling for rhymes the words night and unite.—Montgomery too is in general exact in his rhymes, which add in our opinion highly to his poetical character. In America, Doctor Percival is perhaps the most correct in that particular, but Byron has been so universally read and admired, that his false rhymes which in composition are perhaps his greatest blemishes, have obtained a sort of sanction among our writers, which ought not to be tolerated. Mr. Halleck, whom we consider in the first rank as a poet, is forever rhyming the long sound of i or y with the short final sound of the latter letter.

Blank verse appears but little cultivated at present, or but little success attends it. It is a species of composition incapable of so many novelties of style as rhyme, and consequently not endowed with the capability of variety, which is the grand desideratum among our modern harp-stringers. On the whole, much as there is at present before the publick both classick and ephemeral, we doubt whether much eminence is easily to be acquired in the cultivation of it, and must again enforce a call on the young bards of America, to turn their attention more particularly to rhyme.

EDITOR BESIEGED. The editor of the Illinois Gazette, published at Shawneetown in that state, gives a very shrewd and lively account of the late remarkable rise of the Ohio at that place; or so far as he was personally interested in the general deluge, being driven by the waters into the garret of his office, there to ponder over his situation

His office, which stands upon the highest spot of natural ground in the town, was inundated to the depth of six feet above the lower floor. His sole companion in this involuntary hermitage was a dog he had charitably rescued from the waters, who was far from being a pleasant one; for in the most tempestuous part of the flood, while this insulated castle was tottering under the furious application of the winds and rain above, and the ocean of waves beneath, he "kept chorus with the blast in such a manner as to render sleep out of the question." After many attempts to hush him without effect, he took up "a file of papers which formed a part of the bed, and belaboured the noisy animal until he grew tired of the exercise; and even this had no more impression than words had done before. The reason of this was discovered in the morning—it was a file of Penn's Weekly Advertiser, which makes no impression on the head of man or beast."

How long this brother of the type held this exalted though far from enviable station, he does not inform us; perhaps he did not feel exactly certain himself;—for he observes that on first putting their feet upon land the day of the week was forgotten,—some contending that it was Friday, others Saturday, and some Sunday, and others Monday. From the tenour of the narration we should judge that it could not have been less than from eight to twelve days that he was a tenant of this newly invented ark.

The neighbouring mounds, so often alluded to as the supposed fortifications of the ancient inhabitants of this country, were the only spots left dry. These were covered with cattle and hogs, which the editor presumes to afford a hint to the antiquarian, of the original design of these monuments of a former century. Some have supposed them to be burial places; others fortifications,—and many other conjectures have been wasted upon the subject. These may either or all of them be true; but as it now stands, we must concede to the opinion of the aforesaid weather-bound editor, and pronounce them commodious and permanent refuges from the floods, erected by the persevering industry of a race of natives now extinct. We have materially abridged the account given by the Noah of the west,—but we found it necessary to draw out this article much beyond our intention, to preserve even a tolerable share of the writer's shrewd and spirited narration. He says that the damage to the village sustained by this unlooked for and unusually protracted freshet, was not so extensive as had been anticipated. Yet the freshet was of an extraordinary character,—being the highest within the remembrance of the oldest inhabitants; and coming in an unusual season of the year, it must have put them to great inconvenience. The editor however states, that a truly neighbourly spirit was manifested towards him in particular—a faithful friend having furnished him every second day with the necessary staff of life.

INDEFATIGABLE PREACHER. The most extraordinary instance of long and laborious service in the clerical office ever under our notice, is the case of the Rev. John Charleston, a coloured preacher of the Methodist connexion, in Virginia. The Rev. Stith Mead, who was familiarly acquainted with him, describes this son of another race even to the particularity of height, weight, colour, dress and age, in a late number of the "Zion's Herald." He is now near sixty-one, very tall, and weighing 230 pounds. He has preached eighteen years, and during that time, he would walk thirty miles in a day, and preach three times. Neither storm nor flood were to him an obstacle; he would ford or swim large streams, and had his dog so tutored as to carry his bible and hymn book across in his mouth, without suffering them to get wet. He had the reputation of being a correct speaker, and a good orator. The effeminate and luxurious labourers in the spiritual vineyard may take a profitable lesson from this humble African.

SAINT PATRICK. The anniversary nativity of this apostle and guardian saint of Ireland will be on Monday next, the 17th inst. Born as he was in an age destitute of literary means adequate to hand down his history to posterity, the biography of this singularly gifted man is but little known to the present generation. He is supposed to owe his birth either to Wales or the adjacent county of Cornwall in England. Being taken and carried off to Ireland by pirates, he became the herald of Christianity to that then heathen people, and under his preaching the true religion acquired a strong and permanent footing in that island. Saint Patrick died about the year 460. His memory is deservedly venerated by the enthusiastick and generous natives of that oppressed island.

TABLE-TALK.

In Perry county, Ohio, a yellow woman was tried at the last term of the court of common pleas, convicted, and sentenced three years to the penitentiary, for horse stealing.—A poor labouring man with a family, who has lived in the town of Pomfret, Chataugue county, in this state, for several years, and whose pecuniary circumstances have at times been so low and discouraging, that he found it difficult to get trusted at any of the village stores to the value of a single dollar, has very recently received authentick intelligence from England, whence he emigrated, that he has become the heir to a fortune of more than $40,000. He has of course departed to go into possession of his good fortune. —At a late New-York sessions, a woman was indicted for stealing some bombazines; but it being proved that she had taken only bombazet, she was acquitted!—One of the most moving sermons perhaps ever preached on land, was not long since delivered in a New-York church, while under the operation of moving from one street to another. As the pews were all in tiers, the audience must have been greatly moved.—Two divines, Mr. Walker and Mr. Reed, preached each in the same pulpit on the same day. The former took for his text, "What went ye out for to see,—a Reed shaken with the wind?" the latter preached from these words,—“And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.” After a short introduction, he observed,—“from these words we may infer that the devil was a mighty Walker.”—A person living in Byron, Genesee county, has lately discovered that the persons concerned in the crucifixion of our Saviour were freemasons! alleging that he can prove the fact,—and furthermore offering to make oath to the statement! The same person intimates that an anti-masonick bible is about to be published, in which the names of Solomon, and all those considered as the patrons of freemasonry, will be omitted.—Proposals are issued for the publication of a new paper in some part of New-Jersey, to be entitled the Celestial Trio. [We shall next hear of the “Martingale to Bucephalus,” the “Crupper of Pegasus,” the “Suspenders of Apollo,” “Melpomene’s Night-Cap,” or the “Garters of Minerva,”—quite as appropriate as one half the sky-high titles assumed by our literary air-balloons of the present day.]—Two clergymen have lately departed from New-York for England, to enquire into their claims to the estates and titles of Scottish lords, of which it is believed they have become the legal heirs.—Caveat Latrones! The Trenton True American contains this very combustible threat:—“Those persons who steal the editor’s wood are informed that some of them are known, and unless they desist in future, they may chance to burn their fingers!”—By a typographical error in a late New-York paper, the Montreal Gazette is made to say, “the road to the island of Saint Helena is no longer passable for carriages!”—Paddy need wait no longer for his projected tour across the ocean by land. The island at Saint Helen’s, near Montreal, was meant.—Among the papers of the late John M’Intyre, Postmaster in Marion, Georgia, were found a great number of letters, broken open but containing money; one directed to D. D. Saunders, enclosing $175. Mr. M’Intyre certainly and literally died for the publick good.—An eccentric Englishman used to object to having his horses shod, because it would make them so proud that they could not walk, for looking at their feet.

FOREIGN. Five packets have arrived from Europe, in New-York, during the present week, bringing regular files of English papers to the 16th of February inclusive. The new British ministry, with the duke of Wellington at the head, is composed entirely of tories. There appears to be much confusion and jangling among the ins and outs, and parliament having met on the 29th of January, no little noise was made by the disappointed knowing ones. Accounts from Constantinople are strongly confirmatory of the warlike intentions of the Porte. The Bosphorus has been closed against the vessels of all nations, and the subjects of the three christian powers have been warned to leave the capital. The pirates are rumoured to have captured two vessels sent from the United States with provisions for the Greeks. An American frigate, it is said, had proceeded to Carabusa, the station of these pirates, burnt several piratical vessels, and hung upon the spot the whole crew, fifteen in number! The Greeks had taken Scio after a terrible conflict. Lord Cochrane arrived at Portsmouth from Greece on the 15th of February. The London papers state that the scheme for settling the affairs of Turkey is, that the Greeks indemnify the Turks for the loss of their fleet, for which England is to become security,—and that on these terms Greece is to be independent! Doubtful. At any rate, the allied powers appear far more anxious for peace at present than the Porte.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Saturday, March 1. In senate, a message was received from his honour the lieutenant governor, transmitting resolutions from the legislature of Ohio, disapproving certain resolutions of the state of South Carolina relative to the constitutional powers of the general government. The message and resolutions, together with a report and resolutions, from the state of Georgia, on the same subject heretofore laid on the table, was referred to a select committee consisting of Messrs. Carroll, Throop and Jordan. The bill from the assembly to prevent obstructions in Eighteen Mile creek, to the town of Royalton, Niagara county, was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, Mr. Monell, from the committee on grievances, to whom was referred certain petitions and counter-petitions relative to the construction of the Cayuga and Seneca canal, submitted a resolution calling on the canal commissioners for information in relation to the same. Adopted.—A return was received from the bank of New-York, in pursuance of the resolution of the house. Ordered printed.—Bills read a third time and passed: to change the name of the Welch Religious Society in Remsen; for the relief of Andrew Purdy; concerning the jail limits in Steuben; authorizing J. Whitney and another to erect a dam across the Susquehannah; amending the act relative to the first Presbyterian society in Pittsford; for the appointment of a justice of the peace in the fifth ward of the city of Albany. The house occupied the remainder of the day in a committee of the whole on the bill for the renewal of the charter of the New-York State bank.

Monday, March 3. In senate, resolved that the canal commissioners report to the senate, when the mills and machinery erected on the Champlain canal were erected, and by whom, and on what terms, and by whose authority, and the length of time such mills and machinery have been in operation, and by whom conducted, and the rents received, and the value of the water power, whether taken from the canal, feeder or river, if the consequence of the construction thereof, and if any thing has been paid for such privileges, by whom and the amount thereof; and if nothing has been paid, the reasons why it has not been done.

Resolved, that the comptroller furnish to the chairman of the select committee appointed on the petition of Stephen Field and others in relation to the claim of John Jacob Astor and his associates, a detailed statement of the moneys which have been paid in relation to the examination of that claim, and the defence of the suits concerning it. The bill from the assembly to incorporate the New-York Beneficial society, was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, the following resolution, were unanimously adopted: The death of Major General JACOB BROWN, Commander in Chief of the army of the United States, having been announced in the papers received from Washington, resolved, by the legislature of the state of New-York, that in common with the legislature of the general government, and the citizens of the United States, we deplore the death of General Brown as a national calamity. That although the lamented dead acquired his character as a hero and a patriot chiefly in the service of the United States, yet when we recollect that he grew up as a resident of our state, we cannot suppress a strong expression of the pride we feel in having produced so distinguished a soldier. Bills read a third time and passed: to settle the estate of Mary Doxtader, an Indian woman; to authorize the erection of a dam across the Chemung by Jonathan Brown and others; to amend the act declaring certain waters in Steuben publick highways, and relative to five mile creek in that county; to establish a ferry across Crooked lake; and to alter the time of the annual town meetings in the town of Painted Post.

Tuesday, March 4. The senate unanimously concurred in the resolution from the assembly, expressive of the sense of the legislature, in deploring the death of major general Jacob Brown as a national calamity; and the pride felt that this state should have produced so eminent a hero, patriot and soldier. Resolved, that the attorney general report his opinion to the senate, if the trustees of the Sailor’s Snug Harbour, in the city of New-York, can, with the aid of an act of the legislature, sell any part or parts of the land devised by Robert R. Randall, for the purpose of an asylum or marine hospital, to be called the Sailor’s Snug Harbour, without a forfeiture of the devise, and if the said hospital can be erected upon any ground other than that contained in the said devise. The bill authorizing Joshua Whitney and Hazard Lewis to erect a dam across the Susquehannah river, was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, General Porter, from the committee to which was referred the bill directing the payment of certain moneys to the minor heirs of De Witt Clinton, made a report proposing certain amendments to the bill, and recommending their adoption. The first section, directing the payment of the salary of the late governor to the end of the year, remains unaltered. The second section is proposed to be amended by granting and appropriating to the use of the minor children of De Witt Clinton,—thousand dollars, in consideration of the eminent services rendered by him to the people of this state. The report was laid upon the table.—A report was received from the commissioners for draining the Cayuga marshes. Bills read a third time and passed: for the relief of James Ashley; for the relief of the executors &c. of Huldah Rockwell; and to amend the charter of the village of Bridgewater.

TO PUBLISHERS OF PAPERS, &c.—It is intended before, or certainly by the first of May next, in a pamphlet with other statistical matter, to notice all newspapers and other periodicals in the United States, the city or town where published, condition of publication, &c. A copy containing the above shall be faithfully forwarded to each of you, who will insert this notice once, and forward a paper or copy of the work you publish, to Philadelphia, directed to “THE TRAVELLER.”

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to the late firm of R. STARR & Co. in the above Foundry, continue to execute orders for Plain and Ornamental Type, Brass Rule, and Metal Cuts. Also, for Presses and Ink, Chases, composing Sticks, Cases and Stands, Gallies, and printing materials of every description, at short notice, and on terms as liberal as those of other Foundries.

Many new articles have been added to this Foundry within the last year—among which are new founts of Small Pica and Bourgeois. Also, Small Pica, Brevier and Minion full face capitals for captions, and full face two line letter of all the different sizes from Pica to Pearl. Likewise Canon, Double Great Primer, Double Pica, Great Primer and Pica Antiques, with lower case to each, and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil antique capitals. Also, many elegant Borders and Newspaper Ornaments, none of which are stereotyped from wood cuts or type, as is usual at most other foundries, but all are cut on steel and cast in copper matrices, and are warranted to work clear. Printers will at once perceive the superiority of those cast in copper matrices, the lines not being filled up and the edges rounded, as is the case with those stereotyped. The large job letter and cuts are all cast in moulds and matrices, on metal bodies, and with the exactness of the smaller type.

Have also cut a new and very beautiful English Script, on inclined body, orders for which can be executed by the first of April. By being cast on inclined body, the face is not exposed as on square body, where most of the letters are kerned; and the mould in which it is cast having a notch or shoulder in the side the type are kept perfectly in line. No expense has been spared, and it is confidently believed, that this Script will be found the most elegant type ever cast in this country, or in Europe.

Type cast at this foundry is warranted equal at least in hardness and durability, to any cast in this country. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the founts regularly put up. It is intended to keep such a supply on hand as to be able to furnish orders without the usual delay. Orders by mail, or left at the Foundry, No. 8, Liberty street, will receive prompt attention.

POETRY.

A PARTHIAN GLANCE.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

Come, my crony, let's think upon far-away days,
And lift up a little oblivion's veil;
Let's consider the past with a lingering gaze,
Like a peacock whose eyes are inclined to its tail.

Ay, come, let us turn our attention behind,
Like those criticks whose heads are so heavy, I fear,
That they cannot keep up with the march of the mind,
And so turn face about for reviewing the rear.

Looking over Time's crupper and over his tail,
Oh! what ages and pages there are to revise!
And as further our back-searching glances prevail,
Like the emmets, "how little we are in our eyes!"

What a sweet pretty innocent, half a yard long,
On a dimity lap of true nursery make!
I can fancy I hear the old lullaby song
That was meant to compose me, but kept me awake.

Methinks I still suffer the infantine throes,
When my flesh was a cushion for any long pin—
Whilst they patted my body to comfort my woes,
Oh! how little they dreamt they were driving them in!

Infant sorrows are strong—infant pleasures are weak—
But no grief was allowed to indulge in its note;
Did you ever attempt a small "bubble and squeak,"
Through the Dalby's carminative down in your throat?

Did you ever go up to the roof with a bounce?
Did you ever come down to the floor with the same?
Oh! I can't but agree with both ends, and pronounce
"Heads or tails," with a child, an unpleasantish game!

Then an urchin—I see myself urchin, indeed,
With a smooth Sunday face for a mother's delight;
Why should weeks have an end?—I am sure there was need
Of a Sabbath, to follow each Saturday night.

Was your face ever sent to the housemaid to scrub?
Have you ever felt huckaback softened with sand?
Had you ever your nose towelled up to a snub,
And your eyes knuckled out with the back of the hand?

Then a schoolboy—my tailor was nothing in fault,
For an urchin will grow to a lad by degrees,—
But how well I remember that "pepper and salt"
That was down to the elbows and up to the knees!

What a figure it cut when as Norval I spoke!
With a lanky right leg duly planted before;
Whilst I told of the chief that was killed by my stroke,
And extended my arms as "the arms that he wore!"

Next a lover—Oh! say, were you ever in love?
With a lady too cold—and your bosom too hot!
Have you bowed to a shoe-tie, and knelt to a glove?
Like a beau that desired to be tied in a knot?

With the bride all in white, and your body in blue,
Did you walk up the aisle—the genteelst of men?
When I think of that beautiful vision anew,
Oh! I seem but the biffin of what I was then!

I am withered and worn by a premature care,
And my wrinkles confess the decline of my days;
Old Time's busy hand has made free with my hair,
And I'm seeking to hide it—by writing for bays!

TO A SISTER.

BY J. CONDER.

Louise! you wept, that morn of gladness
Which made your brother blest;
And tears of half-reproachful sadness
Fell on the bridegroom's vest:
Yet pearly tears were those to gem
A sister's bridal diadem.

No words could half so well have spoken,
What thus was deeply shown
By nature's simplest, dearest token,
How much was then my own;
Endearing her for whom they fell,
And thee, for having loved so well.

But now no more—nor let a brother,
Louise, regretful see

That still 'tis sorrow to another,
That he should happy be.
Those were, I trust, the only tears
That day shall cost through coming years.

Smile with us. Happy and light hearted,
We three the time will while,
And when sometimes a season parted,
Still think of us and smile.
But come to us in gloomy weather;
We'll weep, when we must weep, together.

BREATHINGS OF SPRING.

What wakest thou, spring!—sweet voices in the woods,
And reed-like echoes that have long been mute;
Thou bringest back to fill the solitudes,
The lark's clear pipe, the cuckoo's voiceless flute,
Whose tone seems breathing mournfulness or glee,
Even as our hearts may be.

And the leaves greet thee, spring!—the joyous leaves,
Whose tremblings gladden many a copse and glade,
Where each young spray a rosy flush receives,
When thy south wind hath pierced the whispering shade,
And happy murmurs running through the grass,
Tell that thy footsteps pass.

And the bright waters—they too hear thy call:
Spring the awakener!—thou hast burst their sleep;
Amidst the hollows of the rocks their fall
Makes melody, and in the forest deep
Where diamond sparkles, and blue gleams betray
Their windings to the day.

And flowers—the fairy peopled world of flowers!
Thou from the dust hast set that glory free,
Colouring the cowslip with thy sunny hues,
And penciling the wood anemone;
Silent they seem, yet each, to thoughtful eye
Glow with mute poetry.

But what awakest thou in the heart, O spring?
The human heart with all its dreams and sighs?
Thou that givest back so many a buried thing,
Restorer of forgotten harmonies!
Fresh songs and accents break forth where'er thou art,—
What wakest thou in the heart?

Vain longings for the dead!—why come they back
With thy young birds and leaves and living blooms?
Oh! is it not that from thy early track
Hope to the world may look beyond the tombs?
Yes! gentle spring,—no sorrow dims thine air,
Breathed by our loved ones there!

END OF THE GLORIOUS.

Pour thy tears wild and free,
Balm blest and holiest!
Fallen is the lofty tree,
Low as the lowliest!
Rent is the eagle's plume,
Towering victorious!
Read on the hero's tomb—
The end of the glorious!
Lean on the shivered spear,
It threatens no longer!
Snapped like its high compeer,
The willow is stronger!
See on its dinted edge
The bright day beam flashes—
If thine be the soul to stand
And number its gashes!

Press not that hallowed mould
In darkness enshrouded!
Ashes but scarcely cold
Beneath it are crowded!
Thy feet o'er some noble heart
May stumble unheeding;
O'er thy familiar friend
Perchance may be treading!

O ye were scattered fast,
Sons of the morning!
Triumph but seen and past
Your proud brows adorning!
After such mortal toil
To slumber so soundly!
Can aught the heart of man
Speak so profoundly?

GLORY.

FROM THE BOSTON LITERARY GAZETTE.

Glory! Eternal Glory! At the word
How my heart leaps, as at the trumpet's blast!
Each life drop in its slumbering fount is stirred,
As if a mighty spirit had swept past
On wide and outstretched wings. Whate'er thou art,
Spirit invisible—omnipotent—
I bow to thee—and would become a part
Of thy existence! Not with bended knee,
And cowering spirit would I worship thee—
But here—beneath the broad blue firmament,
Alone and fearless, standing in the sight
Of ages past and future—I invoke
Thee in thy robes of majesty and might.
Thee and thy crowned ones—even him who broke
The slumber of the charnel house—and tore
From its embrace his buried ancestry;
Even him, the murderous fratricide who wore
A crown stained with the blood of infancy.
Spirit of mighty power, where is thy home?
For I would be companion there with thee.
He was no fool who fired the Ephesian dome,
And seeking, found an immortality.
I too would taste of glory—though it were
To shine and fall even like Lucifer!

W. G. C.

ON A FADED VIOLET.

BY SHELLEY.

The odour from the flower is gone,
Which like thy kisses breathed on me;
The colour from the flower is flown,
Which glowed of thee, and only thee!

A shrivelled, lifeless, vacant form,
It lies on my abandoned breast,
And mocks the heart which yet is warm,
With cold and silent rest.

I weep—my tears revive it not;
I sigh—it breathes no more on me!
Its mute and uncomplaining lot
Is such as mine should be.

LIFE'S CHASE.

The chief of the huntsmen is Death, whose aim
Soon levels the brave and the craven;
He crimson the field with the blood of his game,
But the booty he leaves to the raven.
Like the stormy tempest that flies so fast,
O'er moor and mountain he gallops past;
Man shakes
And quakes
At his bugle blast.

But what boots it, my friends, from the hunter to flee,
Who shoots with the shafts of the grave;
Far better to meet him thus manfully,
The brave by the side of the brave!
And when against us he shall turn his brand,
With his face to his foe let each hero stand,
And await
His fate
From a hero's hand.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN IMPARTIAL EXAMINATION

OF THE ACT OF THE ASSOCIATE SYNOD AGAINST THE FREEMASONS.

First published in the Edinburgh Magazine, for October, 1757.

The nature of an oath, particularly of a promissory oath, which this pretended power only respects, comprehends a solemn invocation of the name of God, the supreme and omniscient being, the searcher of the hearts and the trier of the reins of the children of men; not only as an impartial witness (Jer. xlii. 5.) of what is promised, but likewise as the judge and certain avenger of perjury, falsehood and deceit. The performance of the oath becomes thereby cognoscible by the omniscience of the divine tribunal; (Jer. xxix. 23.) and his justice and omnipotence will not fail to pour out the vial of his threatened vengeance upon that execrated head, which has dared to invoke the name of the Lord in vain.

[Zech. v. 4. Jurisperandis contempta religio satis Deum ultorem habet. P. et lib. 2. c. de Reb. cred. et. Jurejun.]

Such are the conclusions of sound reason, warranted by Scripture. Can it then be imagined that God has left it in the power of man to alter these established rules of his judgements and procedure? Would not this be, as the poet says, to

Snatch from his hand the balance and the rod, Rejudge his justice, be the God of God?

There arises likewise from an oath, a requisitorial right to the person in whose behalf it is conceived. The thing promised becomes his property; of which, so far as the acquisition does not infringe any anterior obligation, he cannot be defrauded by any dispensing power, without manifest injustice, and the exercise of an arbitrary and despotick authority.

The cause of introducing oaths into civil society affords another forcible argument against this dispensing power. The natural and indispensable obligations to justice and equity, even assisted by the fear of civil punishments, were found insufficient to correct the depravity of the human mind, and prevent a bias to apparent self interest in the performance of mutual contracts. It was found necessary to assume the aid of religion; and upon the faith of an oath to establish a mutual trust.—This arises from a confidence that he who swears will never violate that promise to which he called God to be his witness, and of the breach whereof he has obtested him to be the judge and avenger. But, if there is any where on earth lodged a power of absolving from these obligations, mutual terror and diffidence must take place of the happiness and tranquillity expected from civil society, of which the utter subversion must ensue.

However extraordinary this claim may appear, his holiness, the pope, arrogates it to himself, very consistently with his other attributes. He is the viceroy of God; and under him, the spiritual lord of the universe: all mankind are his subjects; and every oath, every contract, is with a reversion of its being to him well pleasing.

But upon what consistent bottom their holinesses, the brethren of the association found their absolving power, is not so evident. Perhaps, like the Jesuits, those expert casuists and subtle divines, they will distinguish, and resolve it into a declaratory; whereby from their profound knowledge, they only show that certain oaths, from the particular circumstances that attend them, are unjust or wicked, and the performance of them will not therefore be expected by God; nor is it exigible by man, or obligatory on the conscience.

In this view let us examine their conduct towards the freemasons; and endeavour to explore on which side the imputation of blasphemy and impiety will fall.

In this conflict the match is very unequal. A freemason, while he defends the mysteries of the craft is at every step under the awe and reverence of his oath. He cannot therefore exhibit those mysteries to view, or subject them to examination. He must then, like the lion in the fable, suppose the picture such as it is represented by his antagonist.

Untainted probity frequently meets with strong opposition from villany supported by fraud. Experience has taught her to oppose prudence to cunning, and secrecy and resolution to the dark designs and dire machinations of her foes. But the depravity or facility of mankind soon discovered the difficulty of attaining that degree of secrecy, upon which the success of enterprise must often depend; and from a confidence of which resolution and activity result. To remedy this defect, religion opportunely interposes, and affords the sanction of an oath; under the security of which the schemes suggested, and maturely planned by judgement, are entrusted to prudence and resolution for their execution. Hence oaths of secrecy have become one of the necessary hinges of government; they have been adopted by every civil state; and every branch of administration requires them. To them must be ascribed the success of the greatest enterprises. Under their influence, the noble, generous plan of British liberty was matured into execution, and the purposes of popish tyranny rendered abortive by the Revolution: and to them the freemason owns his grateful acknowledgements, for the unrestrained liberty of defending his craft, and of detecting the damnable principles and black practices of the pretended messengers of Christ, without the dread of a merciless inquisition. The innocence of such oaths cannot then be doubted; and their necessity sufficiently sanctifies their use.

But it seems the seceders hold it a crime to exact an oath of secrecy, before the things required to be kept secret are revealed. Can any thing be more ridiculous than this objection? The purposes of such oaths would thereby be disappointed, for the secret would be communicated without any security or obligation to preserve it; and it would then become optional to grant it or not. Cromwell, that arch politician, when he imagined his secretary's clerk, who was fast asleep, had overheard him deliver some important orders, would not trust to the security of a subsequent oath, and thought that security could be assured only by his immediate death. The common practice of the world refutes the objection, which could only proceed from those whose want of modesty equals that of their honesty. Mankind is so prone to religion, that it requires only confidence enough, for any persons, however unqualified, to assume the character of spiritual guides, and they will not fail to obtain votaries. These, from that same tendency, soon yield up their judgement and consciences to the direction of their teachers; and their affections or antipathies, which become no longer their own, are pointed at particular objects, as the zeal or private interest of their priests shall dictate. One distinguishing characteristic of the associate brethren, seems to be an abhorrence of every oath not devised by themselves, and framed to promote the interest of faction, rebellion, and schism.

[They have in their synods, condemned as unlawful, the clauses in Burgess oaths, with respect to religion and allegiance to the king.]

They have not as yet, however, perverted the morals of all their followers; some of them, notwithstanding all their endeavours, still retain a regard for an oath, as the sacred and inviolable bond of society. This, they perceived was a check to their ambitious views of an unlimited obedience from their people. It was therefore necessary to diminish that reverence, in hopes that when their deluded flock had learned to overleap the fence in one instance, they would not be scrupulous to do it in any other. And for this end, the nature of an oath of secrecy is deliberately misrepresented, and rashness and profanity ascribed to it.

As I am obliged to suppose the secrets of masonry, such as they are represented by the associate brethren, I shall follow the order laid down for their interrogations in their act.

They object, that the mason oath is administered by an invocation of the name of God, attended with certain rites and ceremonies of a superstitious nature, and under a capital penalty.

By attending to the nature of an oath, it will appear, that the obtesting God as a witness and avenger, necessarily implies an imprecation of his wrath; which, if the doctrine of providence is believed, must imply all temporal, as well as eternal punishments; it matters not whether any penalty is expressed; nor does the doing so, in any degree alter the nature of the obligation. (Illud videtur esse certum, omne juramentum Promissorium, quacunque forma concipiatur, explicatione vel contractione, utramque virtualiter continere attestationem, sc. et. execrationem. Nam in juramento, et execratio supponit attestationem, ut quid sibi prius; et attestatio subinfert execrationem ut suum necessarium consequens. Saunderson de oblig. juram. pral. sect. X.) As to the ceremonies pretended to be adhibited to this oath, they appear to be innocent in themselves; and if the masons use any such, instead of ascribing these to a superstitious regard, charity would conclude they were not without an emphatick and allegorical meaning.

Oaths have almost universally had some rite or ceremony annexed, which, however insignificant in themselves, were originally expressive of something that tended to increase the awe and respect due to that solemn act. The casuists all agree, that though the oath is equally obligatory without them, the perjury is however increased by the solemnity. All nations have adopted them: the Hebrews, by putting their hand below the thigh of the person to whom they swore, (Gen. xxvi. 2.—xlvii. 29.) the Pagans, by taking hold of the altar; (Et, ut mos Græcorum est, Jurandi causa, ad aras accedat, Cic. pro Balbo) and both, pretending their hands to heaven: (Gen. xiv. 22)

*Suspiciens cælum, tenditque ad sidera dextram,
Hæc eadem, Ænea, terram, mare, sidera juro.*

Virg. Æn. lib. xii, v. 198.

in which last, they have been followed by all Christian nations; some of whom, particularly our sister kingdom, when they take an oath, touch, or kiss the holy gospels: and not only so, but every private society, every court of justice have forms of administering oaths, peculiar to themselves. Shall not then the society of freemasons be allowed that privilege, without the imputation of superstition and idolatry?

The matter of the oath comes next under consideration. The freemasons pretend to take some of their secrets from the Bible. A grievous accusation, truly! "Jack, in the Tale of a Tub, could work his father's will into any shape he pleased; so that it served him for a night cap when he went to bed, or an umbrella in rainy weather. He would clap a piece of it about a sore toe; or, when he had fits, burn two inches under his nose; or, if any thing lay heavy on his stomach, scrape off and swallow as much of the powder as would lie on a silver penny; they were all infallible remedies." But it seems Knocking Jack of the north, will not have all these pearls to be cast before swine, and reserves them only for his special favourites. What magical virtues there can be in the words of the sacred passage mentioned in the act, (1 Kings, vii, 21.) the world will be at a loss to discover; and the holy brethren, so well versed in mysteries, are the most proper to explain.

But there are other things which are ground of scruple, in the manner of swearing of the said oath. This the synod have not thought fit to mention; but their publisher has supplied the defect, by a reference to a mason's confession of the oath, word, and other secrets of his craft; (vide Scots Mag. 1755, p. 133,) which indeed contains variety of matters insignificant, and ridiculous in themselves, and only fit for the amusement of such persons as the ignorance and incoherence of the author display him to be.

The freemason does not think himself at all concerned to defend and support whatever nonsense shall be fathered upon the craft by the ignorant and malevolent. The honour of the fraternity is not in the least tarnished by it.

The whole narrative, particularly the method of discovering a mason, the 'prentice's shirt and the Monday's lesson, cannot fail to move laughter, even in gravity itself. But absurd and ridiculous as the whole of this matter must appear, a passion of another nature is thereby excited, which respects the discoverer himself; and that is an honest indignation of the perjury he has committed. For if this person, scrupulously conscientious, as he is represented, was actually under the oath he pretends, however trifling and insignificant the thing itself might be; yet, in the opinion of the most eminent casuists, he was obliged to keep his oath; the respect due to truth and falsehood being the same in trivial matters, as in those of greater importance; otherwise God must be invoked as witness to a lie. [Saunderson, de obl. jur. præl. 3, 115.]

But if ignorance or imbecility, deluded by hypocritical sanctity, or headstrong zeal, can afford any alleviation, (for an absolute acquittance it cannot) the charge must fall with redoubled weight upon those who induced him, and would induce others, over whom this influence extends, to put such an affront upon the honour of God, and to habituate themselves to the practice of insincerity and injustice towards man: is not this to adopt the practices and opinions of their religious predecessors in hypocrisy, sedition, and rebellion? who held, that

"Oaths were not proposed more than law,
To keep the good and just in awe;
But to confine the bad and sinful,
Like moral cattle, in a pinfold."

The natural curiosity of mankind, always eager and impetuous in the pursuit of knowledge, when disappointed of a rational account of things, is apt to rest upon conjecture, and often embraces a cloud in place of the goddess of truth. So has it fared with the secret of masonry. That society, though venerable for its antiquity, and respectable for its good behaviour, has, through falsehood and misrepresentation, groundlessly awakened the jealousy of states, and the obloquy of malicious tongues. Their silence and secrecy, as they gave ample room for the most extravagant conjectures, so they likewise afforded an opportunity for the greatest imputations, without fear of a refutation. They have been traduced as atheists and blasphemers, branded as idolaters, and ridiculed as the dupes of nonsense. The hard names, liberally bestowed on their secrets by the Seceders, partake of all these; (vid. Scots Magazine, 1755, p. 137.) but their proof relates only to the last; and indeed, it seems rather like the delirious ravings of a brain sick head, inflamed with the fumes of enthusiasm, than a rational design to expose them. Its publication is an affront upon the judgement of the world; no less than inserting it in the Scots Magazine, is an impeachment upon the taste of the readers of that collection.

To remove such prejudices, and in some degree to satisfy the world, and inquisitive cavillers, masons have condescended to publish what opinions they maintained, with respect to the great principles of human action. Their belief in God is founded upon the justest notion of his being and attributes, drawn from the light of nature, assisted by revelation. They never enter into the speculative regions, so much cultivated by divines. What cannot be comprehended in his nature, they leave as incomprehensible. They adore his Infinite Being, and reckon it the perfection of mankind to imitate his communicable perfections. Their duty to their superiours, to their neighbours, and to themselves, are all expressed in a manner the most agreeable to the soundest morality. And when their actions and behaviour, which alone are subject to human observation, and affect human society, are conformable to such principles, no power on earth has a right to inquire further.

The freemason professes a particular regard to the liberal arts; and he makes no scruple to own, that many of his secrets have a reference to them. From these, just notions of order and proportion are attained, and a true taste of symmetry and beauty is formed. And as the transition from the beauties of the natural to those of the moral species are so easy and apparent, if there is any virtue, if there is any praise, instead of slander and defamation, protection and encouragement ought to be his reward.

Men of the greatest power and dignity, the divine and the philosopher, have not been ashamed, in all ages, to own their relation to this society, and to encourage and protect it by their power and influence. But, should this combination terminate in nothing but wickedness and folly, can it be imagined, either that men of honour, wisdom and integrity, would lend their countenance to fraud, and encourage folly, merely to make the world stare? or that an association, resting on so untenable a foundation, would so long have subsisted without the cement of mutual trust and confidence, which result from virtue and consistency alone?

The freemason, conscious of his integrity, and persuaded of the good tendency of his principles to promote the purposes of virtue and human happiness, beholds with contempt the impotent efforts of envy and ignorance, however sanctified the garb, or dignified the title they may assume. In his lodge, which he considers as the school of justice, love, and benevolence, he is taught to oppose truth to misrepresentation; good humour and innocent mirth to sourness and grimace, the certain signs of malice and imposture. To attend the importunate calls of his enemies, would be to interrupt his tranquillity; and therefore, wrapped in his own innocence, he despises their impotent attacks, and for the future will disdain to enter the lists with champions so weak and ignorant, so deluded and deluding.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

VIRGINIA.

At a special communication of Clinton Lodge No. 139, held at Mason's hall, in Romney, Virginia, on the 26th day of February, A. D. 1828, A. L. 5828, the following proceedings were had:—

Having been informed of the death of DE WITT CLINTON governor of the state of New-York, a brother honoured for his devotion to the great principles of masonry, his brilliant talents, his private virtues, his patriotism and benevolence,—we the members of Clinton Lodge of free and accepted masons, No. 139, in Romney, have convened for the purpose of expressing our unfeigned grief, occasioned by this dispensation of an all wise Providence.

Resolved, therefore, that the members of this lodge feel that our common country, our order, and the great cause of human improvement, have met with a heavy bereavement in the death of our most excellent and worthy brother DE WITT CLINTON.

Resolved, that the members of this lodge (which received its name in honour of our deceased brother) as a testimony of their respect for his memory, will wear the usual badges of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the worshipful master to the family of the deceased.

On motion, Resolved, that the above resolutions be published. C. TAPSCOTT, Sec'y.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

THE OSTRICH.

[From the London Weekly Review.]

The ostrich is a polygamist, and at the time of breeding usually associates, to himself from two to six females. The hens lay all their eggs together in the same nest, which is merely a shallow cavity scraped in the ground of such a shape as to be conveniently covered by one of the birds. The eggs are placed upon their points, and the earth which has been scraped to form the nest is employed to confine the outer circle, and keep the whole in the proper position. The hens relieve each other in the office of incubation during the day, and the male takes his turn at night, when his superior strength is required to protect the eggs or the new fledged young from the jackals, tiger-cats, and other enemies, which are not unfrequently, it is said, found lying dead near the nest, destroyed by a stroke from the powerful foot of the gigantic bird.

So many as sixty eggs are sometimes found in a nest; but a much smaller number are also common; and incubation is occasionally performed by a single pair of ostriches. Each female lays from twelve to sixteen eggs. They continue to lay during incubation, and even after the young brood are hatched; the supernumerary eggs are not placed in the nest, but around it, being designed to assist in the nourishment of the young birds, which, though when first hatched are as large as pullets, are probably unable at once to digest the hard and acrid food on which the old ones subsist. The period of incubation is from thirty-six to forty days. In the heat of the day the nest is occasionally abandoned by all the birds, the heat of the sun being then sufficient to keep the eggs at the proper temperature.

An ostrich egg is equal in its contents to twenty-four of the domestick hen. When taken fresh from the nest, they are very palatable, and are wholesome though somewhat heavy food. The best mode of cooking them that I have seen is that practised by the Hottentots, who place one end of the egg in the hot ashes, and, making a small orifice at the other, keep stirring the contents with a small stick till they are sufficiently roasted; and thus, with a seasoning of salt and pepper, you have a very nice emelade.

The ostrich of South Africa is a prudent and wary animal, and displays little of that stupidity ascribed to it by some naturalists. On the borders of the colony, at least when it is eagerly pursued for the sake of its valuable plumage, this bird displays no want of sagacity in providing for its safety, or the security of its offspring. It adopts every possible precaution to conceal the place of its nest; and uniformly abandons it, after destroying the eggs, if the eggs have been disturbed, or the footsteps of man discovered near it. In relieving each other in hatching, the birds are never observed to approach it in a direct line. Some of the colonists on the skirts of the Korroo and other remote districts, make the pursuit of the ostrich one of their principal and most profitable amusements. Du Plois showed me five or six skins of ostriches he had lately killed. He said, however, that it was exceedingly difficult to get within musket shot of them, owing to their constant vigilance, and the great distance to which they can see. The fleetest horse, too, will not overtake them, unless stratagem be adopted to tire them out; but by several huntsmen taking different sides of a large plain, and pursuing them back and forward till their strength is exhausted, they may be at length run down. If followed up too eagerly, this chase is not destitute of danger, for the huntsman has sometimes had his thigh-bone broken by a single stroke from the wing of a wounded ostrich. The beautiful white feathers so highly prized by the ladies of Europe, are found on the tail only of the male bird.

The food of the ostrich consists of the top of the various shrubby plants which even the most arid parts of South Africa produce in abundance. This bird is so easily satisfied in regard to water, that he is constantly to be found in the most parched and desolate tracts, which even the antelopes and beasts of prey have deserted. His cry at a distance is said so much to resemble that of a lion, that even the Hottentots are sometimes deceived by it. When not hatching, they are frequently seen in troops of thirty or forty together, or amicably associated with herds of zebras or quaghas, their fellow tenants of the wilderness. When caught young, the ostrich is easily tamed; but it does not appear that any attempt has been made to apply his great strength and swiftness to any purpose of practical utility.

THE GOLD MINES.

The Southern Review gives the following account of the first discovery of gold in the state of North Carolina:—

A young lad, a son of Mr. Reed, shooting with a bow and arrows at fish, in Meadow creek, struck a lump of gold, which, from the description given of it, must have weighed several ounces. Attracted by its lustre, he picked it up and carried it home. His father, not more skilled in metals than his son, yet thinking it might be valuable, wrapped it up, and put it away in one of the crevices of his rude habitation. Between the logs of his coarse dwelling it remained for three years, but business then accidentally calling Reed to Raleigh, his wife persuaded him to take that "lump of shining stuff" with him, and see if any one at Raleigh could tell him what it was. Reed applied in that town to a silversmith, who, as he said, gave him some trifle ($3) for it, but honestly told him it was gold and very pure.

Reed's discovery gave him much embarrassment. He was a Hessian by birth, one of the soldiers, we believe, whom the British brought over to this country in our revolutionary war; honest but unlearned. He became restless and uneasy lest his neighbours might suspect and prosecute him, as for illicit practices, if he should acquire sudden wealth. When his apprehensions became known, they were soon relieved and a small association was made up, consisting of Col. F——, of Concord, Mr. Love, a preacher, in the neighbourhood, and a brother-in-law of Reed's, whose name we have forgotten. These three were to find labourers, and dig for metal, allowing Reed one fourth of the ore they should obtain. The work, however, was prosecuted very feebly, although their success might apparently have justified great exertion.

ELASTICK GUM VARNISH.

Dissolve elastick gum, cut small, in five times its weight of spirits of turpentine, by keeping them days together; then boil an ounce of this solution in eight ounces of drying linseed oil for a few minutes; lastly, strain it. It must be used soon.

DURHAM MUSTARD.

There are probably but few individuals acquainted with the history of the manufacture of Durham mustard. Prior to 1720 there was no such luxury as mustard, in its present form, at our tables. At that time the seed was only coarsely pounded in a mortar, as coarsely separated from the integument, and in that rough state prepared for use.—In the year I have mentioned, it occurred to an old woman of the name of Clements, resident at Durham, to grind the seed in a mill, and to pass the meal through the several processes which are resorted to in making flour from wheat. The secret she kept for many years to herself, and in the period of her exclusive possession of it, supplied the principal parts of the kingdom, and in particular the metropolis, with this article; and George the First stamped it with fashion by his approval.—Mrs. Clements as regularly twice a year travelled to London, and to the principal towns throughout England, for orders, as any tradesman's rider of the present day; and the old lady contrived to pick up not only a decent pittance, but what was then thought a tolerable competence. From this woman's residing at Durham, it acquired the name of Durham mustard.

RENEWING OF COLOURS.

A fine bloom is given by fruit dealers to cucumbers, grapes, peaches, plums, &c. by powdering them with finely pounded magnesia, which has the effect of bringing the colours out. The colours of a carpet, too, on which some calcined magnesia had been scattered, have been observed to be completely revived.

MOULDINESS.

Le Bulletin Universel says, that mouldiness in the timber of a house may be prevented by washing it over with a weak solution of muriate of mercury.

THE GATHERER.

The manner of Watchmen intimating the Hour at Herrnhuth, in Germany.

- VIII. Past eight o'clock! O, Herrnhuth, do thou ponder;
Eight souls in Noah's ark, were living yonder.
- IX. 'Tis nine o'clock; ye brethren, hear it striking,
Keep hearts and houses clean, to our Saviour's liking.
- X. Now, brethren, hear, the clock is ten and passing;
None rest but such as wait for Christ embracing.
- XI. Eleven is past! still at this hour eleven,
The Lord is calling us from Earth to Heaven.
- XII. Ye brethren, hear, the midnight clock is humming;
At midnight our great Bridegroom will be coming.
- I. Past one o'clock! The day breaks out of darkness;
Great morning Star appear, and break our hardness!
- II. 'Tis two! on Jesus wait this silent season,
Ye two so near related, Will and Reason.
- III. The clock is three! the blessed Three doth merit,
The best of praise, from body, soul, and spirit.
- IV. 'Tis four o'clock, when three make supplication,
The Lord will be the fourth on that occasion.
- V. Five is the clock! five virgins were discarded
When five with wedding garments were rewarded.
- VI. The clock is six, and I go off my station;
Now, brethren, watch yourselves for your salvation.

INTEMPERANCE.

The use of ardent spirits has long been the bane both of savage and of civilized life; and it is extraordinary, and no small reproach to the latter, that it is among the former that the first firm and decided step is taken to put an end to an evil of such wide-spreading and alarming magnitude. At "a talk" of North American Indians, it seems, these people determined to abolish the use of spirituous liquors, alleging, with equal truth and simplicity, that "they drove them crazy." That it should be left to savage life to discover and correct this important fact, reflects but little credit upon those civilized states in which the practice prevails and maddens thousands, and not only no such resolution as this is come to, but where the very government connives at the madness and ruin of its subjects, and even condescends to raise a large revenue by such very means. Could the inmates of bedlam, and of every lunatic asylum in this kingdom, be examined, for the purpose of tracing the origin of their awful calamity, none so general as this would be found. Pride, disease, and mental affliction, are, we have no doubt, large producers of insanity; but those, and all other causes put together, would not, we are convinced, furnish any thing like the proportion in the fearful catalogue, which would be found to have had their origin in this intellectual incontinence. Were we asked, on the one hand, what it is that is more than any thing else destroying the manly open character of the common people of these islands, we should say it is the use of ardent spirits; and were we to prescribe, on the other, what it is that would bring them back to the habits and the character of former times, we should say that it would be by returning to the wholesome, the refreshing, and invigorating beverage of their hardy ancestors; ill-exchanged, indeed, for liquid fire.

DEAN SWIFT AND THE FARMER'S WIFE.

The celebrated Dean Swift had been so highly pleased with the conversation and deportment of a farmer's wife, near Dublin, that he invited himself to dine at her house, and sent her notice of the time. The trial was rather too hard for her prudence. Elated with the idea of entertaining a guest whose company was courted by the first nobility of the realm, she dressed herself as fine as her fingers could make her and in this rich attire received the Dean with stately ceremony. He in his turn made his profound obeisance, and then instantly inquired for the farmer's wife. "I am she! pray sir, don't you know me?" You! no madam, I won't be tricked, the farmer's wife that I am come to see is a plain woman, but you look like a Duchess."

Her excellent sense made her understand the hint, and her excellent humour made her take it in good part. She withdrew, changed her dress, and returned in a plain robe. "Ah! 'tis she," joyfully exclaimed the Dean, "this is the very woman I am come to see, and I expect to be very happy in her company."

COBBLER'S SIGN.

The following is the copy of a sign in North Wales, above a cobbler's shop in the village of Henllan:—"Pryce Dyas, Coblar, daler in Bacco Shag and Pig tale. Bacon and Gingerbread Eggs laid every morning by me, and very good Paradise, in the Summer Gentlemen and Lady can have goo Tae and Crumpets and straw berry with a skin milk, because I cant get no cream. N. B. Shuse and Boots mended very well."

A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

A countryman in the county of Berks, who recently appeared as a witness in a cause, was thus addressed by the advocate of the opposite party, "How now, you fellow in the leathern doublet, what are you to have for swearing?" "Please your worship," quoth the countryman, "if you get no more by bauling and lying than I do by swearing, you will soon be in a leathern doublet as well as I."

ON THE UNDERSTANDING.

"Harry, I cannot think," says Dick,
"What makes my andies grow so thick."
"You do not recollect," says Harry,
"How great a cal they have to carry."

POPULAR TALES.

THE HOUSEKEEPERS.

[From Friendship's Offering.]

There were two heavy, middle aged merchants; they were either Dutch or German, I know not which, but their name was Vanderclump. Most decided old bachelors they were, with large, leathern, hanging cheeks, sleepy gray eyes, and round shoulders. They were men not given to much speech, but great feeders; and, when waited upon, would point clumsily to what they wanted, and make a sort of low growl, rather than be at the trouble to speak. These Messrs. Vanderclump were served by two tall, smooth faced dawdles: I never could discover which held the superior station in the menage. Each has been seen trotting home from market, with a basket on her arm; each might be observed to shake a duster out of the upper windows; each would, occasionally, carry a huge bunch of keys, or wait at table during dinner; and in the summer evenings, when it was not post-day both of them would appear, dressed alike, sitting at work at the lower counting-house window, with the blinds thrown wide open. Both, I suppose, were housekeepers. It happened, one cold, foggy spring, that the younger brother, Mr. Peter Vanderclump, left London to transact some business of importance with a correspondent at Hamburg, leaving his brother Anthony to the loneliness of their gloomy house in St. Mary Axe. Week after week passed away, and Mr. Peter was still detained at Hamburg. Who would have supposed that his society could have been missed! that the parlour could have seemed more dimly dull by the absence of one of those from whom it chiefly derived its character of dulness. Mr. Anthony took up his largest merchaum, and enveloped himself in its smoke by the hour; but the volumes of smoke cleared away, and no Peter Vanderclump appeared emerging from the mist. Mr. Anthony brought some of his heavy folios from below; and, in their pages of interest, (no common, but often compound interest,) lost for a while, the dreary sense of loneliness. But, a question was to be asked! Peter's solemn "yah" or "nein," was waited for in vain. Forgetful, and almost impatient, Anthony looked up—the chair was unoccupied which his brother had constantly filled. Mr. Anthony began to sigh—he got into a habit of sighing. Betty and Molly (they were soft hearted baggages) felt for their master,—pitied their poor master! Betty was placing the supper on the table one evening, when her master sighed very heavily. Betty sighed also; and the corners of her mouth fell—their eyes met—something like a blush crimsoned Betty's sleek, shining cheek, when, on raising her eyes again, her master was still staring at her. Betty simpered; and, in her very soft, very demure voice, ventured to say, "Was there any thing she could do?" Mr. Vanderclump rose up from his chair. Betty, for the first time, felt awed by his approach. "Batee!" he said, "my poor Batee! Hah! you are a goot girl!" He chuckled her under the chin with his large hand. Betty looked meek, and blushed, and simpered again. There was a pause—Mr. Vanderclump was the first to disturb it. "Hah! hah!" he exclaimed, gruffly, as if suddenly recollecting himself; and thrusting both hands into his capacious breeches' pockets, he sat down to supper, and took no further notice of Betty that night. The next morning, the sun seemed to have made a successful struggle with the dense London atmosphere, and shone full in Mr. Vanderclump's face while he was at breakfast; and, setting a piping bullfinch singing a tune which his master loved rather for the sake of old associations than from any delight in musick. Then Lloyd's list was full of arrivals, and the price current had that morning some unusual charm about it, which I cannot even guess at. Mr. Vanderclump looked upon the bright and blazing fire; his eyes rested, with a calm and musing satisfaction, on the light volumes of steam rising from the spout of the teakettle, as it stood; rather murmuring drowsily than hissing, upon the hob. There was, he might have felt, a sympathy between them. They were both placidly puffing out the warm and wreathing smoke. He laid down his pipe, and took half a well buttered muffin into his capacious mouth at a bite; he washed the mouthful down with a large dish of tea, and he felt in better spirits. That morning he entered the counting house rubbing his hands. Within an hour, a crowd of huge, dusky clouds shut out the merry sunshine; and the Hamburg mail brought no tidings whatever of Mr. Peter. Mr. Anthony worked himself up to a thorough ill humour again, and swore at his clerks, because they asked him questions. When he entered his apartment that evening he felt more desolate than ever. Betty placed a barrel of oysters on the table—he heeded her not;—a large German sausage—his eyes were fixed on the ground;—a piece of Hamburg beef—Mr. Vanderclump looked up for an instant, and Europa like, his thoughts crossed the sea, upon that beef, to Hamburg. Gradually however, a genial warmth spread throughout the room; for Betty stirred up the fire, and let down the curtains, and snuffed the dim candles; while Molly loaded the table with bottles of divers shapes and sizes, a basin of snow-white sugar, and a little basket of limes, of well known and exquisite flavour; placing, at the same time, a very small kettle of boiling water on the fire. "Why, Mollee! my goot girl!" said Mr. Vanderclump, in a low and somewhat melancholy tone, (his eyes had mechanically followed these latter proceedings,) "Mollee! that is punch!" "La, sir! and why not?" replied the damsel, almost playfully; "why not be comfortable and cheery? I am sure; and here she meant to look encouraging, her usual simper spreading to a smile, "I am sure Betty and I would do our best to make you so." "Goot girls, goot girls!" said Mr. Vanderclump, his eyes fixed all the while, upon the supper table—he sat down to it. "My goot girls," said he, soon after, "you may go down, I do not want you; you need not wait." The two timid, gentle creatures instantly obeyed. More than an hour elapsed, and then Mr. Vanderclump's bell rang. The two matronly maidens were very busily employed in making a new cap. Betty rose at once; but, suddenly recollecting that she had been trying on her new and unfinished cap, and had then only a small brown cotton skull-cap on her head, she raised both her hands to her head to be certain of this, and then said, "Do, Molly! there's a dear! answer the bell! for such a figure as I am, I could not go before master, no how. See, I have unpicked this old cap, for a little bit of French edging at the back." Molly looked a little peevish; but her cap was on her head, and up stairs she went. Mr. Vanderclump was sitting before the fire, puffing lustily from his eternal pipe. "Take away," he said abruptly, "and put the leetle table here:" he pointed and growled, and the sagacious Molly understood. She placed the table beside him, and upon it the punch, which he had been drinking. "Batee, my poor Batee!" said Mr. Vanderclump, who had not yet noticed that Betty was absent. "It is not Betty, but Molly, sir," replied the latter damsel, in a voice of child-like simplicity. "Hah!" said he, apparently considering for a moment, "hah! Batee, Mollee, all the same! Mollee, my poor Mollee, you are a goot girl! Get up to-morrow morning, my poor Mollee, and put on your best gown, and I will marry you!" Molly was, as she afterwards declared, struck all of a heap. She gaped and gasped with astonishment; and then a power of words were rushing and racing up her throat to her tongue's end: a glance at her master stopped their explosion. His hands were in his pockets, his face towards the fire, his pipe in his mouth. "Yes, sir," she replied, humbly and distinctly. A few tears trickled down her cheeks, as she curtsied low at the door, and disappeared. She knew his ways, she thought within herself, as she walked very slowly down the stairs; and she congratulated herself that she had not risked another word in reply. "And now, Betty," she said, as she entered the kitchen, "I'll put the finishing stitch to my cap, and go to bed; for master will want nothing more to night." She sat down quietly to work, and conversed quietly with Betty, not disclosing a word of her new prospects. Betty, however, observed that she took off the trimming with which her new cap had been already half adorned. "Why, bless me! Molly!" she cried, "you are not going to put on that handsome white satin bow, are you?" "Why, yes! I think I shall," replied Molly; "for now I look at your cap, with that there yellow riband upon it, mine seems to me quite old-maidish." The next morning, Molly got up before her sister, and put on her best gown and her new cap. The morning was dark and dull, and Betty was sleepy, and Molly kept the window curtain and the bed curtains closely drawn. Unsuspected, she slipped out of the chamber, her shawl and her bonnet in her hand. As the clock struck eight, Molly was standing beside her master before the rails of the marriage altar; and, not long after, she burst upon the astonished eyes of her sister, as Mrs. Vanderclump. In due time, Mr. Peter Vanderclump returned; but a slight coolness arose between the two brothers, and Mr. Anthony, at the suggestion of his wife, took a small house in Copthall Court, Throgmorton street. Mrs. Vanderclump was fond of the country, and longed for a window that looked into the Drapers' Gardens! Betty was invited to accompany her sister; but no—Betty was also cool—she was nothing but a housekeeper! and no company for gentle-folks! She was poor Mr. Peter's servant, and could remain where she was!—and so she did: but poor Mr. Peter soon began to feel very lonely, and one evening, in the innocence of his heart, quite unconscious of his brother's manner of wooing, he took Betty's hand, and said, "Batee, my poor Batee! you are a goot girl! get up to-morrow morning, and put on your best gown, and I will marry you."

MISCELLANY.

HISTORY OF THE GUNPOWDER PLOT.

[Compiled from original and unpublished documents.]

Of all the plots and conspiracies that ever entered into the mind of man, the Gunpowder plot stands pre-eminent in horror and wickedness.

The singular perseverance of the conspirators is shown by the fact, that so early as in Lent of the year 1603, Robert Catesby, who appears to have been the prime mover of the plot, in a conversation with Thomas Wintour and John Wright, first broke with them about a design for delivering England from her bondage, and to replant the Catholic religion. Wintour expressed himself doubtful whether so grand a scheme could be accomplished, when Catesby informed him that he had projected a plan for that purpose, which was no less than to blow up the Parliament House with gunpowder.

Wintour consented to join in the scheme, and, at the suggestion of Catesby, went over to Flanders to arrange some preliminary affairs there, and to communicate the design to Mr. Fawkes, who was personally known to Catesby. At Ostend, Wintour was introduced to Mr. Fawkes by Sir William Stanley. Guy Fawkes was a man of desperate character. In his person he was tall and athletic, his countenance was manly, and the determined expression of his features was not a little heightened by a profusion of brown hair, and an auburn coloured beard. He was descended from a respectable family in Yorkshire, and having soon squandered the property he inherited at the decease of his father, his restless spirit associated itself with the discontented and factious of his age. Wintour and Fawkes came over to England together; and shortly after met Catesby, Thomas Percy, and John Wright, in a house behind St. Clement's; where in a chamber with no other person present, each administered an oath of secrecy to the other, and then went into another room to hear mass, and to receive the sacrament. Percy was then sent to hire a house fit for their purpose, and found one belonging to Mr. Whinniard, Yeoman to the King's Wardrobe of the Beds, then in the occupation of one Henry Ferrers; of which, after some negotiation, he succeeded in obtaining possession, at the rent of twelve pounds per annum, and the key was delivered to Guy Fawkes, who acted as Mr. Percy's man, and assumed the name of John Johnson. Their object in hiring this house was to obtain an easy communication with the upper Parliament House, and by digging through the wall that separated them, to form an extensive mine under the foundations. A house was also hired in Lambeth, to serve as a depository for the powder, and Mr. Keys, who was then admitted as one of the number, was placed in charge. The whole party then dispersed, and agreed to meet again at Michaelmas. At Michaelmas it was resolved that the time was arrived when they should commence working at their mine; but various causes hindered them from beginning, till within a fortnight of Christmas. The party, at that time consisting of five, then entered upon their work; and, having first provided themselves with baked meat that they might not have occasion to leave the house, they worked incessantly till Christmas Eve, underpropping the walls, as they proceeded with wood. A little before Christmas, Christopher Wright was added to the number; and, finding their work to be extremely laborious, the walls being upwards of three yards in thickness, they afterwards admitted Robert Wintour to assist them. Taking advantage of the long and dreary nights between Christmas and Candlemas, they then brought their powder over from Lambeth in a boat and lodged it in Percy's house, and afterwards continued to labour at the mine. In the Easter following, (1605) as they were at their work, the whole party were dreadfully alarmed on hearing a rushing noise near them; but on inquiry they found no danger menaced them, but that it proceeded from the removal of some coals in an adjoining vault, under the Parliament House. Nothing could be more propitious for the conspirators; and, ascertaining that it belonged to the same parties of whom they held the house, but in the possession of a man of the name of Skinner, they lost no time in purchasing the good-will of Skinner, and eventually hired the vault of Whinniard, at the rate of four pounds per annum. Abandoning their original intention of forming a mine under the walls, they placed the powder in this vault, and afterwards gradually conveyed into it three thousand billets of wood, and five hundred faggots; Guy Fawkes arranging them in order, making the place clean and neat, in order that if any strangers, by accident or otherwise, entered the house, no suspicion might be excited. Fawkes then went into Flanders to inform Sir W. Stanley and Mr. Owen of their progress, and returned in the following August. Catesby, meeting Percy at Bath, proposed that himself should have authority to call in whom he pleased, as at that time they were but few in number, and were very short of money. This being acceded to, he imparted the design to Sir Everard Digby, Francis Tresam, Ambrose Rookewood, and John Grant. Digby promised to subscribe one thousand five hundred pounds, and Tresam two thousand pounds. Percy engaged to procure all he could of the Duke of Northumberland's rents, which would amount to about four thousand pounds, and to furnish ten good horses.

Thus far, every thing had prospered with the conspirators; success had followed every effort they had made.

On Thursday evening, the 24th of October, eleven days before the intended meeting of Parliament, an anonymous letter was put into the hands of the servant of Lord Monteagle, warning his Lordship not to attend the Parliament that season, for that God and man had concurred to punish the wickedness of the times. It is a most extraordinary fact that the conspirators knew of the delivery of this letter to the Lord Monteagle, and that it was in the possession of the Earl of Salisbury, Secretary of State, for eight days before the disclosure took place, as developed in Thomas Wintour's confession, taken before the Lord's Commissioners on the 23d of November, 1605; yet so strong was their infatuation, and so desperately had they set their fortunes on the event, that they unanimously resolved "to abide the uttermost travail."

The generally received opinion has been, that it was to the sagacity and penetration of King James that the detection of the conspiracy must be ascribed, and that it was his Majesty who first suggested the agency of gunpowder; but the Earl of Salisbury, in a letter to Sir Charles Cornwallis, ambassador at Madrid, asserts, that in a conversation between the Earl of Suffolk (Lord Chamberlain) and himself, on perusal of the anonymous letter, the employment of gunpowder first occurred to them, and that the King subsequently concurred in their opinion. The letter, after having been communicated to several of the Privy Council, was shewn to the King three or four days before the opening of Parliament, who, with great prudence, gave orders that no notice whatever should be taken of it, but that every thing should go on as usual, until the very day appointed. On Saturday, the Lord Chamberlain, according to the customary forms of his office previous to the meeting of every Parliament, viewed every room and cellar belonging to the Parliament House, and amongst others the identical vault in which the wood and powder was deposited, and observed a man, who subsequently proved to be Guy Fawkes, standing there to answer any questions that might have been asked. The Lord Chamberlain then went to the Privy Council and reported what he had seen. After much discussion it was resolved that a more minute search should be made under pretence of seeking for stolen goods, in order that no suspicion might arise if nothing should be discovered. Accordingly, on Monday, at midnight, Sir T. Knyvett, accompanied by a small band of men, went to Percy's house, where, at the door, they found Guy Fawkes, with his clothes and boots on. Sir Thomas immediately apprehended him, and then proceeded to search the house and vault, and upon removing some of the wood, they soon discovered the powder ready prepared for the explosion; then, directly afterwards, searching Guy Fawkes, they found on him three matches and other instruments for setting fire to the train. He confessed himself guilty, and boldly declared, that if he had happened to have been within the house when Sir T. Knyvett apprehended him, he would instantly have blown him up, house and all.

On the arrest of Guy Fawkes, such of the conspirators as at the time were in London, fled into the country to meet Catesby at Dunchurch, according to previous arrangement; and after taking some horses out of a stable at Warwick, they reached Robert Wintour's house, at Huddington, on the Wednesday night. On Thursday morning the whole party, amounting to about twenty persons, confessed themselves to Hammond, a priest, received absolution from him, and partook of the sacrament together, and then, with their followers and servants, proceeded to Lord Windsor's house, at Hewell: from whence they took a great quantity of armour and weapons. They then passed into Staffordshire, and by night reached the house of Stephen Littleton, called Holbeach house, about two miles from Stourbridge. By this time the whole country was raised in pursuit of the rebels; and a large party under the direction of Sir Richard Walshe, high sheriff of Worcestershire, early on Friday morning arrived at Holbeach house. The party in the house—consisting of Catesby, Percy, Sir E. Digby, Robert, John, and Thomas Wintour, Grant, Rookewood, the two Wrights, Stephen Littleton, and their servants,—finding their condition now to be desperate, determined to fight resolutely to the last, treating the summons to surrender with contempt, and defying their pursuers. A singular accident, however, put an end to all conference between the parties. Some gunpowder, which the conspirators had provided for their defence, proving damp, they had placed nearly two pounds in a pan near the fire to dry; and a person incautiously raking together the fading embers, a spark flew into the pan, ignited the powder, which blew up with a great explosion, shattered the house, and severely maimed Catesby, Rookewood, and Grant; but the most remarkable circumstance was, that about sixteen pounds of powder, in a linen bag, which was actually under the pan where in the powder exploded, was blown through the roof of the house, and fell into the court-yard amongst the assailants, without igniting, or even bursting.

Sir R. Walshe then gave orders for a general assault to be made upon the house; and, in the attack that followed, Thomas Wintour, going into the court-yard, was the first who was wounded, having received a shot in the shoulder, which disabled him; the next was Mr. Wright, and after him the younger Wright, who were both killed; Rookewood was then wounded. Catesby, now seeing all was lost, and their condition totally hopeless, exclaimed to Thomas Wintour, "Tom, we will die together." Wintour could only answer by pointing to his disabled arm, that hung useless by his side, and as they were speaking, Catesby and Percy were struck dead at the same instant, and the rest then surrendered themselves into the hands of the sheriff.

At the end of January, 1606, the whole of the conspirators, at that time in custody, being eight in number, were brought to their trial in Westminster Hall, and were all tried upon one indictment, except Sir E. Digby, who had a separate trial. On Thursday, January 30th, Sir E. Digby, Robert Wintour, John Grant, and Thomas Bates, were executed at the west end of St. Paul's Church, and on the next day Thomas Wintour, Ambrose Rookewood, Robert Keys, and Guy Fawkes, suffered within the Old Palace yard at Westminster.

On the 28th of February, 1606, Garnet was brought to trial at Guildhall, before nine commissioners specially appointed for that purpose. Of his participation in the plot there was no doubt; and he admitted himself criminal in not revealing it, although, as he asserts, it was imparted to him only in confession: but it is more than probable that the valuable papers, lately rescued from oblivion, and preserved in his Majesty's State Paper Office, will be able to prove his extensive connexion with the plot, his knowledge of it, both in and out of confession, and his influential character with all the conspirators.

Garnet was hanged on the 3d of May, 1606, on a scaffold erected for that purpose, at the west end of St. Paul's Church. Held up to infamy by one party as a rebel and a traitor, and venerated as a saint and a martyr by the other; the same party spirit, and the same conflicting opinions have descended from generation to generation, down to the controversialists of the present day.

NATIONAL PREJUDICE.

The following extract from Mr. Ryley's Intendant in Scotland contains a humorous exemplification of the strength of national prejudice. It is a short dialogue between an old Scots lady and her Irish footman.

This evening, the two little dogs, Sky and Mull, made known my arrival, in their usual way, by joyfully barking and running about, so that the pipers had scarcely left the room, when Murtoch was despatched with a polite invitation.

As I approached, the old lady was disposing of the last proof of national affection for national music, so called, with her hankerchief, and left her little eyes inflamed with the effects of her generous feelings for auld lang syne.

"Ah, Mr. Romney, ye'r just come twa minutes too late; ye'r oot o' luck, mun, or ye might have indulged yer lugs wi' a sample of ancient melody that wad have gaird ye danc'd for joy. I'm thinking, Mr. Romney, that its muckle strange in yer play-house, though I do not gang tull 'em, and speak but fra hearsay, that encouragement is given to Italian singers, French horns, and hautboys, but na sic a thing as a bra Scotch bagpipe to be met wi'. Ah, when I was a lassie, a comely chiel of sixteen, there were but twa pipers in a' the bonny Isle of Sky, Sandy Macgregor and Donald Macduggall, and whenever they ganged towards Heatherbell Hall, ye may think I didna ken them gang by, without a bannack ben, and a wee drappy of gude whiskey, and when they struck up the reel of boggy, gude faith I'd kilt my coats and jig it away like a roe upon a mountain. Ah, there's nothing in the world like a bagpipe, let ye'r English bragsters clatter what they will."

It would have been difficult to have answered the old lady in any way pleasing; most luckily, however, it proved unnecessary, for Murtoch, who had not left the room at the finish of the last sentence, with his native imprudent simplicity, burst into a loud laugh, upon which the colour flew into the face of his mistress, and after rubbing, with much force, a huge pinch of snuff into her little snub nose, she rose precipitately. "I'll not be fashed with thee another day, thou awsome coof; gang oot, I say, abins thou art sent here by the evil one to gar me to sin; three days thou hast beset me, and I am rightly served; I ken well the proverb, 'Tis easier to keep the deevil Butt than drive him Ben; gang oot, I say, ye'r as daff as yer days awid; what could have induced thee, thou beast o' Babylon, to burst out i' sic a horse laugh."

"By the powers, my lady, do'nt be angry and I'll tell you now; I am above all prejudice of education, my lady, as they call it, because I never had any at all, so I can have no prejudice in favour of instruments of musick, except a knife and fork, and a plate, by way of accompaniment. Now, my lady, when you said there was nothing like a Scotch bagpipe in the world, to be sure, then thinks I, Ireland must be out of the world, or her ladyship would have thought of the darling sweet Irish pipes, so I could not help laughing, to think that yon two brawny beggars in petticoats, blowing their glistery pipes and squeezing their bladders till one's ears were ready to come down at one's nostrils, should be compared with the soft notes of the Union pipes of old Ireland. Oh, I have heard them so smooth and pianat in Paddy Carey, lee dee diddle de dee." Here he began to imitate, which, together with his sarcasm on Scotch bagpipes, quite settled accounts with his mistress; her countenance indicated a thousand dismissals, and unable to articulate, she rose again from her chair, with intent, no doubt, to show him the door, which Murtoch observing saved her the trouble, by making a precipitate retreat.

Again seating herself, and again taking a huge pinch of snuff, "What can I do with this chiel o' Satan, sir, this awfu' wicked sinner, ye ken his conduct; I canna say that I ever met wi' any circumstance that work'd up so evil a spirit in my mind as this reprobate has effected. He's sent on purpose to accelerate the work of the dee'l his master; he shall wallop in the morning; I dunna ken that I am justified." the eye o' the kirk, in harbouring a disciple of the scarlet whore, a Papistical chiel of Beelzebub, sent to awaken my besetting sin, that has hitherto been kept in subjection by religious discipline and incessant supplication." Here she paused, but finding I made no reply, after replenishing her nose, she thus proceeded, "An yet, if this ignorant creature is again let loose in the world and lost, I dinna ken how I can reconcile myself to be the cause of his destruction; for if the dee'l finds him idle, I'm thinking he'll soon supply him wi' business."

HENRY NEELE. A damp has been suddenly cast upon the hopes and sympathies of the lovers of fine writing, by the untimely end of this gifted writer. The particulars attending the calamitous affair have not reached us; but enough is known to harrow up our feelings, and to make us recoil from the task of announcing it to our readers. Suicide is a dreadful theme for contemplation let the subject be ever so obscure, or ever so infamous; but when to the finished reputation of a poet and a scholar, we add the unbounded confidence of the republic of letters, and the more universally venerated property of an amiable and edifying disposition, there can be no more bitter reflection than that the sweetest of his mental qualities, his pathetick temperament, should drive him on to self destruction.

"Oh! to possess such lustre—and then lack!"

The beautiful poetick effusions of Mr. Neele have often lent their beauties to our columns. As a worshipper of the muses he had few if any superiours in the sphere of his acquaintance. All the English literary journals were eager to enlist his pen, and those who were so fortunate, were not backward in expressing the pride they felt for such a contributor. The annual Christmas and New-Year's Gifts owed much of their interest to his pen; and they will feel most severely his fall. The world will feel it at large. His tales of fiction were related in a style vibrating between exquisite pathos and shrewdness. We had hitherto taken him for a writer who strove to write pathetick, but could not for the natural levity of his disposition. We now believe the reverse. We see so many of his productions in which the overwhelming tenderness of his diction preponderates, in spite of his forced archness, that we needed not this last proof, to pronounce his mind the abode and temple of melancholy. It is a sorrowful reflection, but it is no less the fact, that the sweetest productions of the muse, over which the young and enthusiastick heart has beat with rapture, and among which the lovely and happy have revelled like the happiest insect amidst the flowers of spring, have often emanated from a soul tortured and persecuted by conflicting hopes and doubts, and entirely a stranger to the calm and soothing delights it has the power of bestowing to others. Parnell, Otway, Cowper, Chatterton, and Neele are not the only monuments history has presented, and will present, of the tyranny which melancholy exercises over the tender mind.

These remarks may very properly be followed by the stanzas produced by our friend "G," on the same melancholy occasion, and we have for that reason given them a place not usually occupied by poetical contributions.

THRENODIA.

Thou brilliant one,—and thou art gone,
And sorrow wildly questions—why?
What maddening spirit urged thee on
To scorn our love, our hope,—and die?
We waited for thy tender muse
Like lovers for the trysting hour;
And when she came, Castalian dews
Descended like a summer shower.

Thou bright one! could we call thee back,
How would our lips expostulate!
What did this world of beauty lack,
That thou shouldst bend thy brow at fate?
If ever faithful hearts leaped out
For friendship, 'twas beneath thine eye;
And yet heaven chilled thy soul with doubt,
And anguish hurried thee to die.

Why didst thou bury from all eyes
The poisoned fountain of thy grief,
When thousand hearts and hands would rise
To give a breast like thine relief?
And thou art gone,—and we, too late,
Grieve for what thou hast been—and art;
But more, that all-reluctant fate
Forbade to bind thy broken heart.

Oh, never may a silent grief
Rule in a spirit so divine,
While there is one to reach relief,
And snatch him from a fate like thine!
'Tis madness to our tortured brain
That thou didst grieve and die alone,
If tears like cataracts of rain
Could have retained thee yet our own.

But rest in peace. No heart of flesh
Deserved a better lot than thou
Hast thrown away, while green and fresh
The bays just blossomed on thy brow.
Ay, rest in peace. Thy God is just;
Though thou wert rashly cruel thus
To bury in unhallowed dust
A gem that he had loaned to us!

March 22, 1828.

THE MORGAN AFFAIR. The prospect of having something done, and therefore less said, in relation to the unprofitable and demoralizing excitement which has for a long time spread over the western part of this state, appears something more likely to be realized. On Wednesday last, the acting governor, Pitcher, transmitted a message to the senate, proposing, as a more efficient means to allay the excitement, that a law be passed authorizing the appointment of a competent person to investigate the alleged criminal transactions in relation to the removal of William Morgan, and all the incidents connected therewith; that the powers of district attorney be vested in him; that it be made his duty to repair to the places where the offences were committed; to examine witnesses; to enter complaints; to cause witnesses and parties implicated to be bound over to appear; to conduct all criminal prosecutions which may be instituted; and to perform all other acts and duties which shall be necessary to a full and fair investigation and determination of the alleged offences. Should this measure be productive of no other result, it will contribute to hasten the eradication of this bugbear from the minds of the honest and well meaning who feel an interest in this affair. The guilty,—and such their doubtless are, not only for but against the outrage in question,—in spite of the vigilance of the strictest police, will comfort themselves in security; for it cannot be expected, when so much popular feeling has been enlisted, that any tribunal which can be specially instituted, can do more than has already been done to detect and bring the offenders to justice. The result will be, that the general imputation of the crime to the institution as a body, will be refuted, and whether the guilty be brought to light or not, as masons and citizens, we hope the affair may come to some speedy issue. Had we no motive founded on the principles of impartial justice, and we believe every true mason has,—we should wait anxiously for the result, because we know that the complete acquittal of the order, in the public mind, must follow.

But on the other hand we find the order more directly aimed at. It is well known that at the late election in this state, members of our legislature were elected for the express purpose of putting down, or at least, making their best exertions to put down all manner of secret organized societies in the state. That they have been so long silent on the great object of their mission, was a matter of surprise. But they have hitherto waited like puppets for the hand behind the scenes to pull upon the wires. At last the signal has been given, and a memorial has been presented from the Le Roy convention, praying that the order of speculative freemasonry be prohibited from administering oaths by the imposition of penalties. This was the famous convention, who, not content with the bare declaration that they were guilty of perjury, publicly resolved that they were so, and bore witness to it under hand and pen. They did not however swear to it for fear it would be very consistently doubted.—It was not convened for political purposes; O no! far from it. True, it resulted in the nomination of Solomon Southwick, but that is no proof that any thing but pure disinterested patriotism actuated them. They have not publicly declared that they did meet for political purposes, and, until they do say so, we shall believe they did; when they confess it we shall consider it doubtful.

But to return to the memorial,—we are happy to see our anti-masonick friends come forward and offer to break the ice. Now a man may have something to say, without the imputation of having begun the wrangle. Now the friends of our republican institutions are free to test its principles, and examine them by the constitution. What do they expect to gain by the introduction of such a law? Do they think that legislation can intimidate that brotherhood, which not even the uttermost stretch of arbitrary power could ever put down? Or do they presume that freemasons can be led to contend for the rights which the constitution of the state and the United States have so long guaranteed to them? We take the rights we now have for granted; and as no anti-mason knows what our rights are, we shall treat them like frivolous and impertinent upstarts, by telling them in the politest possible way—to mind their own business. If any act of the legislative authority fall under our displeasure, it will be from principle,—from some palpable infringement on the rights of citizens, individually or collectively;—not from any evil that can result from its execution to the masonick order. No laws can dissolve our order,—no force can dissipate our mystick union; for so long as three men live, worthy of the name and fellowship and privileges of freemasonry, so long shall the order stand,—“and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it!”

GOVERNOR SOUTHWICK'S VERACITY. It is not perhaps generally known that the statement contained in the following extract from the National Observer of the 22d of Feb. ultimo, has ever been made. So little credit was given to it even by the satellites of that paper to the west, that none copied it or even paraphrased it for the edification of their anti-masonick patrons, and of course little credit could attach to it nearer home, where the editor's true character is better known and his veracity duly valued. Indeed we strongly suspect that the article was written at home, and consequently before the transaction mentioned could have happened, as the editor left the city previous to the funeral, and it is altogether improbable that he could have heard the information, and communicated thereupon, all the way from the westward, in the short space of time that elapsed between the funeral and the day of publication. After contradicting the reports respecting the number of masons attending the funeral, and then expatiating loudly upon the disinterested love of truth, so conspicuous in the editor of the Observer, he comes out with it in these words:—

"Now for a plain and simple statement of ungarbled facts. The masons with that unparalleled impudence, that dauntless effrontery, which is their peculiar GRAND ATTRIBUTE, attempted to take from the hands of the committee of the senate and assembly, the whole management and superintendence of the funeral.

"Upon this occasion, as they have upon others, we are respectably informed, FRANCIS GRANGER and BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, took a bold, manly and decided stand, which redounds to their honour, and is another flower in the blooming wreath which they have entwined for themselves, upon this heart-rending public calamity."

Soon after the appearance of the above paragraphs, we addressed a note to the gentlemen of the joint committee whose names are given in them, requesting an answer, if any such attempt had been made in behalf of the masonick fraternity, to which we received the following note in return; and as an act of justice to them, as well as to the fraternity, it is now given to the publick.

Albany, March 5, 1828.

Sir—An earlier answer was due to your letter, received some days since, by which our attention was called to an article in the National Observer, stating that the editor had been informed that the masonick fraternity had endeavoured to wrest from the joint committee of the senate and assembly, the management of the funeral of our late governor, and that we had defeated such attempt. This statement is erroneous. To correct all existing errors on this subject, we have thought it proper to present the facts as they occurred.

At the first meeting of the committee it was determined that the direction and government of the funeral ceremonies should rest with them alone. A request was presented on behalf of the masonick societies, that a place might be assigned to them in the procession, and it was unanimously determined that these and other citizens of our state were privileged in mourning the common loss in such manner as should be most congenial to their feelings; but it was also unanimously determined that no ceremonies could be permitted other than those directed by the committee.

This reply was given, not from an understanding that the request from any of the societies had extended to the expression of a desire to perform any ceremonies; but to prevent the possibility of misconstruction either of the request or of the decision upon it.

Regretting that a sense of justice to all, compels us to present our names to the publick, we are
Your obedient servants,

FR. GRANGER,
B. F. BUTLER.

THEATRE. The Albany Theatre under the management of Mr. Vernon, and in immediate connexion with the Bowery Theatre, New-York, was opened on Wednesday last.—Not having as yet seen the performances, we cannot speak particularly of the merits of the company. Paul Pry we understand is announced for this evening.

—The Philadelphia Album, Literary Cadet, and some other papers, have given an insertion to "Mag's attempt at High Life," perhaps without knowing that it was ushered "into this breathing world," through our columns, and perhaps not. The Bower of Taste is excusable, having credited it to the former paper, very naturally supposing it original there.

—Mrs. WARE, of the Bower of Taste, is in error when she says that the "Magician's Visitor" was written by the editor of the Yankee. The author was HENRY NEELE, esq. the same whose untimely death it is our melancholy task to announce in the present number. The Yankee Neal meets with a strange reception from the editorial craft we think.—Not content with denying him his own truly lawful productions and wresting the meaning of what he has written, they are intent to force upon him the authorship of articles he never pretended to. He would laugh at this mistake but for the recent sorrowful event associated with the real author's name.

Another word to the Bower, or rather to the contributor who writes over the signature M. and seven stars. In our opinion the poem in the last number of the Bower has some very good points to recommend it; but it would have looked better in the writer to have followed the original more exactly, or else not at all. For example take the first stanza:—

There is a flower, a little flower,
With azure crest and golden eye,
Whose smile illumines the vernal hour,
Whose tints reflect the sky—
Know ye its name?

Montgomery, (not Burns, Mrs. Ware,) has it:—

There is a flower, a little flower,
With silver crest and golden eye,
That welcomes every changing hour,
And weathers every sky.

Again in the second stanza,—

The gayer beauties of the field, &c.
The prouder beauties of the field, &c.

And in the third.

But this small flower to friendship dear, &c.
But this small flower to Nature dear, &c.

And this is intended for original poetry! Mrs. Ware would do well to inform her contributor that he has too much poetick talent of his own to throw away his reputation on such foolish plagiarisms.

LITERARY NOTICES.

—Contents of Flint's Western Monthly Review, No. 10, for February:—The Hermit of the Prairies; Reptiles of the Mississippi Valley; Menander, a Western Epick. REVIEWS: Chronicles of the Canongate; The Red Rover; Le Genie du Christianisme; Burrough's Address.

—Contents of the January number of the Western Medical and Physical Journal:—Notes on a case of Cellular Inflammation; an account of the death of a man from a lacerated wound of the Jejunum; Observations on Piperine; Bichat's Pathological Anatomy, concluded; A Treatise on the Effects and Properties of Cold; Hepatica Triloba; Fœtal Monstrosity; Medical Convention of Ohio; Cincinnati Eye Infirmary; Epidemic Quackery; Obituary Notice of Doctor John Sellman.

—The Western Tiller has passed from the hands of its original proprietor. Mr. William J. Ferris is now editor and proprietor.

—A new evening paper is about to be established at Philadelphia, to bear the title of the Daily Chronicle, by Charles Alexander, late partner of the firm of Atkinson and Alexander. It is to stand neutral as it respects the presidential question.

—The Vermont Statesman, at Castleton, has been taken by Mr. Samuel W. Bush, a young man of good talents, both as a writer and a mechanic, late of this city.

—Another weekly paper has been established at Pottstown, Pennsylvania, named the Montgomery Republican, by S. Royer. It is in favour of the general administration.

—Old Hickory, by Captain Cudgel & Co. has been received; the second satirical paper established lately in Ithaca. There is something very striking in these names, particularly that of the editor.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Wednesday, March 5. The senate reconsidered their vote of yesterday, rejecting the bill to facilitate trade between this state and Boston, and the bill was laid on the table. The remainder of the day was spent in committee of the whole, on the bill from the assembly, to incorporate the president, directors and company of the Monroe bank.

In assembly, Mr. Williams moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, agreeing to the report of the committee of the whole on the bill to incorporate the Watervliet Turnpike company; for the purpose of adding a section authorizing the supervisors of Albany at any time within three years, to raise money by tax for the purpose of paying to the stockholders of the company the moneys expended by them in the construction of the road, together with the interest of the same; and that after such payment the road shall be a free road, and toll shall be no longer demanded on the same. The motion prevailed, the amendment made, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. A report was received from the canal board on the petition of Joy, Brace & Co., forwarding merchants, relative to preference given to passage boats on the canals in the passage of the locks.—The board recommend that such preference be given to but one daily line west of Utica, and to two daily lines east of Utica.

Thursday, March 6. In senate, a report was received from the canal commissioners on the petition of George Tibbits, and also on the petition of Stephen Ross and others, for an act of incorporation to construct a side-cut from the Erie canal to the Troy dam. The reports were severally laid on the table. Bills read a third time and passed: to settle the estate of Mary Duxtader; to increase the capital stock of the Flushing Institute.

In assembly, bills read a third time and passed: to authorize the supervisors of Washington county to raise money by tax to extend their county poor house; to alter the time of the election of the vestry of St. Luke's church, Rochester; to lay out a road from Oxford to Otseck creek; to incorporate the village of Oswego; to revive and amend the act incorporating the Catharine and Spencer turnpike company. [The Watervliet turnpike company bill was passed by a vote of 93 to 9.] The third reading of bills for the renewal of bank charters was suspended.

Friday, March 7. In senate, a communication was received from the canal commissioners, on the subject of mills and machinery erected on the Champlain canal and its feeders, stating that the present regulations by law are wholly insufficient to secure to the state, in such cases, an equivalent for the use of the water. Referred to the committee on canals. The bill for the relief of Thaddeus B. Bigelow, was read a third time and passed.

In assembly, the canal committee were instructed to inquire as to the necessary measures to be taken to complete the Glen's Falls feeder. The annual report of the New-York savings bank was received and ordered to be printed. Bills read a third time and passed: to reduce the capital and renew the charter of the Albany Insurance company; to lay out a road from Amherst to Lockport; relative to the Monroe and Haverstraw turnpike company; to alter the time of the annual meeting of the Farmers' Hall library in Jefferson; for the relief of Elisha C. Hickox. Mr. Johnson offered a resolution disapproving of the South Carolina resolutions, and postponing their discussion until the 31st of December next, which he subsequently amended by accepting a resolution offered by Mr. Butler, and adopting it as his own, in these words:—Resolved, that while this house is free to declare that it does not concur in the said resolutions, and particularly that part of the same relating to the encouragement of domestic manufactures, yet it is deemed inexpedient at this time to treat the subject more at large, and therefore their consideration is indefinitely postponed.

Saturday, March 8. In senate, bills read a third time and passed: to erect a new town from Moriah and Minerva, in the county of Essex; to appoint commissioners to lay out a road from Claverack to the Massachusetts line; for the relief of James Ashley; to alter the time of the election of wardens and vestrymen of St. Luke's church, Genesee Falls. The bill to alter the time of holding the annual election of the Rutland Farmers' Library in the county of Jefferson, was read a third time and lost.

In assembly, bills read a third time and passed: to amend the act to incorporate the city of Troy; to alter the time of town meeting in Galen; to confirm the proceedings of commissioners of highways in Davenport; to confirm the appointment of commissioners of deeds in Ulster; concerning sales by the sheriff of Cayuga, and to increase the capital of the Flushing Institute.

—Our customary dish of "Table talk," is unavoidably crowded out, this week.

POETRY.

FOR THE MASONICK RECORD AND SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

IMMORTALITY.

Throw off the robe that earth can give,—
The crown for which the earthly live;
They are but baubles of a day,
Which lend a hue to baser clay;
They are like tears, purchased to shed
Their mimic sorrow o'er the dead,
And all corruption may be taught
To shine like them—and still be naught.
I will not stoop for weeds like them,—
So dole the robe and diadem
To fools who court them,—but to me
A glorious immortality!

Take back the gold;—it is a weight
Which ill befits a deathless state;
It is a synonyme to care,
And builds an altar to despair,
And they who worship there must learn
Allegiance to the earth I spurn.
Chains, though unwrought, they wear not less
Who the enslaving mine possess,
Than they whose limbs cleave to the earth
Of the dank dungeon—while by birth
The soul can wander wide and free
To its own immortality.

Tell not of love;—its honeyed kiss
May be the paragon of bliss;—
The glory of its melting eye,
The balm of its impassioned sigh,
The burning agonized embrace
That would dismember time and space,
And raptures more than tongue hath spoken,
Are spells that bind but to be broken;
And fatal has it ever proved
To love, or yet to be beloved,
For the young spirit;—then for me
No love but immortality.

Keep back the cup;—its potent spell
Alas! can counterfeit too well.
Yes;—for a moment I may dream
I taste the renovating stream,
And the deception leads me on
Till faith, and strength, and hope are gone,
And leave me lone, debased, and wasted,
Where first the bitter cup was tasted,
Bitter—not till too deeply drained
To cleanse the lip its curse hath stained.
Oh, crush the goblet ere it be
A pledge to immortality!

The noisy pleasures which ye bring
Cannot call back my upward wing.
What care I for earth's thousand smiles?
They are as false as other wiles:
What care I for the greet or frown
That meets alike the sage and clown?
And fashionable friendship too—
What care I, be it false or true?
Nor power, nor wealth, nor love, nor wine,
Nor friendship, have to eyes like mine
A single hue or shadow free
To blend with immortality.

But o'er the fields, the earth, the sky,
The silvery river, or the high
And wind-struck mountain, or the low
And sheltering vale, where streamlets flow
Untasted but by sinless flocks,—
Whose darkened woods and gray old rocks
Give not an echo, nor have given,
But would be answered even in heaven,—
I still would hover.—They are rife
With tokens of eternal life;
And oh, may all their beauties be
Blent with my immortality!

THE BEAUTY.

BY EDWARD C. PINKNEY.

Qua puella nihil unquam festivius, amabilius, nec modo longiore vita, sed prope immortalitate dignius vidi.
PLINY.

All history is but a smoky column
By heated minds sent up into the past;
Vain, unsubstantial, mutable, and solemn,
It scars, to terminate in clouds at last;
It is unsolid at its very base—
What should it be at any loftier place?

I turn away then, and disdain to borrow,
Thou authorized romance, a theme from thee,
False record of true folly, guilt and sorrow,
That have been, are, and shall not cease to be!
And lingering memory, led by time along,
Reverts to one deserving of my song.

Amid the common crowd, she seemed a grain
Of gold among the sands of life's dull stream;
She cheered this sleep, perturbed and full of pain,
Which men call life, like some delightful dream;
So, as I see such seldom, she was not
Calmly beheld, nor soon to be forgot.

I speak not of the form that blessed the sight
Of her beholder—for it fills his mind,
And verse to others about charms so bright,
Were like discourse on sunbeams to the blind;
Suffice it then to say, no fairer one
Hath ever cast a shadow from the sun.

In her fine fancy lovely thoughts disported
Like Naiads playing amid classic waters:
Nature gave her the mental grace that's courted
Vainly from art, by earth's less gifted daughters;
Lodged in the beauteous person of this woman,
The soul, "at Rome," conformed, and was a Roman.

The signs of genius on her face were seen,
That dangerous but fascinating boon,
And gentle passions ruled her, as a queen
Rules in the east—for as the shining moon
Dims the thick stars that gem a summer night,
Her modesty obscured these lights with light.

Her voice was sweet as she was—with one lay
She stilled the spell-bound phantoms of the main,
As Indian wizards used to charm away
Less baneful reptiles from their native plain;
For even in speech her soft tones could delight
Like music heard in visions of the night.

Enough;—on graver subjects I have mused
Too much, as was my pleasure, pain, or duty—
My heart and harp have been too long disused,
To celebrate aright this perfect beauty.

THE CHANGING WORLD.

BY MRS. HALE.

How the world's aspect changes! Doth it change?
Or are the changes in the eye that gazes?
See the light hearted boy—all earth is strange
And new, but lovely; and he laughs and praises,
And makes his life a holiday, nor dreams
His bounding foot will ever press the thorn;
The world he treads as bright and softened seems
As far off mountains, robed in hues of morn.

There comes a change, when youth with burning thought
Roams o'er the sunny fields in search of roses;
And he may pluck them, but thy're dearly bought;
For every step some blasted scene discloses:
And the flowers wither ere the wreath is twined,—
Haste, seize another—'twill be all the same—
His wreath he scatters to the passing wind,
Sighs, and confesses pleasure but a name!

There comes a change—when manhood walks abroad,
He seeks no roses—let the frail things wither!
The path he chooses mighty ones have trod,
And on he rushes, scarcely heeding whither—
But shining dust is scattered o'er the ground—
He stoops to grasp it, and is bowed for ever!
Though heaven's transcendent glories beam around,
The eye intent on gold regards them—never!

There comes a change—when age's sunken eye
Hath lost its vision, and the mists have gathered;
Then life's dark shadows o'er the cold earth lie—
Nor spring nor blossom when the heart is withered:
And all is barren—even gold grows dim—
But trembling mortal, thou mayst look above thee,
One blessed star still burns to guide to Him—
Who from the throne of heaven has stooped to love thee!

ANDRE'S LAST REQUEST.

FROM THE BOSTON STATESMAN.

It is not the fear of death
That damps my brow,
It is not for another breath
I ask thee now.
I can die with lip unstirred
And a quiet heart—
Let but this prayer be heard
Ere I depart.

I can give up my mother's look;
My sister's kiss,—
I can think of love—yet brook
A death like this!
I can give up the young fame
I burned to win—
All—but the spotless name
I glory in.

Thine is the power to give,
Thine to deny,
Joy for the hour I live,
Calmness to die.
By all the brave should cherish—
By my dying breath—
I ask that I may perish
With a soldier's death!

CASSIN.

SONG.

FROM MOORE'S NATIONAL AIRS, NUMBER SIXTH.

Hope comes again, to this heart long a stranger,
Once more she sings me her flattering strain;
But hush, gentle siren, for ah, there's less danger
In still suffering on than in hoping again,
Long, long, in sorrow, too deep for repining,
Gloomy, but tranquil, this bosom hath lain,
And joy, coming now like a sudden light shining
O'er eyelids long darkened, would bring me but pain.
Fly then, ye visions, that hope would shed o'er me;—
Lost to the future, my sole chance of rest
Now lies not in dreaming of bliss that's before me,
But, ah, in forgetting how once I was blest!

LINES TO —.

PRESENTED WITH A COPY OF LALLA ROOKEE.

With wishes fond, and vows that burn,
I bless the gift I send to thee;
The happy leaves thy hand shall turn,
The happy lines thine eyes shall see:
Each little gift is as a link,
More closely severed hearts to bind:
And this may lead thy soul to think
Of him whom it hath left behind.

Oh! when thou dwellest upon the page,
To chase away some idle hour,
And thoughts of love and truth engage,
Expressed with all the poet's power;
While round thee fairy fiction weaves
The veil, oh! spare one thought to me;
Think that my spirit, mid the leaves,
Breathes through the poet's words to thee!

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD, AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. II.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1828.

NO. 9.

MASONICK RECORD.

On the receipt of the melancholy news of the death of Gov. CLINTON, at Circleville, Ohio, CALEB ATWATER, esq. wrote the following article, which was read to a number of his masonick brethren.

DE WITT CLINTON,

As a Mason—a Statesman—and Philanthropist.

During a great number of years DE WITT CLINTON belonged to the order of freemasonry. He did honour to the fraternity, by constantly exhibiting in his life a living picture of all those virtues which the principles of masonry enjoin. In every act of his life, through a long course of years, he exhibited a lively faith in the great Redeemer—a lively hope in immortality, and his christian charity, was not only extended to his masonick brethren, their widows and orphans, but towards all mankind. He soothed the afflicted, bound up the broken heart, and dried up the tears of the widow and the orphan. He reduced his large fortune by acts of charity. He considered his extensive patronage, as governour of New-York, as placed in his hands by the Almighty for the purpose of enabling him to do good to mankind; and it was used in strict accordance with that view of the subject.

We could name, not only individuals, but whole families, which have been raised from poverty and despondency to competency and usefulness, through his aid. His private benevolence was not confined to the state of New-York; no, like the sun his light shone over the world. Wherever he heard of an orphan or poor man struggling to obtain an education, or to extend his knowledge of any particular science DE WITT CLINTON took him by the hand—he recommended him to the world, furnished him money, gave him books, applauded all his efforts when properly directed, and told him in what he was in error.

If any scientific man was unable to obtain such books as related to any subject which he wished to pursue, as soon as governour Clinton knew the fact, without waiting to inquire of the man himself what he needed, the books were purchased, whatever they might cost, and presented gratuitously to the one who needed them. If they were not to be found in the United States, they were sent for to Edinburgh, to Paris, or to London.—There are such works so procured and presented to a citizen of this town.

He was the father of the school fund in New-York, and of the common school system of education. He always advocated liberal appropriations to colleges, academies and other seminaries of learning. He was the father of internal improvements in the United States.

The publick services of DE WITT CLINTON have been worth millions to the United States.—During thirty years, he has been a faithful publick servant. We have seen him in the assembly and senate of New-York, an able and faithful legislator. We have seen him in the court of errors of New-York, an independent, learned and accomplished jurist. We have seen him in the senate of the United States, a senator, who did honour to his station, and was the early, intrepid and successful "FRIEND OF OHIO." For the last fifteen years he has employed his time and his talents upon a work which will be gazed on with wonder by all succeeding generations. This work will be the pride and delight of mankind, so long as human wisdom or publick policy have a monument remaining on the globe. The grand Clinton canal stretches from the Hudson to the lakes, rousing enterprise and industry, and enriching the people. Its waters are covered with the productions of every clime and every soil, building up cities, towns and villages, and multiplying all the enjoyments of civilized life. Its vast advantages no mind can estimate. They affect the destinies of the whole union, and their value increases every day, and will increase so long as this nation exists.

While we give way to the impulses of our gratitude, need we wonder at the distinguished attention to this great and good man, by the people of the west while on his tour among us? It is now difficult to appreciate Mr Clinton's services, in producing the New-York canals. The mind often becomes incredulous in retracing the steps which have led to gigantic works, where even this is simple and practicable. To make the New-York canals is now deemed an easy matter, and we wonder that they were ever opposed by any man of common sense and common honesty.—New-York is now an empire, with a disposable capital of millions of dollars, to be loaned at an interest below the legal standard. She stands ready to loan every cent that may be necessary to construct a canal from lake Erie to the Ohio river. But how was it fifteen years ago? To connect lake Erie with the Hudson was then ridiculous, and its commencement one hundred years too soon. It would cost fifty millions of dollars, and take whole centuries to complete it! It was to ruin the farmers with taxes and destroy the credit of the state forever. Aid was asked of the general government and refused—of the individual states and all refused but Ohio, then weak in numbers and poor in purse, yet she, and she alone, returned for answer, that she fully believed in the feasibility of the project and the ability of New-York and her Clinton to complete it, and pledged herself, as soon as circumstances would permit, to assist her elder sister in the work. This answer was all Ohio had to give at that time, and she may be proud that she then gave such an answer. Thus treated by all the union, New-York resorted to her own resources and "HER GREAT WORK IS DONE." But supposing, at that dark and portentous period, DE WITT CLINTON had desponded of success, where would have been the most stupendous work of any age or country? It would not yet have been even begun, nor our Ohio canals been thought of to this day.

Ohio has lost her oldest, her ablest and best friend. She owes it to him, to his aid and influence in congress, that she was admitted into the union when she was. It was objected by several influential members of congress: "that Ohio was too young in years and too feeble in numbers, to be thus admitted into the confederacy. To which Mr. Clinton replied, "that her mild climate, her fruitful soil, her great natural advantages and the absence of domestic slavery would one day render her the brightest star in the constellation of the union."

To his successful example, to his animating voice, Ohio is indebted for her grand canal. It was his aid and influence which procured us funds, to enable us to carry on this grand work. He made a long and tedious journey to be present at its commencement. Had he lived, arrangements were made for his being present at its completion. But alas! He has been called off from his labours by our Grand High Priest above, to refreshment.

No more shall he visit our lodge as he did when in this town—no more shall his voice be heard among us, because the Grand Tyler death has admitted him into the door of the Grand Lodge above, at the command of our Almighty Grand Master.

All that was mortal of our distinguished brother is dead, but his example remains with us and all free and accepted masons to cheer and to animate us in every variety of fortune that awaits us in life.—His private benevolence and charity, his love of learning and science—his pure republican principles—his faith in God, his hope in immortality, and his charity to all mankind, especially towards his masonick brethren, their widows and orphans, still shine like great lamps in the world to lead us through it, in peace and safety up to heaven and to God. While learning and science have votaries, while private virtue and transcendent talents, natural and acquired, find admirers among men—and while great publick usefulness is honoured on earth, our CLINTON will be gratefully remembered by posterity. As a statesman he stood upon the usefulness of his measures, hence his fame will continue and grow brighter as their usefulness will become more and more apparent, until the end of time.

Let other statesmen follow some momentary impulse, and be wafted along upon the momentary gale of popular applause—so did not our deceased friend and brother. He followed not after applause of the moment—he led the way, performed his gigantic works, and they will speak his praises all over the world as long as time endures. While the petty party politician of the moment, resembles most a glaring meteor, which shines its moment and is extinguished forever, CLINTON resembles the sun in the heavens, performing his diurnal revolutions to diffuse his steady light, to illumine, to warm, and give life and vigour to a whole system.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

VERMONT.

At a regular communication of Mount Calvary Encampment, held in Masons' Hall, in Middlebury, Vermont, on the 11th March, 1828, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

PREAMBLE:—Memento mori, it deeply engraven on every sublunary object. Death has an established empire over all the works of nature. Mutation is an essential characteristic of all natural beings. Daily observation as well as divine inspiration proclaims the unerring truth, that all inanimate and animate objects, like the passing current, are designed only for a limited duration. Man, the noblest work of God, in accordance with those laws which pervade all terrestrial things, continues in his earthly tenement but for a season. "The body then returns to the dust from whence it came, and the soul to God who gave it."

Notwithstanding the instances of mortality we so frequently witness, yet through some unaccountable infatuation have we not practically forgotten that we are born to die! Have we not gone from one disguise to another—added hope to hope;—and laid out secular schemes for the employment of many years! Amid this our careless and inattentive career, God has appeared in judgement amongst us. The Grand Master of our General Encampment has suddenly been removed by death! DE WITT CLINTON, whose political fame will remain while canals and rocks exist, is now numbered with the illustrious dead. Whatever the private life of CLINTON may have been, his public acts placed him in the rank with the first of public benefactors. His loss is deeply and sensibly felt by an immense community. His opposers acknowledged him great,—his friends knew him to be such. Yet great as he was, he could not resist the commanding influence of truth, nor gainsay divine revelation. He yielded to its impulse, and bowed humbly at the Cross of Christ; and his name will ever remain enrolled among those weary way-worn pilgrims, who have espoused the cause of the Christian Religion. "IN HOC SIGNO VINCES" was his motto. Guided by these principles, he was early found a patron of freemasonry, of learning, of Bible societies, of Sabbath schools, and of other moral and religious institutions. By his death we are forcibly reminded that in the midst of life we are in death; and that whatever elevation of character we may have attained, yet shortly must we all submit as victims of its destroying power, and endure the humbling level of the tomb. On an occasion of so much magnitude as the present, it is laudable to mingle our sympathies with those more immediately bereft: therefore,

Resolved, that this Encampment consider the late dispensation of Divine Providence in the removal of their late General Grand Master, DE WITT CLINTON, by death, as an event deeply afflicting to the publick, and especially so to the masonick institution.

Resolved, that the jewels and furniture of Mount Calvary Encampment be clad in mourning, and that the members thereof wear the appropriate badge of mourning during their convocations, until the session of the next Grand Encampment.

Resolved, that the Recorder cause the above preamble and resolution to be published.

GEORGIA.

Masonick Hall, Milledgeville, March 1.

The afflicting intelligence having reached us, through the medium of the papers, of the sudden death of our estimable brother, DE WITT CLINTON, the brethren of the several lodges of freemasonry in this place, assembled on Saturday, the 1st of March instant, at their Hall, and appointed a committee to take suitable measures to manifest their sincere regret at his loss; which committee reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas, it has pleased the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, to take to himself our worthy and highly cherished brother, DE WITT CLINTON, by which divine dispensation the masonick fraternity is deprived of its respected chief, and the nation of a highly distinguished statesman and a patriot—while his native state is plunged in sorrow for his loss, we may be permitted to commingle our tears with those that water his tomb. To commemorate his deeds of publick and enduring utility, is the office of the historian; but to bestow upon his memory the tribute to which the private and masonick virtues, that adorn his character, are justly entitled, is ours. As there are none so humble within the sphere of his usefulness, who have not felt their influence; so, there are none so exalted, who might not be ennobled by their possession. Although far removed from the immediate masonick circle in which he was wont to preside, yet, as members of the great masonick family, we have viewed with pride the expanding usefulness of our gifted brother. We revered his exalted character while living; we cherish his memory and mourn his loss now that he is no more.

Be it therefore resolved, that the jewels and columns of the chapter and the several lodges of this place, be shrouded in mourning for sixty days; and that the brethren do wear crape on the left arm for the same period.

Resolved, that a brother be designated to pronounce his eulogy on the ensuing anniversary of St. John's, 24th June next.

Resolved, that a copy of the foregoing be transmitted to the afflicted family of the deceased by the chairman of the committee, and published in the different papers of this place.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

FOOTSTEPS BEFORE THE FLOOD.

A very curious paper, by Mr. Grierson, was read before the general meeting of the Literary and Antiquarian Society of Perth on the 22d of November last; the subject of which was some footsteps of quadrupeds discovered in a red sandstone quarry, about two miles to the north of the town of Lochmaben, in the county of Dumfries. Professor Buckland, having received casts of some of the most distinct impressions, together with a fragment of the sandstone itself, expressed his full conviction (though the fact was at variance with his general opinions respecting the geological formation,) that the rock, while in a soft state, had been traversed by living quadrupeds. The dip of the strata in the quarry is towards the west, and at an angle of about 35 degrees. On the eastern side, therefore, it is the upper surface of the strata that presents itself; and of this there is a great lateral extent. The upper edge of the strata, the face of which is there exposed, reaches within about fifteen feet of the surface of the ground. From this upper boundary down to the line where they disappear under the rubbish, which (since the working has been carried on chiefly on the opposite side of the quarry) has accumulated at their base; there are fully fifteen feet of their surface distinctly exhibited, and that for a range of not less than between forty and fifty yards. On the range of this acclivity, no less than four separate tracks were found of as many different kinds of animals. Three of these tracks were towards the south extremity of the range on the surface of the same identical layer, and two of them within two or three yards of each other. The fourth one was towards the north extremity, and probably on the same layer as the others; but owing to a quantity of earth which had rolled down, this was not fully ascertained. The simple inspection of the tracks, however, made it impossible to doubt in what manner they had been produced. The great number of the impressions in uninterrupted continuity, the regular alternations of the right and left footsteps, their equidistance from each other, the outward direction of the toes, the grazing of the foot along the surface before it was firmly planted, the deeper impression made by the toe than by the heel, and, in one instance, the sharp and well-defined marks of the three claws of the animal's foot,—are circumstances which immediately arrest the attention of the observer, and force him to acknowledge, that they admit of only one explanation. The impressions of one of these tracks, Dr. Buckland thinks have been produced by the feet of a tortoise or crocodile. It will be obvious from the preceding description of the stratum containing these animal impressions, that though now lying bare and superficial as at the time when the impressions were made, it is really the one on which all the other strata of the quarry had been superimposed. One of the deepest and most distinct impressions was found at the base of the stratum in the lower part of the quarry, perhaps sixty or seventy feet beneath the surface of the earth. In what manner the facts and phenomena described may affect some interesting questions in geology, Mr. Grierson says he shall not presume to inquire; "but," adds that gentleman, "I think I may be permitted to remark in conclusion, that we have now specimens of the new red sandstone, containing impressions of quadrupeds,—impressions, which, to say the least, may be denominated, Footsteps before the Flood."

ARCHITECTURE OF THE HUMAN SKULL.

It requires no disquisition to prove that the brain is the most essential organ of the animal system, and being so, we may presume that it must be especially protected. We are now to inquire how this main object is attained? We must first understand that the brain may be hurt, not only by sharp bodies touching and entering it, but by a blow on the head which shall vibrate through it, without the instrument piercing the skull. Indeed, a blow upon a man's head, by a body which shall cause a vibration through the substance of the brain, may more effectually deprive him of sense and motion than if an axe or a sword penetrated into the substance of the brain itself. Supposing that a man's ingenuity were to be exercised in contriving a protection to the brain, he must perceive that if the case were soft, it would be too easily pierced; that if it were of a glassy nature, it would be chipped and cracked; that if it were of a substance like metal, it would ring and vibrate, and communicate the concussion to the brain. Further thoughts might suggest, that whilst the case should be made firm to resist a point, the vibrations of that circular case might be prevented by lining it with a softer material: no bell would vibrate with such an incumbent; the sound would be stopped like the ringing of a glass by the touch of a finger. If a soldier's head be covered with a steel cap, the blow of a sword which does not penetrate will yet bring him to the ground by the percussion which extends to the brain; therefore, the helmet is lined with leather, and covered with hair; for, although the hair is made an ornament, it is an essential part of the protection: we may see it in the head-piece of the Roman soldier, where all useless ornament being despised as frivolous, was avoided as cumbrous. We now perceive why the skull consists of two plates of bone, one external, which is fibrous and tough, and one internal, dense to such a degree that the anatomist calls it tabula vitrea (the glassy table.) Nobody can suppose this to be accidental. It has just been stated, that the brain may be injured in two ways; a stone or a hammer may break the skull, and the depressed part of the bone injure the brain; whilst, on the other hand, a mallet struck upon the head will, without penetrating effectually, deprive the brain of its functions, by causing a vibration which runs round the skull and extends to every portion of its contents. Were the skull, in its perfect or mature state, softer than it is, it would be like the skull of a child; were it harder than we find it is, it would be like that of an old man. In other words, as in the former, it would be too easily pierced; so, in the latter, it would vibrate too sharply and produce concussion. The skull of an infant is a single layer of elastic bone; on the approach to manhood it separates into two tables; and in old age it again becomes consolidated. During the active years of man's life the skull is perfect; it then consists of two layers, united by a softer substance; the inner layer is brittle as glass, and calculated to resist anything penetrating; the outer table is tough, to give consistence, and to stifle the vibration which there would be if the whole texture were uniform and like the inner table. The alteration in the substance of the bones, and more particularly in the skull, is marvellously ordered to follow the changes in the mind of the creature, from the heedlessness of childhood to the caution of age, and even the helplessness of superannuation. The skull is soft and yielding at birth; during childhood it is elastic, and little liable to injury from concussion; and during infancy, and up to the period of maturity, the parts coming in contract with the ground are thicker, whilst the shock is dispersed towards the sutures (the seams or joinings of the pieces) which are still loose; but when, with advancing years, something tells us to give up seats of activity, and falls are less frequent, the bones lose that nature which would render concussion harmless, and at length the timidity of age teaches man that his structure is no longer adapted to active life.

GEOGRAPHY.

The Geographical Society of Paris has existed little more than six years. In the course of that short period it has established prizes to the amount of 16,400 francs; published a series of questions with reference to the principal desiderata in the science; caused several maps to be engraved; given the most complete text extant of the Travels of Marco-Polo; prepared instructions for a great number of travellers; obtained for them the countenance of the French and foreign governments; pointed out Cyrenaica as one of the most useful objects of inquiry; rewarded the admirable travels of M. Pacho, and M. Braghiere's remarkable memoir on the horography of Europe; published two volumes of memoirs and manuscript narratives; received an immense variety of communications from all parts of the globe; maintained a scientific correspondence with the principal academies and learned societies in the two worlds; formed a valuable library; conceived the idea of a new hy-drographical map of France, and concurred in its production by a committee from its own body; and, finally, offered a reward of eight thousand francs to the traveller who may be so fortunate as to penetrate into central Africa, either by the French possessions in Senegambia, or by the countries in the vicinity of the region of the upper Nile.

The members of this society are at present 349 in number. Twenty-two travellers are now pursuing their inquiries, under the auspices of the Society, in Peru, Colombia, Chili, Persia, India, Thibet, Arabia, Georgia, Numidia, Abyssinia, Senegal, &c., not to mention the Antilles, and a voyage round the world. It was recently proposed to the Society by its President, to offer two annual medals for the most important geographical discoveries of the year; to receive communications on the subject written in either English, Spanish, or Latin; to accelerate the publication of a volume of memoirs and questions; and to address a circular letter to all the travellers, consuls, and correspondents of the Society.

ANTIQUITIES.

The remains of a fine Roman villa have been recently discovered near Helpstone, between Stamford and Peterborough. Mr. Artis, well known for his successful antiquarian researches, has caused the spot to be explored, and his investigation has been rewarded by finding a tessellated pavement, of superior workmanship. The same gentleman (says the York Chronicle) has discovered a complete iron-foundry of the Romans near Wansford.

Amongst the bandages of an Egyptian mummy in the Philosophical Hall at Leeds, a small piece of red leather has been found, stamped with hieroglyphic characters, which determine the date of this interesting monument of antiquity. They are the Royal Legend of Yemesses V. the Amenophis, Momophis of the Greek writers, the father of the great Sesostris, and the last monarch of Manetho's 19th dynasty of the kings of Egypt; He ascended the throne of the Pharaohs in the year 1493, B. C. The individual, therefore, whose remains are still in so perfect a state of preservation, was the contemporary of Moses, and officiated as incense bearer and scribe to the shrine of the Mandon, at Thebes, in Upper Egypt, more than 3300 years ago.

CORRECTION OF TIME.

It may not, perhaps, be generally known, that those who were born before the 20th of February, 1800, should, after that day, reckon their birth days a day later than before. Those who were living before the alteration of the style, in 1751, may recollect that after that alteration, their birth days were reckoned 11 days later. A further alteration of one day took place in 1800, which would, in the usual course, have been a leap year, but had only 365 days. If we suppose a child to have been born on the 31st Dec. 1796, on the 31st Dec. 1800, he had lived 4 years, of 365 days each; but as every 4th year should have 366 days, the child was not 4 years old till the 1st of Jan. 1801; and a man born 1st of Jan. 1751, was 10 years old on the 12th of Jan. 1761, and was 50 on the 13th Jan. 1801.

DISCOVERY OF QUINIA AND LITHOTRITY.

The Academie des Sciences has adjudged a prize of 10,000 francs, to M. M. Pelletier and Caventou, for their discovery and introduction into use of Sulphate of Quinia, and another prize of 10,000 francs, to M. Civiale, for having been the first to practice lithotritry, on the living body, and for having successfully operated by his method, on a great number of persons afflicted with the stone in the bladder.

INK SIMILAR TO CHINA INK.

Mr. Fontenelle says, that an ink, equal in colour and goodness to China or India Ink, may be made by dissolving six parts of isinglass in twelve of water, one part of Spanish liquorice in two of water, mixing the solutions whilst warm, and incorporating with them one part of best ivory black, using a spatula, and adding but small portions at once. When the mixture is complete, it is to be heated in a water bath, until so much water is evaporated as to leave a paste which may be moulded into any required form, and then the drying completed.

THE GATHERER.

[From the Philadelphia Mercury.]

THE SPEECH OF SOLOMON SOUTHWICK.

DONE INTO BLANK VERSE.

Believing, gentlemen, that when the people
Express their will spontaneously, that then
It is expressed correctly, and so forth,
And knowing that your compliments are just
Unto my talents and my modest merit,
However I may hesitate, by Jove!
I won't refuse to be your Governour.

True, I'm not rich, but that's no obstacle,
I'll stick to business and not cut a swell,
People who dine with me shall dine on codfish
And drink small beer, like plain republicans,
I shall economize, and thus be able
To live upon my salary as Governour.

In justice to myself I must aver
I have not sought this honour, and they lie
Who say that I intrigued for nomination.
The fact is, I received repeated letters
(Postage not paid, I'll thank you to remember
That unpaid letters are d—d impositions)
From the saints at Le Roy and thereabouts,
And though my presence could not be of service
I thought it all important for to go.
Spontaneously they asked me to be Governour,
Reflectingly I answered that I would:
Take the same answer, if you please Batavians!
I run not after fame, fame chases me,
But I run slow—I fear that she will catch me.

Permit me now to add, that if the hearts
Of the good people should incline towards me
And make me Governour, I'll do my duty;
So let's walk in and take some gin and water,
I'll treat all round, by Jove, we'll have a row!
Provided that the landlord will give tick
And wait for pay till I become your Governour.

SOLOMON SOUTHWICK.

This is an excellent quiz of that queer old woman who abuses the masons; and whom some wags have in ridicule nominated for governour of New-York. But Solomon thinks it all gospel.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF ST. PAUL.

This prince of apostles seems to hint concerning himself, that his bodily presence was not calculated to command respect at the first sight: 2 Cor. x. 10. St Chrysostom terms him, "a little man, about three cubits, or four feet and a half in height."

Lucian, or whoever is the author of Philopatris, is supposed to have had St. Paul in view where he introduces "A Galilean (for so the Christians were contemptuously styled) rather bald headed, with an aquiline nose; who travelled through the air into the third heaven."

But of all other writers, Neciphorus Callistus has given us the most circumstantial account of St. Paul's person: "St. Paul was small of stature, stooping, and rather inclinable to crookedness: pale faced, of an elderly look, bald on the head. His eyes lively, keen, and cheerful; shaded, in part, by his eyebrows, which hung a little over. His nose, rather long, and not ungracefully bent. His beard, pretty thick of hair, and of a sufficient length, and like his locks, interspersed with grey."

BEAU BRUMMELL.

When Brummell was the great oracle on coats, the Duke of Leinster was very anxious to bespeak the approbation of the "Emperour of the Dandies" for a "cut" which he had just patronized. The Duke in the course of his eulogy on his Schneider, had frequently occasion to use the words "my coat." "Your coat, my dear fellow," said Brummell, "what coat?" "Why, this coat," said Leinster; "this coat that I have on," Brummell, after regarding the vestment with an air of infinite scorn, walked up to the Duke, and taking the collar between his finger and thumb, as if fearful of contamination—"What, Duke, do you call that thing a coat?"

THE CHIMPANSA.

This enormous monkey inhabits the coast of the Gulph of Guinea. Its height is sometimes greater than that of a man; it has a small beard and mustachios; and is exceedingly pugnacious. It lives in society; at least numerous individuals of the species congregate together, to plunder the negroes and carry off their wives. It builds itself a hut, makes love to the negresses, and drives away those who approach his dwelling, by pelting them with stones. Several young ones have been tamed, and found to possess great imitative talents.

ROMANCE READING.

Perhaps the perusal of romances may, without injustice, be compared with the use of opiates, baneful when habitually and constantly resorted to, but of most blessed power in those moments when the whole head is sore and the whole heart sick. If those who rail indiscriminately at this species of composition were to consider the quantity of actual pleasure which it produces, and the much greater proportion of real sorrow and distress which it alleviates, their philanthropy ought to moderate their critical pride or religious intolerance. [Scott.]

LA BOURDONNAIS.

Few men in the last century were more celebrated or more unhappy than La Bourdonnais, the governour of the Isles of France and Bourbon; by whom indeed those two colonies were almost created, and who, as a reward for his services, was thrown into the Bastille. He there composed a volume of historical memoirs. Handkerchiefs, stiffened with rice-water, soot and the dregs of coffee; and a small coin, bent, slit, and fastened to a wooden skewer, served him for paper, pen, and ink. The grandson of this intrepid sailor has just republished these Memoirs, which contain much curious matter.

LORD BYRON.

During the short time that his lordship was in parliament, a petition, setting forth the wretched condition of the Irish peasantry, was one evening presented, and very coldly received by the "hereditary legislative wisdom." "Ah," said Lord Byron, "what a misfortune it was for the Irish that they were not born black! they would then have had a plenty of friends in both houses."

IRISH WIT.

As Sir Walter Scott was riding (a few weeks ago) with a friend in the neighbourhood of Abbotsford, he came to a field-gate, which an Irish beggar, who happened to be near, hastened to open for him. Sir Walter was desirous of rewarding this civility by the present of sixpence, but found that he had not so small a coin in his purse. "Here my good fellow," said the baronet, "here is a shilling for you; but mind, you owe me sixpence." "God bless your honour!" exclaimed Pat; "may your honour live till I pay you!"

TEMPER.

The great Duke of Marlborough was as remarkable for good temper as for good conduct and bravery. Being one day overtaken with a shower, as he was riding, he called to his servant for his great coat, which the man not immediately bringing, nor giving any answer, he repeated his order; upon which the fellow muttered, "I suppose you'll stay till I have unbuckled it!" The duke instead of being angry, said coolly to a gentleman who was with him, "Now, I would not be of that fellow's temper for all the world."

REASONS FOR EMIGRATING.

A Scotch gentleman, in the warmth of national veneration, was praising Scotland for the cheapness of provisions; a salmon might be bought for saxpence, and a dozen mackerel for twapence. "And pray, sir," asked one of the listeners, "how came you to leave so cheap a country?" "In gude truth, mon," replied the Scotchman, "although fish is plentiful enough, the saxpences and twapences are unco scarce."

THE SAILOR'S REVENGE.

An old tar, who had a garden, the entrance of which had been much impeded by a snarling cur that belonged to a person in his neighbourhood, was observing to a friend, that the enemy had not been there that day: "And don't you think he'll be here again by and by?" asked his friend: "No, by —," replied the tar, "for when he was here last night I cut his rudder away," showing at the same time the dog's tail, that he had cut off, "and I'll be d—d," added he, "if he comes here any more, now that he has got nothing to steer with."

POPULAR TALES.

[From "Whimwhams."]

THE MYSTERIOUS MANSION.

A LEGEND OF THE NORTH END.

"A made a finer end, and went away, an it had been any christom child; 'a parted even just between twelve and one, e'en at turning o' the tide."—Dame Quickly.

Many years ago, there stood on the upper horn of Moon Street, and not more than a stone's throw from Frizzel Square, a low, beetle-browed mansion, bearing indubitable marks of antiquity. The moss covered its dilapidated roof; the drapery of the spider and the moth hung in thick festoons about its windows; and the melancholy swallow annually built her nest under its eaves. Unlike the dwelling-houses of modern days, it belied not into the street to attract the admiration of the vulgar; but chose rather to retire from the public eye, and enjoy a halcyon repose in the quiet neighbourhood of a congregation of pig-sties. Its whole appearance was that of isolated age, shrinking from the folly and bustle of the world, to muse in silence on its wasting strength and increasing years.

The date of this venerable building baffled the memories of the most pains-taking old women of the time. Granny Scraggs, who had talked away her sight and hearing in Deacon Quiddle's chimney, fairly owned it was erected "before her day." Doctor Hodgepodge, a grey-headed bachelor, who had worn a pair of leather small clothes out of the recollection of the generation about him, remembered being measured there for his freedom suit; which was full fifty years ago, come the season for string-beans. "I recollect it," he used to say, "as if 'twas yesterday. The tailor was James List, a yellow-haired man, who was so corpulent he could hardly sit on the bench. Bless me, how time does pass!" In fine, it was one of those pestilent old mansions, to be found in most ancient places, which afford matter of eternal conjecture to the prying blockheads of the neighbourhood.

It is not to be supposed that such a mysterious edifice should be without a corresponding occupant. To repeat one half of the stories that were told of old Haggelwetter would exhaust the lungs of a town crier. He was a grisly old Dutchman, that drank more gin and smoked more tobacco than was necessary to perfume the atmosphere for a league—and then he would swear—bless my soul! if his oaths had only been uttered in intelligent English, the very building would have trembled so as to topple down upon his head. And then, too, he had been tumbled about on the salt sea so long as to have lost the mastery of his legs; and he was as likely to stagger in one direction as another, in spite of his will. Moreover, it was said he had been a sinful freebooter, who had mortgaged his soul to the devil for more than it was worth, and there was no telling how much gold he had stowed away in sly corners about the old building. But then he was a tremendously fierce old fellow, and wore such a threatening pair of whiskers, that nobody dared to venture within pistol-shot of his house; nay, his very name, whispered after candle light, made one tremble like a gravedigger at the sight of a ghost.

It is a sage remark, that Time, though it can do every thing else, is unable to stop people's tongues. One generation of talkers passeth away, and another cometh to take the word out of their mouths. Though a man should exist to eternity, he would never outlive the bad opinion of his neighbours. Thus was it with old Haggelwetter. Not even his fiery whiskers could repress the voice of scandal. As he advanced in years, he also increased in bulk. He was naturally thick set and puffy; but he now seemed blowing up like a bladder. Folks noticed this, and predicted he would eventually explode like a torpedo. "He is," they said, "in his sinfulness like a corn that is parching before the fire; he will swell and swell, and anon go off in a tremendous puff! It is astonishing, mankind will bring upon them such judgements, by dealing with Satan!"

The usual place where the character of old Haggelwetter was discussed, was the shop of Solomon Soper, a famous blood-letting barber; and the time, towards the close of a drowsy summer's day. Here the blacksmith, the sexton, the skipper of the Winnismit ferry boat, and old Dozy, the watchman, would sit and spin out their tedious tales until it really seemed as if they did not think how time was wearing away. Deacon Quiddle, also would occasionally offer a sententious remark on the subject, as the barber elaborately adjusted his queue; and as for Master Solomon, he would fret and chatter about it all day long. It seemed to be the primary object of his existence, occupying all his time, and absorbing all his faculties, to grumble at the mysterious wealth of Haggelwetter and to bewail his own poverty.

I doubt whether there was ever such a snarling, discontented barber as Solomon Soper in the whole world. His thin, weasel face, his ungainly form, his fractious disposition—all were remarkable. There is in the profession of shaving, something that warms the heart, while it elevates the understanding; it will smooth the asperities of an irascible temper, and relapse the grim features of a misanthrope into a grin of universal suavity. But it was ineffectual with Solomon. Avarice, like a worm, had eaten into his heart and withered him up like a dried hazel-nut. Envy and bile had yellowed him like a quince, and made him as sour and as crabbed. His eternal fretfulness was past endurance. The dulness of the times, the niggardliness of customers, the mystery of Haggelwetter, excited continual murmurs. He would declaim on these grievances, in passing his razor over the throats of his customers, with such a frenzied vehemence, that, in trembling alarm, they would try to soothe him by the promise of double remuneration for his labour. In these transports, razors, soap, pimples, or even throats, appeared to him of no consequence. It grew at last to be almost as much as a man's life was worth to sit down in his chair.

Perhaps this consideration operated with others to reduce the custom of his shop. Perceiving his business decline, he became more and more penurious and passionate. He abstained altogether from the use of soap, alleging that hot water was preferable to lather for softening the beard. To this, the unfortunate occupants of his chair grinned a melancholy assent—they did not dare to do otherwise. He also substituted candle-ends for pomatum, and rye-meal for hair-powder; and finally ceased to sharpen his razors, or to wash his napkins, because they wore out so fast. It was outrageous—it was intolerable—his customers were nearly flayed alive!

But while he harassed the nerves, and scarified the visages of his friends, he was not more easy with himself. Continual murmuring and complaint had worn upon him until he was as poor as a snake. He was like a barber that had talked himself to the very edge of the grave. What had he to live for? His shop was deserted, his customers were continually dropping away, and he was nearly distracted. To be sure, old Haggelwetter stuck to him, but the time might come when even his extensive chin would be withdrawn. In fine, he sunk into the deepest despondency, and would spend whole hours in melancholy anticipation of the period, when himself, his brush and his razor, would be left in the bleak world alone.

One night he was sitting in his shop buried in a profound reverie. Never before had he felt so depressed and forlorn. A long day had passed away without depositing in his pocket a single penny; and he had stormed and raged until he sunk down in a state of exhaustion. His head leaned back on the chair; his eyes were half closed; and his whole frame was relaxed and powerless. It was towards the close of autumn, when the crickets chirp in their shrillest tones, and an occasional gust of wind, will sweep around the house, and moan plaintively in the key-hole for admittance. It was, in fact, the appropriate season for reveries and visions.

As Solomon Soper sat musing in his chair, it seemed to him as if some wonderful change had taken place before him. His shop had gradually assumed the appearance of the interior of a church; the black crickets which had hopped about the floor were transformed into human beings, dressed in the sable habiliments of mourners, who formed a funeral procession, and slowly marched up the grand aisle, raising the solemn anthem for the departed. How full, how deep, how rich was the volume of harmony that swelled on his ear! But for whom was the requiem? A melancholy presentiment filled the soul of Solomon. Was it for himself? Or had the jaws of death snapped up another of his customers? He was alarmed. Meanwhile the procession reached the centre of the church; the chant ceased; the velvet pall was uplifted; but he strained his eyes in vain to read the inscription on the coffin lid. As he gazed still more sharply, the spectacle slowly faded away, and he found himself standing alone in his shop. A huge winding sheet was on the point of extinguishing his candle. He snuffed the light with his fingers. The bell struck twelve. Soon after a knocking was heard at the door. It slowly opened and a muffled figure entered, which proved to be the black domestick of Haggelwetter. It had always been the private opinion of Solomon Soper that this character was old Clawfoot himself in disguise.

"The old smoker is dead," she said in a hoarse whisper.

The unfortunate barber clapped his hand quickly to his forehead and staggered back. "What!" he cried in a tone sharp even to fierceness, "my last customer gone!" He wrung his hands in agony of grief. "None of your antics, Master Barber," croaked the hag with a sneer of derision. "He is gone to his place; I have laid him out and called up Deacon Quiddle to make him a coffin. He must be buried at low water mark before the change of tide. And hark you! See that you come speedily with your tools and shave him for the last time." She slammed the door and left the barber to his cruel reflections.

It was long past the hour of midnight, when the wretched Solomon started on his melancholy errand. As he closed the door, his eyes fell on that party-coloured staff, the mysterious ensign of his profession. It shone in the dim light, like a spectre waiting as if to marshal him unto the dwelling of the dead. This appalling idea haunted him in his progress through the streets; and more than once, he cast his eyes over his shoulder, expecting to behold it stalking at his heels.

Arrived at the place of destination, he paused a moment to wipe the drops of terror and fatigue that started upon his brow. With a trembling hand he lifted the latch and entered. The black domestick was crouched down in a corner of the kitchen chimney, moaning and muttering to herself. All the diabolical stories he had heard of the mansion and its inmates thronged on his memory at the sight. His countenance turned to a deadly paleness; his knees smote together with fear; and he essayed in vain to speak; he could not utter a word. An accidental turn of the head discovered him to the hag. She arose, and without saying a word, ushered him to the fatal chamber, set down the light and withdrew.

There is something in the visit of a barber to the couch of death, that is calculated to arouse all the tender sensibilities of the breast. To enter the silent room, to approach the cold and extended form, to gaze on the unconscious features of one he had known in joyous life, cannot but excite the most saddening emotions. It is beyond the power of language to describe; nothing but the warm imagination of the young and susceptible, can conceive what pangs of anguish rend the bosom of the barber, when, for the last time, he takes an old friend by the nose!

With more than ordinary sensibility, Solomon Soper gazed around on the scene of desolation before him. The hour, the place, the occasion, all urged their commingled terrors upon his imagination. A ruinous chamber, faintly perceptible by a flickering lamp; a dreary stillness, disturbed only by the sighing of the wind, or the squeaking and gibbering of the rats behind the wainscot; a stiffened corpse, waiting, from his hand, the last sad office of his profession. His teeth chattered at the spectacle. He wished to retreat, but some mysterious power, like fascination, drew him toward the remains of his departed friend.

With a noiseless step he approached the solitary couch. He uncovered that countenance upon which it had been his happiness to operate for so many years; and which now, would shrink beneath his razor no more. It was necessary to make a great effort. With a trembling hand he softly held the nostril of the body, whilst with the other he applied the blade. Just then he was startled by a singular noise. His heart was in his mouth. He paused and looked around. At this awful moment the body slowly opened its eyes and fixed them upon him with a hideous stare. It appeared to turn the barber into stone. Breathless, motionless—he stood like a marble statue. His very soul seemed escaping with the glance which he fixed upon the corpse.

"Tausand deyvils! Let go my nose!" roared a voice of thunder.

The barber turned a somerset of fifteen feet in the air, and dropped on the floor as dead as a sturgeon.

This affair made a wonderful talk at the North End, and served to bring the old mansion into still worse repute. Doctor Hodgepodge would never believe that poor Solomon came within the house by mortal means; and, to his latest day, would shake his wig when he heard old Haggelwetter bluster about "der tam mat parber dat come to shave him in dis sleeps."

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

THE LAIRD OF MACNAB'S OPINION OF THE RUSSIANS.

[From the London Literary Gazette.]

Our veteran chief was once in company with a young officer who had lost his leg in the disastrous attack on Bergen-op-Zoom. He was a remarkably fine young man; and being about six feet high, he attracted much sympathy from the laird, who had a sovereign contempt for all diminutive personages. Having surveyed the maimed hero for a great length of time, he muttered within his teeth,—"A deefvish fine fallow, by the L—d! and nae doot o' gude Heeland blude" (which was the case), and then proceeded—"Hoo lost ye the leg, my fine fallow! what wanchancy* ball plaid ye that d—ble plisky?†" "At Bergen-op-Zoom, Macnab; a grape-shot did the busines," was the reply.—"And a deevil o' a business, too, my fine fallow. My auld friend Lyndoch was confoundedly oot in that concern: after driving the poor fusinlest bodies of Frenchmen over the Priyan (qy. Pyrenean!) craigs, and chasing, and rugging, and worrying the creatures, like sae mony frightened sheep, it was a meeserable conclusion he made o't, for an auld pawky offisher like my friend Balgowan. But let us hear a' about it, my fine fallow,—let us hear a' about it, my fine fallow." After describing the attack and its failure, the youthful martialist went on to say,—"It was cursedly hard, after all; for within a mile or two of the place were stationed three hundred Russians, with whose assistance we must have carried the fort; but Sir Thomas, no doubt, thought there was no need for them, and wished the British to have all the glory of the achievement. These Russians (added the young soldier) were as fine a body of men as I ever clapt my eyes on. When these gallant fellows found that their services would not be required against the general enemy, they grew frantick with rage, and you might have seen them beating their fire-locks to pieces on the ground. D—me! it was the toss-up of a halfpenny, whether I would have headed such a set of brave souls, or an equal number of our own kilted lads." This was more than enough to put the chief into a perfect frenzy. "Haud you there, sir—haud you there, sir;—ye have said a d—d deal mair than ye can mak amends for, were ye to live as lang as auld Methuselah. It's doonright blasphemy, by the L—d! What, sir, wad ye ever, in ae breath o' your unhallowed jaws, even‡ oor glorious lads o' the hill and the heather, whilk are a marvel to the hail world, to the oily bastes o' Russians!—A wheen bastely cannibals, meeserable wretches, wha, till they cam west, an' be d—d to them, had naething to cram their craving gude-fornaething kytes wi, but stinking, stranded whales, or an orra sealgh, whilk was a perfect godsend to them. Bonny vivres, by the L—d! I mind weel the time, about twenty year bygane, a cheeld ca'd Admiral Siniavin, or some ither cursed name, cam into the Frith wi' a squadron o' these monsters amang men. Dootless it was a veesitation for oor sins. It was the eleventh plague o' Egypt, sir. Had Pharo' set een on them for a single moment, he wad hae let the Eesralites gang about their business without a single cheep.* Whatever they laid hand on, was momentarily turned into ulve;† and mair than that, they were a perfect abomination wi' vermin. I was ae day taking a dander along Leith shore, when I saw one of the loathsome brutes gang into a kanler's shop, and buy a bawbee bap‡ and spying a barrel o' ulve, in he droeps the bap, and sookit it as ye wad do a jergonel peer. Sune after it pleased Providence to veesit poor Edinburgh and its bounds wi' thae creeshy tykes, a' the lamps in Leith Walk and ither places gade oot, without any veesible reason. A' the folk were bumbazed|| about it, and auld wives thoct that Sathau was playing cantrips wi' the lights. Some were knock-it doon, and ither got off wi' their pockets turned inside oot. And what was the cause o' a' this hobbleshaw, think ye? What! but the infernal oily bastes o' Russians. They were caught speeling§ up the lamp-posts and taking oot the cruizes and drinking the ulve, wick and a'. Ane o' the monsters happened to break his ill-faur'd neck. Burying sic a brute was oot o' the question, ye may weel suppose; so they gave him up to Doctor Monro, who unco fain to get ha'd o' him, as a kind o' nondescrip. By my saul, sir, I was tald by one o' the phesical lads, that when they cam to disseek him, the moment they put the knife into his carcass, he ran doonright train ulve. (With immense exultation) What think ye noo o' your Russians, sir! are they o' any use on God's earth, think ye, but to lunt¶ like tar barrels in a general illumination?"

SAGACITY OF THE ELEPHANT.

From the Edinburgh Philosophical Magazine.

An elephant was intrusted, at the age of two or three years, to a young man who took care of it, and who taught it various exercises, which he made it repeat for the amusement of the publick. It rendered an entire obedience to its master, and felt a lively affection for him. Not only did it submit, without the smallest hesitation, to all his commands, but it was even unhappy in his absence; it repelled the advances of every other person, and seemed to eat with a kind of regret when its food was presented to it by a strange hand.

So long as this young man was under the eyes of his father, the proprietor of the elephant, whether the influence of the family restrained him, or age had not yet developed his bad propensities, he conducted himself with propriety towards the animal entrusted to his care; but when the elephant came into the possession of the royal menagerie, and the young man who was taken into its service was left to himself, things became changed. He gave himself up to dissipation, and neglected his duties; he even went so far in his moments of drunkenness, as to strike his elephant. The latter from being habitually cheerful, became melancholy and taciturn in so much as to be thought unwell. It still however obeyed, but no longer with that briskness which showed that all its exercises were regarded by it as amusements; signs of impatience were even sometimes manifested, but they were immediately repressed.

It was obvious that very different feelings were combating within, but the situation so unfavourable to obedience to which this violent state reduced it, did not less contribute to excite the discontent of its keeper. It was in vain that the most positive orders were given to this young man never to strike his elephant, and that he was made to see that good treatment alone could restore the docility of the animal. Mortified at having lost his authority over the elephant, and especially at not going through his exercises with the same success as formerly, his irritation increased, and one day being more unreasonable than usual, he struck his animal with so much brutality, that the latter goaded to the utmost, uttered such a cry of rage, that its terrified master, who had never before heard it emit such a terrible roar, ran off precipitately: and it was well for him, for henceforth the elephant would not so much as suffer him to come near it; at the mere sight of him it became furious, and all the means which afterwards were employed in order to inspire it with better feeling, were ineffectual. Hatred supplid the place of love; indocility succeeded to obedience; and, as long as this animal lived, these two feelings predominated in it.

THE DEATH OF KING JOHN.

Extracted from an old black-letter volume, entitled "The Abridgement of the Acts and Monuments of Martyrs, from the earliest period of Christian suffering to the time of Queen Elizabeth, our gracious lady, now reigning," printed in her reign.

In the yere 1216, King John was poisoned, as most writers testify, at Swinsted Abbey, by a monk of that abbey, of the order of Cisterians, or St. Bernard's brethren, called Simon of Swinsted. The monk did first consult with his abbot, shewing him what he minded to do, alleging for himself the prophecy of Caiphas, 11th of John, saying, it is better that one man die, than the whole people perish. I am well content, saith he, to lose my life, and so become a martyr, that I may utterly destroy this tyrant. With that the abbot did weep for gladness, and much commended his fervent zeal. The monk then being absolved of his abbot for doing this fact, went secretly into the garden, on the back side, and finding there a most venomous toad, did so prick him and press him with his penknife, that hee made him vomite all the poison that was within him; this done, he conveyed it into a cup of wine, and with a flattering and smiling countenance he sayeth to the king, "If it shall please your princely majesty, here is such a cup of wine as you never drank better in your life time. I trust this wassall shall make all England glad," and with that he drank a great draught thereof, and the king pledged him; the monk then went out of the house to the back, and then died, his bowels gushing out of his belly, and had continually from henceforth three monks to sing mass for him, confirmed by their general charter. The king, within a short space after, feeling great grief in his body, asked for Simon, the monk; answer was made he was dead. "Then God have mercy on me," said the king; so went he to Newark-upon-Trent, and there died, and was buried in the cathedral church at Worster, in 1216, the 19th day of October, after having been much feared with the clergy 19 years, 6 months, and a day.

SINGULAR PROGNOSTICKS.

On the eve of the day of the assassination of Julius Cæsar, the temple of Jupiter Stator trembled to its foundation, and an enormous piece of rock fell from the height of the capitol, and carried with it a Roman standard bearer, who was on guard at the opening of the road.

The Generals of Alexander the Great noticed, that on the morning of the death of this great captain, the armour which he wore at the passage of the Granicus and the battle of Arbela, perspired all over, and exhaled a smell like that of a dead body.

Every year on the anniversary of the battle of Marathon, a day of victory and liberty for the Greeks, there was heard in the plains where the battle was fought, a great clashing of arms, and a noise as of the shouts of persons rousing each other to the combat.

Dessaix, on his departure for the campaign of Italy, on his return from Egypt, said to his friends who were congratulating him upon the new laurels he was going to gather,—"You will not, perhaps, see me, the bullets are no longer our friends." The day of Marengo was the anniversary of one of his victories in Upper Egypt.

The day of the violent death, or rather of the assassination of Charles XII. they experienced at Stockholm a hurricane more dreadful than any which had occurred within the memory of man. The arms of Sweden placed over the door of the Swedish Ambassador, at London, also fell with a crash.

Duguesclin, on advancing to lay siege to Randan, fell from his horse, and his constable's sword, which he then held in his hand: buried itself so deep in the earth, that it required a powerful effort to draw it out. His bier was decorated with the keys of the conquered towns.

On the day of the entry of the Russians, Austrians, and Prussians, into Paris, the great branch of the tree under which Marechal Catinat lay buried at St. Cratien, fell with a loud noise.

The Prince of Navarre (afterwards Henry the 4th) while playing at dice with several personages of Charles the 9th's Court, on the eve of St. Bartholomew, observed several drops of blood fall on the cloth, which spread consternation among the players.

The mother of Varus, a Roman lady of the highest distinction, on the day of her son's defeat, perceived large tears to fall from his bust. A fearful eclipse foretold to Rome and to Augustus the massacre of his legions and the first personages of his state.

Gustavus Adolphus, when young, received from a lady whom he much loved, an iron ring, which he never allowed to leave him. It was composed of seven circles, which formed the letters of his two names. Seven days before his death it was taken from him without his perceiving this extraordinary theft.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1828.

Erratum. Our readers will be astonished to find the "Laird of Mac Nab's opinion of the Russians" under the head of "Arcana of Science" yet there may be much scientific lore drawn from it by a proper perusal. It is however nulium arcanum that there was a blunder committed in making up our first form, for which we hope our generous patrons will exercise their indulgence towards us by reducing the aforesaid article to their own notions of science.

The article in our last under the caption of The Gunpowder Plot was not original in our paper, as the appearance would seem to indicate. It was among the unpublished matter prepared for the Amulet, and appeared in the London Mirror, from which we copied it. The due credit was accidentally omitted.

The October and November numbers of Hone's Table Book, the January numbers of the London Mirror, and London Literary Gazette, and Artiss' Magazine for February, have all been received at this office, during the last week.

Post masters and secretaries of chapters and lodges are requested to act as our agents.

LEIGH HUNT. The Reminiscences of Lord Byron, lately published by this outrageously ungrateful pretender to literary parts, we are gratified to hear, meet with their merited contempt from the literary amateurs of Great Britain. We take Leigh Hunt for one of that class who care not a fig for either the esteem or ill will of the good and great, if they can but make a noise, and draw for a season some small portion of the publick attention. We know that the noble poet has his enemies, even on this side the Atlantick; but we can maintain our position when we state that no man ever attentively read his whole works, without being strongly convinced of his claims to immortality as a poet. We know many who dislike him and his poetry so inveterately that they have never read a line! Such judges will be pleased no doubt with the "little bow-wows" of Leigh Hunt; but even in these, if they have a spark of candid penetration, they will discover that his attacks are dictated by an illiberal and vindictive meanness, wholly unworthy the character of a historian. Some very appropriate strictures in the London Literary Gazette of January 26, convince us that, however Mr. Hunt may succeed with the vulgar, the intelligent class of his countrymen will treat him with the contempt he deserves.

In the London Times the following bitter sarcasm has appeared,—supposed to be from the pen of Mr. Thomas Moore. We think the article carries sufficient proof of the authorship to silence every doubt. Mr. Moore is about publishing a biographical notice of the noble bard, in which we may hope to see this little petulant cynick soundly basted.—The present castigation is severe, but no more than every admirer of the splendid talents of Byron will pronounce honest and just.

The "Living Dog" and the "Dead Lion."

Next week will be published (as "Lives" are the rage) The whole Reminiscences, wondrous and strange, Of a small puppy-dog, that lived once in the cage Of the late noble lion at Exeter 'Change.

Though the dog is a dog of the kind they call "sad," 'Tis a puppy that much to good breeding pretends; And few dogs have such opportunities had Of knowing how lions behave—among friends.

How that animal eats, how he moves, how he drinks, Is all noted down by this Boswell so small; And 'tis plain, from each sentence, the puppy-dog thinks That the lion was no such great things after all.

Though he roared pretty well—this the puppy allows— It was all, he says, borrowed—all second-hand roar; And he vastly prefers his own little bow-wows To the loftiest war-note the lion could pour.

'Tis, indeed, as good fun as a Cynick could ask, To see how this cockney-bred setter of rabbits Takes gravely the lord of the forest to task, And judges of lions by puppy-dog habits.

Nay, fed as he was (and this makes it a dark case) With sops every day from the lion's own pan, He lifts up his leg at the noble beast's carcass, And—does all a dog so diminutive, can.

However, the book's a good book, being rich in Examples and warnings to lions high bred, How they suffer small mongrelly curs in their kitchen, Who'll feed on them living, and foul them when dead.

We shall say but little more of this sacrilegious attempt to rise into notice by disturbing the hallowed peace of the dead. If those who read this libellous publication do not find enough, in the work itself, to establish the writer's claim to the unlimited exercise of sovereign hypocrisy, we offer the following lines, selected from an epistle, composed, written, and inscribed to the now abused Byron, by this veritable Leigh Hunt, when the former was just departing for Italy and Greece.

"And so adieu, dear Byron, dear to me
From many a cause disinterestedly:—
First, for unconscious sympathy, when boys,
In friendship, and the Muse's trying joys:—
Next for that frank surprise, when Moore and you
Came to my cage like wabblers kind and true,
And told me, with your arts of cordial lying,
How well I looked when you both thought me dying:—
Next for the rank worn simply, and the scorn
Of those who trifle with an age free born:—
For early storms on Fortune's basking shore,
That cut precocious ripeness to the core:—
For faults unhidden, other's virtues owned;
Nay, unless Cant's to be at once enthroned,
For virtues too, with whatsoever blended,
And e'en were none possessed, for none pretended;
Lastly for older friends—fine hearts, held fast
Through every dash of chance, from first to last:—
For taking spirit as it means to be,—
For a stretched hand, ever the same to me,—
And total glorious want of vile hypocrisy.

Adieu, adieu:—I say no more.—God speed you!
Remember what we all expect, who read you."

Now, readers, peruse the vile and contemptible language of this same panegyrist, (for we will not disgrace our columns, even with a single extract,) and judge for yourselves. We will say no more. We are ashamed of the prevailing publick character, both literary and moral, that so much has been said. Far more honourable would it be, to suffer such impotent sallies of spleen, and venomous malignity to go their own way to oblivion:—not even giving them the honour of a castigation. So long as the splendid numbers of "Childe Harold," and the "Corsair," are preserved from the fate which must certainly befall the "little bow-wows" of Leigh Hunt, no envy can reach the sleeping Byron,—no calumny can injure him.

ELISHA ADAMS. Few of our readers probably have ever heard of the pretended disappearance of this man, which has been so pathetically echoed from one anti-masonick paper to another, ever since its first appearance in the Rochester Anti-Masonick Enquirer. Probably owing to the discredit which such a source must attach to any statement of the kind, having the misfortune to issue from it, the assertion was scarcely noticed by readers, and not even copied into such papers as pursue a course over which they are anxious to preserve even the appearance of truth. It is doubtful whether the mysterious statement would ever have been thought worthy of a serious refutation, had it not succeeded with the executive of the state of New-York, so far as to find place in his late message to the senate on the Morgan affair. We hope, for the honour of his reputation, as an officer of the state, and a man of judgement, that he will not again allow himself to be so palpably hoaxed, by the artifices of a man, who for the petty purposes of electioneering, has been detected in the eyes of the publick, in the sacrilegious attempt to disguise the sacred remains of the dead! We mean Thurlow Weed, editor of the Anti-Masonick Enquirer, and author of this and other experiments upon the publick faith.

It was stated in that professedly libellous print that Elisha Adams, an invalid pensioner, who lived at Fort Niagara, disappeared in August last, while on his way to Canandaigua, as a witness for the people in the Morgan trials. He was said to have had charge of Morgan in the magazine, after Giddings left there for York—that he prepared the boat for the persons who took Morgan into the river, and stood on the shore until they returned without him.

Knowing the propensity of these zealots to fabricate such statements, we had our doubts whether any such person ever had existed as described in this Adams. But we were disappointed. For once they have only imputed fictitious actions to a real individual; in other instances they have produced both persons and actions from nonentity.

In the Vermont Patriot of March 24, we have the complete refutation of every item of the statement, respecting his mysterious disappearance. He is now living with his brother, in Brookfield, Orange county, in Vermont, and states that he voluntarily left the country for the purpose of visiting his friends in that vicinity, and shall return with no less freedom: and further declares that he knows nothing relative to Morgan, except what he has learned from the newspapers. The editor of the Patriot says,—"Should any person feel disposed to communicate with him, we have no doubt, a letter addressed to him at Brookfield, Orange county, Vermont, post paid, will receive due attention." So much for this hoax!

Now we ask, who is this Edward Giddings? Shall he be allowed to throw firebrands among the people of this state, when by his own testimony he is the nearest implicated in the murder, of any one whose name has yet appeared before the publick? He says that Morgan was drowned; he endeavours to fix it on one and another with the same success, and yet he runs at large, and not one suspects him. Any person guilty of the misrepresentations already fathered upon him, would not hesitate in our opinion to commit any crime. Why does he run at large? We call upon the honour of the police of the west for a reply.

We have received, from Jamestown, Chataque county, a communication over the signature of "Fair Play," intended as an answer to the remarks of our correspondent "Naked Truth." Instead of an answer, it appears to us a series of quibbling questions,—calling our Vermont friend any thing but a good christian,—and accusing him of penning his article to attack the Baptist denomination. Naked Truth, we doubt not, is able to give him satisfaction; but it would require more patience than most unregenerate men are possessed of, to answer even the unanswerable questions,—let alone those that were never written to be answered. We considered his article not in the least degree militant against the Baptists, as a church. He advanced nothing, we believe, but what is the candid faith of the majority of that denomination, both here, and to the east of this,—nothing but what they hold every where, when free from the extraneous operation of politicks, or some other power, altogether foreign to the government of Him who declared that his kingdom was not of this world.

Fair Play would have played more fairly with us, had he been courteous enough to pay the trifle which came very improperly taxed to us, on the face of his letter, in the shape of postage.

JOHN-BULL-ERY. The London Literary Gazette makes a doleful lament for the present state of American commerce and credit; and why?—because, forsooth, by Cornfield's Lottery Argus, the editor discovers that there are no fewer than one hundred and forty seven broken banks in the United States! Add to this five columns of altered, counterfeit, and spurious bank notes, and the poor editor's "voice sticks to his jaws," as Virgil says? There are probably from 500 to 800 incorporated banks in the United States. Of this number, the list spoken of, to say the least, must contain all the failures of that kind for ten or fifteen years past. The same must be the case with the bank note table, if the table be any thing like a perfect one. Now we have very reasonable doubts whether any other nation on earth, with half the commerce of these republics, can present so good a proof of a prospering commerce, or an established credit. We must excuse the London editor for his alarm; for we have no doubt from his fears that he believed that all these banks had broken, and all this trash been let out upon the publick, in the space of a single fortnight!

DRAMATICK DINNER. A dinner in honour of the drama was lately given at Baltimore, of which the papers of that city speak in the highest terms. Among the toasts given on the occasion we select the following.

Vocal Science.—The warble of the nightingale, the coo of the dove, the call of the trumpet, the inspiration of the cymbal, the exploit of the hero, the victory of patriotism, all, all spring to thy invocation.

The Memory of George F. Cooke.—He who taught man the great lesson "know thyself," deserves to be ever remembered as a publick benefactor.

Mr. Forrest.—The ancients worshipped their deities in consecrated groves—we offer the tribute of our adoration to the muse of tragedy in a Forrest.

Mrs. Knight.

For "such a Night as this Let all the number of the Stars give light."

The collection of amateurs present may render needless the hackneyed term, "interspersed with appropriate songs." Musick was however not the least enlivening part of the festivities.

A BITE. We notice a translation from the Spanish in the last New-York Mirror, purporting to be translated for that paper, which we believe appeared more than two years ago in the Edinburgh Review. Editors of literary papers cannot be too cautious in the inspection of offered communications; there is perhaps a more extensive gang of literary thieves abroad than even of counterfeiters. We do not say this because we think their plagiarisms can essentially injure the publick taste; but it is confoundedly vexatious to remember that we have indulged the vanity of a poacher on other men's labours, by becoming his dupe, even for a season.

TABLE TALK.

Mr. Farnham's toast, at the publick dinner given to Mr. Southwick at Batavia, is really a curiosity. "Freemasonry—If the ancient Solomon built it up, may the modern Solomon live to pull it down!" The New-York Morning Courier remarks, that "Solomon of Israel, and Solomon of Albany, bear about as much resemblance to each other, as a chew of tobacco to a tom cat."—A correspondent of the Philadelphia Gazette says, that if congress wish to make wool cheap and plenty, they must pass a law compelling every body to dine on mutton every Wednesday. Boston folks, in the good old time, used to dine upon codfish every Saturday,—not that they preferred that dish to any other, but simply to encourage and support the fisheries.—The following stanza is the closing sentence of the poetical caveat of an illfated or rather illfated husband, in Colerain township, Ross county, Ohio, who warns all persons, in rhyme, "not to trust that frail deceptive fair—my once dear Kate—" in a metrical pro-fusion of thirty lines. He bears the gloomy influence of his perverse stars more like a philosopher than a poet.

"Farewell—a long farewell—to married life—
Cursed be the hour that gave me such a wife,
Who fairest days could cloud with her fierce will.
'And raise a tempest—though the winds were still.'
I'll live alone—henceforth—(a quiet tiller)
And have no more of her, so help me G—d:

On reaching the cockpit, he called aloud to the surgeon,—“Bear a hand here my hearty; the fun's not half over yet, and I must have another touch at the fellows.” One of the sailors having his leg shattered by a ball, submitted to amputation with the greatest indifference; but when the limb was thrown overboard, Jack called out,—“curse your eyes, I'll complain of you to the captain. If you were ordered to throw my leg overboard, you had no right to throw my shoe with it.”

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Monday, March 10. In senate, the day was chiefly spent in committee of the whole, on the statute of limitation, as presented in the revised statutes, chapter IV. of the third part.

In assembly, bills read a third time and passed: to confirm the election of justices in the town of Pendleton; in amendment of the law relative to lotteries, (appropriating avails of licences in Troy to the use of schools); to incorporate the Jefferson county agricultural society; for the relief of T. B. Bigelow; amending the act relative to state prisons; providing for the erection of a fire proof clerk's office in Kings; for the appointment of a canal appraiser in a certain case; to incorporate the Gouverneur high school in St. Lawrence; to abolish the justices court in Schenectady; to authorize the sale of a parsonage lot in West Oswego; to change the name of a family of Roses to that of Smith, and of Isaac Sanders to Isaac P. Voorhees; for the relief of school district No. 3, in Herkimer; to amend the act authorizing T. Hunt to erect a dam in Westchester; to alter the time of meeting of supervisors in Livingston county; to lay out a road from Claverack to the Massachusetts line.

Tuesday, March 11. In senate, bills read a third time and passed: authorizing the commissioners of the land office to sell certain lands to the supervisors of the county of Erie, for the erection of a county poor house; to revive and amend the act to incorporate the Catharine and Spencer turnpike company; to confirm the election of clerk for the county of Seneca.

In assembly, bills read a third time and passed: to erect a new town from parts of Moriah and Minerva; to incorporate the Sullivan county academy; to lay out a road from Bethany, in Genesee, to Lima, in Livingston; to regulate sheriff's fees in Livingston; for the relief of certain justices of the peace; to establish the location of a court house, &c. in St. Lawrence; to increase the capital of the Dutchess Glenham manufacturing company.

Wednesday, March 12. In senate, bills read a third time and passed: to confirm the appointment of certain commissioners to take the proof and acknowledgment of deeds, &c. in the county of Ulster, and for other purposes; to confirm the proceedings of the commissioners of highways of the town of Davenport, in the county of Delaware; to incorporate the village of Oswego.

In assembly, bills read a third time and passed: to incorporate the Granville academy; to amend the act to prevent horse racing; to confirm the doings of commissioners of deeds in the county of Madison; to improve a road in the town of Brasher; to authorize R. M. Curtis to erect a dam across the Genesee river, to provide compensation to publick officers in certain cases; to incorporate the Fall creek flouring and manufacturing establishment at Ithaca; to authorize the removal of a gun house in Binghamton; to extend the jail limits in the county of Yates; to authorize D. C. Case to erect a dam across the Chenango river; to repeal the act for the preservation of fish in Crooked lake; and to settle the claims of Myron Holley, late canal commissioner.

Thursday, March 13. In senate, bills read a third time and passed: relative to the duties of the comptroller, surveyor general and the attorney general; authorizing Nelson J. Beach to erect a toll bridge across the Black river; to amend the act to fix and establish the location of the court house and other publick buildings of the county of St. Lawrence; to alter the time of the annual meeting of the board of supervisors of the county of Livingston; to regulate sheriff's fees in the county of Livingston; to authorize the Glenham company of the town of Fishkill, Dutchess county, to extend their capital; to confirm the election of justices of the peace in the town of Peadleton, in the county of Niagara.

In assembly, bills read a third time and passed: declaring the Owego creek a publick highway; relative to improvements in West-street, New-York; authorizing the Goshen and Wall-Kill turnpike company to surrender their charter; authorizing the raising of money by tax in Sherburne for the building of a town house. The bill to incorporate the Fall creek flouring and manufacturing establishment at Ithaca, was read a third time and lost for want of a constitutional majority.

POETRY.

WOMAN'S HEART.

BY MARY ANN BROWNE.

Alas! that man should ever win
So sweet a shrine to shame and sin,
As woman's heart.— MISS LONDON.

Say, what is woman's heart? A thing
Whence all the deepest feelings spring;
A harp whose tender chords reply
Unto the touch in harmony;
A world whose fairy scenes are fraught
With all the coloured dreams of thought;
A bark that still will blindly move
Upon the treacherous seas of love.

What is its love? a ceaseless stream,
A changeless star, an endless dream,
A smiling flower that will not die,
"A beauty and a mystery;"
Its storms as light as April showers,
Its joys as bright as April flowers,
Its hopes as sweet as summer air,
And dark as winter its despair.

What are its hopes? rainbows that throw
A radiant light where'er they go,
Smiling when heaven is overcast,
Yet melting into storms at last;
Bright cheats, that come with siren words,
Beguiling it like summer birds,
That stay while nature round them blooms,
But flee away when winter comes.

What is its hate? A passing frown,
A single weed mid blossoms sown,
That can not flourish there for long;
A harsh note in an angel's song,
A summer cloud, that all the while
Is lightened by a sun beam's smile,
A passion that scarce hath a part
Amidst the gems of woman's heart.

And what is its despair? A deep
Fever, that leaves no tears to weep;
A wo that works with silent power,
As canker worms destroy a flower;
A viper that shows not it wakes
Until the heart it preys on breaks;
A mist that robs a star of light,
And wraps it up in darkest night.

Then what is woman's heart? a thing
Whence all the deepest feelings spring—
A harp whose tender chords reply
Unto the touch in harmony—
A world whose fairy scenes are fraught
With all the coloured dreams of thought—
A bark that still will blindly move
Upon the treacherous seas of love.

PERSIAN LOVERS.

FROM THE KEEPSAKE.

The sun was in his western chamber,
Sunk on his cloudy ottomans,
All tissue scarlet, gold and amber;
The breezes round him waved their fans;
Below, the twilight tinged the water,
The bee was humming through the roses,
The ring dove told what nature taught her,—
'Tis thus a Persian evening closes.

Who paces with such fairy feet,
Beside that fountain's dewy gushings?
Why does her heart so wildly beat,
Why paint her cheek those crimson flushings?
Why like the fawn from hunters flying,
Those glances through the perfumed grove?
Why panting, weeping, smiling, sighing?—
Thus Persian maidens fall in love.

But see the rustling of the blossoms,—
Like snow a warrior shakes them round him,
And to the loveliest of all bosoms
Swears that its spells for life have bound him.
The turtle o'er them waves his wing;
In silver o'er them smiles the moon;
And still the Persian maidens sing
The loves of Omayn and Meinoun.

SONG.

FROM BAYLEY'S MELODIES.

Oh, no! we never mention her—
Her name is never heard;
My lips are now forbid to name
That once familiar word.
From sport to sport they hurry me,
To banish my regret,
And when they win a smile of me,
They think that I forget.

They bid me seek in change of scene
The charms that others see;
But were I in a foreign land,
They 'd find no change in me.
'Tis true that I behold no more
The valley where we met;
I do not see the hawthorn tree—
But how can I forget?

They say that she is happy now,
The gayest of the gay;
They hint that she forgets her vow—
I heed not what they say.
Like me, perhaps, she struggles with
Each feeling of regret,
But if she loves as I have loved
She never can forget.

THE ELM TREES.

Oh! may these trees be ever green,
Perpetual spring enwreath them,
May bloom on every bough be seen,
And lovely flowers beneath them!
Be fresh each leaf, be strong each form;
No biting winds impair them;
And may the red wing of the storm
Pass ever by, and spare them!
'Twas here in boyhood that I strayed,
When not a care molested;
With her I loved, beneath this shade,
On summer eves, I rested.
I feel those years revive again,
So sweet and far departed—
And thoughts like these are worse than vain,
They mock the broken hearted!

It is a melancholy scene
To view the woodlands yellow,
And Winter's snow, where late serene
Waved Autumn's harvests mellow:
But 'tis a more desponding truth
To feel that we must sever
From all that gave delight to youth,
Despairing, and forever!

As in a mirror, vanished years
This well known view is raising,
With lightning glow the past appears,
As thoughtful I am gazing!
May no rude hands this spot deform,—
No biting winds impair it;
And may the red wing of the storm
Pass ever by, and spare it!

THE CYPRESS TREE.

A slender tree upon a bank
In lonely beauty towers,
So dark, as if it only drank
The essence of the thunder showers;
When birds were at their evening song,
In thoughtful reverie,
I've marked the shadows deep and long,
Outstretching from that cypress tree.
I've thought of oriental tombs,
Of silent cities, where
In many a row the cypress glooms
In token of despair;
And thought, beneath the evening star,
How many a maiden crept
From busy life's discordant jar,
And o'er the tomb in silence wept.
I've thought, thou lonely cypress tree,
Thou hermit of the grove,

How many a heart is left like thee
In loneliness to rove;
When all that charmed the early day,
And cheered the youthful mind,
Have, like the sunbeams, passed away,
And left but clouded skies behind!
Thou wert a token unto me,
Thou stem with dreary leaf,
So desolate thou seemest to be,
That earth is but the home of grief!
A few short years shall journey by,
And then thy boughs shall wave,
When tempests beat and breezes sigh,
Above my head, and o'er my grave!

DOCTOR MONRO.

"Dear doctor, be clever, and throw off your beaver;
Come bleed me, and blister me, do not be slow;
I'm sick and exhausted, my schemes they are blasted,
And driven heels-over-head, Doctor Monro."
Be patient, dear fellow, you foster your fever,
Pray what's the misfortune that bothers you so?
"O, doctor! I'm ruined! I'm ruined for ever!
My lass has forsaken me, Doctor Monro.

I meant to have married and tasted the pleasures,
The sweets, and enjoyments, in wedlock that flow;
But she's taken another, and thwarted my measures,
And fairly confounded me, Doctor Monro."
I'll bleed and I'll blister you over and over;
I'll master your malady ere that I go;
But raise up your head from below the bed cover,
And give some attention to Doctor Monro.

If Flirta had wed you, she would have misled you,
And laughed at your love with some handsome young bean;
Her conduct will prove it; but how would you love it?
"I soon would have lamed her, dear Doctor Monro."
Each year brings a pretty young son or a daughter;
Perhaps you're the father, but how shall you know?
You hug them,—her gallant is bursting with laughter—
"That thought's like to murder me, Doctor Monro."

The boys cost you many a penny and shilling;
You breed them with treasure, with trouble and wo;
But one turns a rake, and another a villain—
"My heart would not bear it, dear Doctor Monro."
The lasses are comely, and dear to your bosom;
But virtue and beauty have many a foe!
O think what may happen—just nipped in their blossom—
"Ah! merciful heaven! cease, Doctor Monro!"

"Dear doctor, I'll thank you to hand me my breeches!
I'm better; I'll drink with you ere that you go;
I'll never more sicken for women or riches,
But love my relations and Doctor Monro.
I plainly perceive, were I wedded to Flirta,
My peace and my pleasures I needs must forego."
—He still lives a bachelor—drinks when he's thirsty—
And sings like a lark—and loves Doctor Monro.

ELEGIACK STANZAS.

FROM THE BOSTON STATESMAN.

Peace to his memory! Tears have flowed for him,
And strong hearts have been wrung with agony!
Can it then be that death hath power to dim
Eyes once so eloquent?—and can it be
That the strong hand is nerveless—that the brow
On which we loved to gaze is laid so low?
Is the warm heart so cold and frozen now,
Never again to heave with passion's throes—
Never again to bound with love and joy?
Are the lips hushed for evermore—whose tone
Of lightness, once, charmed even the careless boy
From his wild sports?—and is this left alone
To tell of what he was—this lifeless form?
Is this the wreck of the mind's majesty?
Ay, he hath long been battling with the storm,
And sleeps at last!—Peace to his memory! JUAN.

NO. 10.

MASONICK RECORD.

It is pretended by some of the political disputants of the day, that Mr. Clay has given his sanction to certain political movements in the western part of this state, calculated to cast a discredit on the masonick institution, of which he is an efficient and prominent member.

We do not in the least doubt that the Morgan affair will be made a strong electioneering instrument against general Jackson, who is well known to be a firm and honourably distinguished brother,—but we do doubt the presumption that Mr. Clay has ever given his counsel or consent, to any such political measure. That he should do it, is in our opinion a wide departure from his known integrity as a politician or a mason; and so long as we hold indisputable evidence in favour of both, we shall lay down as a position, that some dishonest—not to say infamous—intriguers have projected the plan to incorporate the unfortunate fanaticism of the good people at the west with the presidential question,—and by pretending that the measure has the sanction of Mr. Clay, to chalk out a path for their own rise into popular favour.

Some time in the month of March, 1822, a number of eminent masons, while attending to their duties at Washington, as members of Congress, and to other official duties, conceived the idea of forming a general grand lodge of the United States. The idea was not wholly new, having been several times previously agitated; but owing to the languor of leading brethren in the several state grand lodges, the desideratum had not been realized.

A meeting of the members of congress who were masons, and other brethren from different parts of the union, was accordingly called, of which the honourable THOMAS R. ROSS, of Ohio, was appointed chairman, and the honourable WILLIAM DARLINGTON, of Pennsylvania, secretary. At this meeting appropriate resolutions were adopted relating to the projected general grand lodge, and the following brethren were constituted a committee to open a correspondence with the respective grand lodges within the United States, and to take such other measures as they might deem expedient to carry the aforesaid resolutions into effect:—Chief Justice Marshall, of Virginia; Henry Clay, of Kentucky; gen. William H. Winder, of Maryland; William S. Cardell, of New-York; Joel Abbot, of Georgia; John Holmes, of Maine; Henry Baldwin, of Pennsylvania; John H. Eaton, of Tennessee; William W. Seaton, of the District of Columbia; Christopher Rankin, of Mississippi; Thomas R. Ross, of Ohio; Hutchins G. Burton, of North-Carolina, and since governor of that state; and the reverend Thaddeus Mason Harris, D. D. of Massachusetts.

The report of this committee we give our readers entire. It is as a document, not alone valuable for the high authority of its testimony in favour of masonry, but it also contains some truly masonick hints, which every brother will be eager to peruse.

The committee, in complying with the above resolutions, are aware, that a meeting of individual masons, however respectable in number and character, could delegate no regular authority in behalf of the masonick body; and, if they could, it was unnecessary. This paper will, therefore, be understood as it is intended, a proceeding, originating in the necessity of the case, to adopt some mode by which the general views of masons in the different states of the American Union may be ascertained.

The history of the masonick institution shows that, though established among various nations, it was, in each country, confined to a comparatively small number. The jurisdiction exercised by grand lodges, like almost every exertion of power, or of moral influence, was concentrated in different capital cities. The subordinate lodges were few in number, and their connexion with the supreme head was very direct. Till within a recent period, it is believed, no great number of lodges have been united under a single jurisdiction. The art of printing, and other causes, have produced great changes in the condition of the world; and these causes have operated in their full proportion on the society of freemasons. The sphere of civilization is greatly enlarging its boundaries: intellectual attainments, and the influence of moral operations, are taking the place of brute force: known principles and laws are recognized: and the advantages of cultivated reason are shared, by an increased proportion of mankind. Under these circumstances, masonry has been extended, and its lodges so multiplied, as to make their proper conduct a subject of much interest to the friends of the society.

There are two points which at once present themselves, in connexion with the idea of establishing a general grand lodge of the United States. The first is to acquire, in a correspondence with foreign nations, an elevated stand for the masonry of this country; to unite with them in maintaining its general principles in their purity; and, secondly, to preserve, between our own states, that uniformity in work, and that active interchange of good offices, which would be difficult, if not impossible, by other means.

The committee do not presume to instruct their brethren in the nature of an institution in which they have a common interest. They are governed by a few plain considerations, known to all who have attended to the subject.

The antiquity of the masonick society, extending so far beyond all other human associations, seizes the attention, and the mind is naturally impressed with feelings of interest for an institution, transmitted to us through the long train of a hundred ages. Time, which destroys all perishable things, seems to have consolidated the pillars of this moral temple. We contemplate the long catalogue of excellent men, who have been equally the supporters of masonry, and the ornaments of human nature; and, we say, almost unconsciously, that the present generation, with all its lights, must not tarnish the name of an institution, consecrated by so many circumstances, calculated to endear it to the mind of a good man.

Without making invidious comparisons between the United States and other portions of the world, there are some great considerations of responsibility, which our intelligent citizens, accustomed to reflect on the affairs of nations, can not overlook. The masons of the United States, in character as such, have their full share of this moral responsibility. They will consider their institution as one of the great social causes, to allay low-minded jealousies between nations at peace; and in war to mitigate the horrors which it cannot avert.—While they offer their gratitude to a beneficent Providence for their own blessings, they will not be regardless of their obligations to their brethren through the world.

These reflections, drawn from the external circumstances of masonry, are strengthened by the consideration of its intrinsic nature. Its foundation is fixed in the social feelings and the best principles of the human mind. Its maxims are the lessons of virtue, reduced to their practical application. It stands opposed to sordidness; to a jealous or revengeful temper; to all the selfish and malevolent passions: it coincides with the highest motives of patriotism; the most expanded philanthropy, and concentrates all its precepts in reverence to a Divine Creator, and good will to man.

The United States are supposed to contain near 80,000 freemasons. They are generally in the vigour of manhood, and capable of much active usefulness. Notwithstanding the abuses in some places, by the admission of unworthy members, they are, as a body, above mediocrity in character and talent. It becomes an interesting question, how the energies of this body can be best combined, to give effect to the benevolent design of their association.

From causes which need no explanation, the masonick jurisdiction in this country has taken its form from the political division. The modification which it has undergone, from the spirit of our civil institutions, has its benefits, and its defects. Each of our state jurisdictions is supreme within itself. Whatever collisions may exist; whatever abuses; whatever departures from the correct standard, in principle, or in rites; whatever injury to the common cause; there is no mode assigned to obviate the wrongs which it is the interest of all to prevent. There is no provision for a systematic interchange of masonick intelligence. In one or two instances there are two or more grand lodges in the same state, each claiming superiour jurisdiction, and with no acknowledged boundaries between them. Will not these evils increase as our population becomes more dense, unless means be seasonably used to guard against them? Is the difference which now prevails between different states an evil which calls for remedy? Every good mason must wish chiefly for the harmony of the general institution: for the society is so formed, that no particular part, however meritorious by itself, can continue to prosper, if the body at large is brought into disrepute. Is the masonry of our country at present a great arch without a key stone? Is it not in danger of falling? Are not many of the books which are published in the name of the masonick institution, derogatory to its character and interest?

It is not the design of the committee to enter into arguments upon this subject; nor to lay down their own opinions as a guide for those better able to judge; but to proceed to the only duty required of them to perform.

According to the preceding resolutions, the committee are to submit the question, whether it be expedient that a grand lodge of the United States be formed; and, secondly, to request those grand lodges which approve that object, to appoint delegates to meet at Washington, on the second Monday of February next, to take such measures as may be deemed most proper for the organization of such general grand lodge.

It is requested that this letter may not be published in newspapers; but submitted to the several grand lodges, and distributed among masons as a subject concerning the affairs of their own body.

If the information furnished to the committee should render it expedient, perhaps another letter may be forwarded, giving a statement of such facts as may be interesting to be known, previous to a final decision on the course to be taken.

An answer is requested, with a free expression of opinion on the subject of this communication. Such answer may be directed to any member of the committee, or, in particular, to WILLIAM W. SEATON, esq. Washington.

H. G. BURTON,

Why this project never arrived to maturity we do not know. It is probable however that the same languor which has heretofore frustrated similar plans was the obstacle in the way of this. No one who knows and feels the importance of such a measure can raise a single doubt of its utility, and we do believe that when the political schemes of the enemies of Masonry have subsided, the attention of the craft may yet be brought to a profitable consideration of this important topic.

But to return to our first subject, we doubt whether the fact that Mr. Adams is not a member of the mystick brotherhood will weigh much in his favour with the enemies of our institution, when they all know that the members of his cabinet are the major part not only brethren, but of high and honourable standing in the councils of the brotherhood. It is at best a pitiful appeal to the good sense of free citizens, to set before them the merits of candidates for the highest office they can bestow on an individual as being masons or not. Such vile distinctions were never intended to interfere with the politics or the religion of our citizens; but if men are determined to make a political cat's-paw of our professions of faith, let them do it in their own way. Masons will show in the character of citizens, their respect for their rights as individuals; and intolerance will be looked upon by them as the signal for defending, not only the rights of masons, but of all who fall under the persecution of bigots, so far as the constitution will protect them.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

[From the National Intelligencer, March 31.]

The Masonick ceremonies which took place in this city, on Saturday, in honour of the memory of the late governor CLINTON, were amongst the most imposing and solemn which we ever witnessed. The fraternity of the District were joined by the Grand Chapter of Maryland, and the procession which they composed, amounting perhaps, to four hundred, was not only the most numerous, but, in its general appearance, the most respectable and impressive, which has ever been exhibited in this city. The varied and rich clothing of the different orders; the intermixture of the mourning appendages; the solemn strains of two bands of music; the orderly and becoming movement of the long line—combined to give a dignity and solemnity to the scene, highly creditable and appropriate. The publick services of the occasion took place at St. John's Church.

The procession having entered the church and being seated, a full and excellent choir, under the direction of Mr. McDuell, sung the following Hymn, to that noblest and most impressive of all church anthems, "Old Hundred:"

The morning flowers display their sweets,
And gay their silken leaves unfold,
As careless of the noontide heats,
As fearless of the evening cold.

Nipt by the wind's untimely blast,
Parched by the Sun's directer ray,
The momentary glories waste,
The short-lived beauties die away.

So blooms the human face divine,
When youth its pride of beauty shows:
Fairer than Spring the colours shine,
And sweeter than the virgin rose.

Or worn by slowly rolling years,
Or broke by sickness in a day,
The fading glory disappears—
Dwindles, decays, and dies away.

Yet these, new rising from the tomb,
With lustre brighter far shall shine,
Revive with ever-during bloom,
Safe from diseases and decline.

Let sickness blast, let death devour,
If Heaven must recompense our pains,
Perish the grass, and fade the flower,
If firm the word of God remains.

Religious services were then performed by the Rev. William Hawley, Grand Chaplain.

After which, the following ode was sung, to "Pleyel's Hymn:"

Unveil thy bosom, faithful tomb,
Take a new treasure to thy trust,
And give his sacred relics room
To slumber in the silent dust.

Nor pain, nor grief, nor anxious fear,
Invade thy bounds; no mortal woes
Can reach the silent sleepers there,
And angels watch their soft repose.

So Jesus slept, God's dying Son
Passed through the grave, and blessed the bed:
Rest, rest, dear saint, till from His throne
The morning break, and pierce the shade.

Break from His throne, illustrious morn!
Attend, O! Earth, His sovereign word!
Restore thy trust a glorious form,—
He must ascend to meet his Lord.

Samuel L. Knapp, esq. a member of the fraternity, then rose, and delivered an address, of considerable length, on the life and character of the deceased; as honourable to the talents of the orator, as it was to the memory of the eminent citizen whose merits were its theme. We listened to the whole discourse with unmingled satisfaction, and frequently with those sensations of delight, which only deep pathos and true eloquence can call forth.

The address being concluded, the Throne of Grace was again addressed; and

The choir sung the following appropriate anthem, in a style to produce the most thrilling effect on the crowded auditory:

Vital spark of heavenly flame!
Quit, O quit this mortal frame!
Trembling, hoping, lingering, flying:
Oh the pain, the bliss of dying!
Cease, fond nature! cease thy strife,
And let me languish into life.

Hark! they whisper; angels say,
Sister spirit, come away.
What is this absorbs me quite,
Steals my senses, shuts my sight,
Drowns my spirit, draws my breath!
Tell me my soul! can this be death?

The world recedes; it disappears!
Heaven opens on my eyes! my ears
With sounds seraphick ring:
Lend, lend your wings! I mount, I fly!
O grave! where is thy victory!
O death! where is thy sting!

After a benediction, by the Grand Chaplain, the procession was again formed, and returned, the several orders to the places of their respective meetings.

The different grand and subordinate Chapters having re-entered the Masonick Hall, the presiding officer of the Grand Chapter of the District, (under whose order and direction the ceremonies of the day were performed) for himself and his chapter expressed his acknowledgements for the judicious and efficient arrangements of the committee—to his brethren of the Grand Lodge, and brethren and companions, generally, for their co-operation and aid—to the vestry and choir of the church, and the gentlemen composing the amateur bands of music, for their politeness—and, especially, to the Grand Chapter of Maryland, and Washington Lodge of Alexandria, for honouring their companions and brethren of the District, and the occasion, with their presence—and to the orator for his admirable and appropriate address.

VERMONT.

At a communication of Temple Chapter, No. 4 held at Mason's Hall in Bennington, Vermont, on the 6th day of March, 1828, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, that the death of his excellency De

WITT CLINTON, High Priest of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States, is a dispensation of Divine Providence which this Chapter deplore as an irreparable loss to masons, to the nation, and to the world.

Resolved, that this Chapter in testimony of the high sense in which they hold the memory of that distinguished man and mason, will cause the jewels and furniture thereof to be clothed in black, and that the members will wear the customary badge of mourning while in session until the next communication of the Grand Chapter of this state.

Resolved, that the foregoing resolutions be signed by the High Priest, and Secretary, and published.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

OPIUM.

[From a new work on Animal and Vegetable Poison.]

The most important of all the narcotick vegetables, and the one most frequently productive of accidents, is the inspissated juice of the Papaver Somniferum, or, as it has been termed more familiarly, Opium. This article is imported from Persia, Egypt, Smyrna, and other parts of the Levant, and from the East Indies, in cakes from four ounces to a pound in weight, and is prepared from the poppy. Genuine opium is of a reddish brown colour, and possesses a strong, peculiar smell, and a nauseous, bitter, and acrid taste, followed by a slight warmth in the mouth. It dissolves in water, in wine, and in alcohol, and it readily blends with solid substances, thus admitting of a variety of pharmaceutical preparations, so as to meet the views and intentions of the prescribing physician, when used as a remedy. Considered as a medicine, opium may deservedly be ranked among one of the greatest blessings conferred on mankind, since there are few diseases in which it does not afford some relief; many very painful and dangerous maladies it rapidly cures; and in lingering and hopeless cases, it seldom fails to suspend the more violent symptoms, and to render the afflicted patient as easy and as comfortable under his sufferings as the nature of his complaint will admit. When taken or administered as a poison, it has usually been swallowed in its pure solid state, or simply dissolved in wine or spirits under the familiar name of laudanum; and when suicide is decided upon, this poison is often preferred, from the mistaken notion that death will follow without being preceded by pain or a consciousness of its effects; or, in other words, by its producing immediate and fatal sleep, from which the individual can never again be roused. Owing to the resemblance of laudanum in its colour to tincture of rhubarb, and to some other pharmaceutical preparations, (particularly should the bottle in which the article is contained be without a label, or have received an erroneous designation,) it is also not unfrequently taken by mistake; and as the medicines which it resembles are generally nauseous, the whole is commonly swallowed before the error has been detected. In those countries in which opium is produced, and where the prevailing religion prohibits the use of wine, as in Turkey, in the Barbary states, in Egypt, and throughout a large part of Hindoostan and other portions of Asia, opium, by progressive habit, is swallowed in very large proportions in the solid form, to the amount of half an ounce or more each day, without producing any other effect than that of temporary inebriety; and we know of many instances of its being taken with extraordinary freedom in this country by persons who have gradually accustomed themselves to its use. This practice, however, cannot be too sufficiently deprecated; since, by enervating the system, it renders it more susceptible of the attacks of disease, and by accustoming the constitution to its use, it effectually deprives the individual of a remedy, which, when required, is the most efficacious, perhaps, of any in the whole materia medica. Under ordinary circumstances, great circumspection in the administration of this very powerful drug is required, so as to adapt its proportions to the constitution and state of health of the individual for whom it has been prescribed.

IMPROVED PRINTING MACHINE.

[From the Westchester Herald.]

It is with peculiar gratification that we announce to the profession, and to the publick in general, the completion of an improved Printing Machine, invented by Mr. Elijah Brady, and constructed by him, in connexion with the proprietor of this paper, for the purpose of printing the Herald on an enlarged sheet. The improvement is exceedingly simple, and very effective and successful in its operation. The bed with the form is placed upon a frame similar to a table, and is propelled to and fro by means of a crank, passing under an ingenious inking apparatus and a cloth-covered cylinder, by which an impression is produced each way. The inking apparatus consists of rollers, judiciously arranged for the distribution of the ink, and connected with the movement of the bed, by which it is kept in continual motion while the machine is at work. The sheet is placed upon the cylinder, at a proper distance to meet the form, and is drawn in as the cylinder revolves by means of its connexion with the bed; is printed at the junction of the form with the cylinder, and thrown out on the opposite side: so that by the single transition of the form from one side to the other, the ink is conveyed to the types, the sheet is drawn in, and an impression obtained in a moment of time. It is particularly well adapted to the purpose of printing newspapers. This machine has been in operation for a considerable time, and its practicability for the uses of letter press printing we conceive to be fully established. The machine can be worked to advantage by a man and a boy, and will print as fast as the sheets can be placed in a proper position on the cylinder. We do not wish to enter into very close calculation as to the number of impressions that might be produced within a given time, for we know that a great deal depends upon the expertness of the workmen; but we do think that this machine will yield impressions to about three times the rate of the old presses, or perhaps about one thousand sheets an hour. The machine occupies about the same room as the common presses, and may be constructed at about the same price. It is now completed and ready for inspection at this office. Printers are invited to call and see its operation.

The inventor and patentee will be prepared in a short time with his estimate of expense, &c. for constructing these machines; and persons desirous of procuring one or more of them will be promptly furnished.

THE PROPERTIES OF PHOSPHORUS.

The properties of phosphorus are very singular, and created great attention on its first discovery. It has at a temperature of about sixty or seventy degrees, the consistence of wax, but at a lower temperature it is brittle; its colour varies from a deep yellow to white; it has a peculiar smell, somewhat resembling garlic, and if we expose a stick of it, which has been wiped dry, to the air, we observe that it is constantly exhaling alliaceous fumes. There is a very strong analogy between the smell of phosphorus and electricity; and the fumes, which are constantly exhaled from phosphorus, are luminous in the dark with a bluish light. Its specific gravity is seventeen, water being ten; at a temperature of 105 degrees, or thereabouts, it fuses; and at a temperature of from 500 to 600 degrees it boils in close vessels, and rapidly evaporates. It requires to be handled with great caution, because when dry it is apt to inflame with the slightest friction; but the flame of phosphorus will not kindle paper, which is easily accounted for; the fumes of phosphoric acid coat over the paper, and prevent it from coming in contact with the oxygen of the air. The temperature at which phosphorus is said to take fire, is about one hundred degrees; but if it be coated with an oxide of phosphorus, as it generally is, it takes fire very readily at a much lower temperature, and therefore we should be very cautious how we handle it.

NEW COMPOUND RESEMBLING GOLD.

This metallick compound is invented by a gentleman at Leghorn, a friend of T. Appleton, esq. the American consul there, who has sent an account of it with specimens, to Dr. Mease, of New-York, where it has been examined by competent judges. It is of the same weight as gold of 18 carats, and can be made like that of 24. Mr. Appleton's snuff-box is made of it, and is always mistaken for pure gold. At a manufactory of it established at Bologna, metal buttons are made of it at 50 cents per dozen; when new they resemble the most highly gilt buttons. The inventor sells the metal to the manufacturers at Bologna at two dollars and 60 cents per lb. of 12 oz. which makes 9 dozen of coat buttons. The editor of the Franklin Journal states that the Artimomantico is soft and bends, and founds its superiority to other gold-coloured metals on its not tarnishing.

THE WILD POPPY.

The frequent use of the decoction of poppies for fomentations, baths, and poultices, has rendered the publick so familiar with the plant, that they are accustomed to use it in almost indefinite quantities, especially for children, without regard to their ages, or their power of resisting its narcotick influence. It is a very common practice for mothers, especially among the lower orders, to give their infants large quantities of poppy syrup to make them sleep; and we know cases in which that sleep has terminated in a state of quiescence from which they have never been roused. We would caution the publick, more especially medical men, to be more careful how they recommend the use of the poppy, whether the wild or the oriental; and the more so, since we observe, in the Archives Generales, several cases of poisoning of infants, by the free use of the decoctions, recorded by Dr. Melier.

THE GATHERER.

VOYAGE OF HUMAN LIFE.

In the Waterly Novels we sometimes meet with snatches of sentiment which are worthy of the sages of olden time. Our readers will probably recollect the following gem:—"When we set out on the jolly voyage of life, what a brave fleet there is around us, as stretching our fresh canvass to the breeze, all 'ship shape and Bristol fashion' pennons flying, musick playing, cheering each other as we pass, we are rather amused than alarmed when some awkward comrade goes right ashore for want of pilotage! Alas! when the voyage is well spent, and we look about us, toil-worn mariners, how few of our ancient consorts still remain in sight, and they, how torn and wasted, and, like ourselves, struggling to keep as long as possible off the fatal shore, against which we are all finally drifting!"

A MONKEY AND A FIDDLE.

The late Cecil, of St. John's, Bedford row, was, as is well known, a shrewd observer of men and manners. One day he met, in the course of his walks, an Italian with a box of plaster medals. They were superiour even to Bani's best. Cecil, who was also a man of some taste in the fine arts, appreciated them at once, and told the artist that he might soon make a fortune by his casts. The poor fellow could not make bread by them. Cecil was amazed, and asked, if he had exhibited them properly? "Ah, sair," said the Italian, "dere is no getting on here vitout a monkee and a feedle." Cecil did not forget this. Being some time after, at a committee of ways and means in behalf of a humane institution, the funds of which were declining, one member said, "We must have a popular preacher to the Chapel of the Institution, or we shall not get on." Another said, "We must have a new organ, too, or we shall not get on." "True," said Cecil, "as the Italian said, there is no getting on here without a monkey and fiddle." He then told his story, which, by the way, cuts wider and deeper than he seems to have discerned at the time.

DAVID HUME AND L-Y W-E.

The lady was partial to the philosopher, and the philosopher was partial to the lady. They once crossed the Frith from Kinghorne to Leith together, when a violent storm rendered the passengers apprehensive of a salt water death; and her ladyship's terrors induced her to seek consolation from her friend, who with infinite sang froid assured her "he thought there was great probability of their becoming food for fishes." "And pray, my dear friend," said Lady W—ll—c, "which do you think they will eat first?"—"Those who are gluttons," replied the historian, "will undoubtedly fall foul of me; but the epicures will attack your ladyship."

TAXES.

A British reviewer thus enumerates what he terms in England, the inevitable consequences of being too fond of glory.

"Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the feet—taxes upon every thing which it is pleasant to see, hear, sell, smell, and taste—taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion—taxes on every thing on earth, and the waters under the earth—on every thing that comes from abroad, or is grown at home—taxes on the raw material—taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man—taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite, and the drug which restores him to health—on the ermine which decorates the judge, and the rope which hangs the criminal—on the poor man's salt, and the rich man's spice—on the brass nails of the coffin, and the ribands of the bride—at bed or board, couchant or levant we must pay:—The school boy whips his taxed top—the beardless youth manages his taxed horse, with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road:—and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine which has paid 7 per cent. into a spoon that has paid 15 per cent—flings himself back into a chintz bed, which has paid 22 per cent—makes his will upon an eight pound stamp—and expires in the arms of an apothecary, who has paid a license of an hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death:—His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble, and he is then gathered to his fathers—to be taxed no more."

LESSING AT HOME.

The following anecdote is related of Lessing, the German author, who, in his old age, was subject to extraordinary fits of abstraction. On his return home one evening, after he had knocked at the door, his servant looked out of the window to see who was there. Not recognizing his master in the dark, and mistaking him for a stranger, he called out, "The Professor is not at home." "Oh, well," replied Lessing, "no matter, I will call another time," and he very composedly walked away.

LORD HOWE.

When the late Lord Howe was a captain, a lieutenant, not remarkable for courage or presence of mind in dangers (common fame had brought some imputation upon his character) ran to the great cabin and informed his commander that the ship was on fire near the gun-room. Soon after this he returned exclaiming, "you need not be afraid as the fire is extinguished." "Afraid!" replied Captain Howe a little nettled, "how does a man feel, sir, when he is afraid? I need not ask how he looks."

LAW.

Horne Tooke used to say, that law in his opinion, ought not to be a luxury for the rich, but a remedy for the poor. When told that the courts of justice were open to all, he replied, so is the London Tavern to such as can pay for entertainment.

DR. JOHNSON.

A lady asked Dr. Johnson why he was not invited to dine at the tables of the great. "Because," said he, "Great lords and ladies do not like to have their mouths stopped."

THE CHASE.

In a letter from Mr. Burns to Mr. Rawlins, June 14th, 1785, in the Bodleian collection, he states, that one Mr. Vernon, followed a butterfly nine miles before he could catch it.

POPULAR TALES.

DEATH'S HORSE.

[The following is an abridgement of a German legend, from a work recently published in London, entitled "Tales of an Antiquary," in three volumes. The scene is laid in a forest near Wolfsfeld, so infested by demons, that no person can pass unmolested. At length a bold knight undertakes the adventure: he sets off, with the Evangelists at his saddle-bow, his spear in his hand, and a song on his lips.]

He was carolling on in this manner, when the wood began to resound with all sorts of noises: there were laughing, shouting, and many voices were heard mocking him. "Hark to the fool-hardy braggart!" cried one. "He little thinks we're to roast him to-night on molten gold," said another. "Yes," howled a third, "for the impious fool came out without a blessing from the brethren of St. Francis' convent." "Let him go on, let him go on; he cannot escape Death's Horse." In this manner was Ludwig accosted by his invisible foes on his entry to the forest; but though he was not daunted, yet he gathered up his strength for his future trials; "for," thought he "although what I have heard may be as gross falsehoods as ever were uttered by the fiend himself, yet I shall not cast away my blows upon an invisible enemy, but reserve them until I can see something to fight withal." He rode on for a while unmolested, though the forest grew thicker, and the night grew darker every moment; when, as he passed the entrance to a narrow and deep defile, he saw a figure very richly habited in the ancient dress of Germany come riding up it, on a bay horse: upon his head was a crown of gold, and in his face where his eyes should have been, were two large balls, which shone like the regal metal when glowing in the furnace. "Ho, friend!" cried Langenspeers, when he saw the figure, "who are you with your fiery eyes, and what do you seek in this forest?" "My name," said the stranger, "is King Guldneugen, I am lord of all the gold in Germany." "And I," returned the knight, "am Lodowyck Langenspeers, of Wolfsfeld, as poor as an howlet, but in arms against all roving spirits." "What say you, Ludwig, to becoming my subject? You shall have coined gold by the handful, and wedges enough to build you a palace with." "Well said, King Golden-eyes," answered Langenspeers, "but what must I do for all this?" "Only give me that little book which is at your left saddle-bow, and swear upon it to be mine for ever and ever." "A likely tale, King Guldneugen," replied the knight; "but if you can carry my lance without stooping, I'll serve you." "Come then," said the king, "let me try." "Take it, then," said Ludwig, letting his ponderous spear fall with all his force upon the shoulder of the unfortunate monarch, and bearing both horse and man to the earth with the weight of it. "How now!" cried the knight, "what are you down, King Guldneugen? you are well fitted, truly, to play a forest fiend, not to stand a touch like that. Believe me, my faith is much heavier. Hark ye, friend, I shall give you a little wound, that I may know you when we meet again: there!" continued he, running his spear through the fictitious spirit's arm, "Good night!" "Go on, thou sacrilegious man!" said the fallen king; "Death's Horse is abroad in the forest! thou wilt meet him anon." "And then," returned Langenspeers, "I shall serve it as I have served yours;" and so he rode on his journey. He again continued unmolested for some time; but whether he had missed the road, or whether any fiendish sleights were cast over him, he could not tell, though certain it was that he rather seemed to get deeper into the forest, than to issue from it on the high road to Nurnberg. In spite of himself, too, the night air made him weary and drowsy, and he even nodded in a broken slumber over his horse's head. It is, however, in these brief spaces of forgetfulness, when we are neither sleeping nor waking, that the power of dreams is most perplexingly active; for the things which are actually passing before us are mixed up with the wild incoherencies of vision, and we are unable to distinguish the true from the false. Such was the situation of Langenspeers; he thought that he was still riding through the wood, greatly wearied, and that a beautiful female, fantastically habited in oak and ivy, like a forest sprite, was approaching him, singing—

"Turn and rest thee, soldier, here,
Let thy wearied barb go free;
Lay aside thy massive spear,
Turn and pass the night with me."

Here securely feast and sleep,
Beauty here shall bless thine arms;
Rest thee, knight, nor longer keep Vigil to the forest charms."

A sudden start of his horse awakened Ludwig from his trance, and he beheld the figure which he had dreamed of, standing before him. "And pray, fair one," began the knight, "was yours the voice I heard inviting me to stop and rest, and banquet?" "Yes, gallant stranger," she replied; "I am the Princess Brinhilda, the daughter of Achenmann, the erl king; I came forth from my bower to find a brave knight, to take him to my castle and make him my lord. Say, then, wilt thou be he? I can bestow on thee more riches than the emperor of this land ever saw; all Germany shall be under thy control; and I will be thy lady-love, possessing a youth and beauty which are continually renewed by time." "But what," returned Ludwig, "must I give in exchange for all this?" "Only," said the lady, "one kiss from your lips, one drop of your blood, that little book which hangs at your saddle-bow, and swear upon it to be mine for ever and ever." "A goodly guerdon, truly, fair Brinhilda; and now let me tell you, that I am the stout Ludwig Langenspeers, who am in arms against all roving spirits; but if you can carry my sword, I am content to be yours, and it's the office of a gentle damosell to unarm her knight." "Unbrace it," said Brinhilda, and let me try." "There, fair gentlewoman," returned Langenspeers, casting the sword with a violent clank to the earth, but retaining in his hand the chain to which it was suspended. Brinhilda tried to raise it, but it was enough for any three ordinary men, and therefore all her attempts were in vain: but while she was stooping over it, the knight silently took from her head the oak and ivy crown, and shred off with his dagger a large tress of her golden hair. At length, seeing her labours were to no purpose, he drew up the sword again, and, after bracing it on, put his steed into a gallop, and said, "Fare you well, lady! you are no erl king's daughter, not to be able to lift my sword. I shall never yield to you, for my faith is heavier than that brand; but I shall carry off these trophies, that I may know you when we meet again." "Go on, uncourteous knight," said the lady, "Death's horse is abroad, and he will revenge me;" and Ludwig rode onwards through the forest. As the moon began to sink down the sky, he drew near to a sort of plain in the wood; but ere he could gain it, he heard the hollow voice of some one apparently riding very near to him, and singing:—

"I ride the forest, I ride the wood,
I ride on the broad highway;
The track of my charger is marked with blood,
Like a field on the battle-day!
Whatever he pursues, in vain is flight,
There never was barb so fleet;
Whatever he attacks, in vain is might—
Whole armies fall at his feet!
No mortal dare upon him to look,
Although he be stout and brave;
Each step of his tread is a knell for the dead,
And each bound is the span for a grave!"

Ah! said Ludwig to himself, this is a terrible homily, truly: it comes, doubtless, from that same Death's Horse of which I have heard so much; but he must not go unanswered neither:—

"Oh Death! oh Death! there is one by thy side,
Who fears not thy steed nor thee.
In arms against demons to-night I ride,
Then come forth, if thou can'st, to me!"

As he gained the plain, a troop of figures, like skeletons and fiends, of the most horrible grotesque shapes, came running in wild rabble rout from another path of the wood, and in the midst of them there was a fleshless form seated upon a little black horse, having harness of cord, and a bell hung about his neck, which continually swung with a melancholy sound. The figure on his back was habited in a kind of white shroud; but though his visage was the face of a skull, he had a long black beard, and his streaming hair was surmounted by an eastern crown twined about with serpents. He held in his left hand an hour-glass and dial, and in his right a spear, with which he made towards Ludwig; but the brave knight, breathing a short prayer, couching his own resistless lance, and putting Maximilian to his full speed, rushed valiantly on the band—we need scarcely add, with the accustomed success of knights-errant.

THE MAN WITH A MOUTH.

[From the Boston Evening Bulletin.]

Angelina Skamble was the seventh daughter of a rich fisherman, abiding on the coast of Spratwich—a wild, bleak and stormy spot, often the scene of shipwreck and death. The snug mansion of skipper Skamble was located on one side of a valley that opened upon the broad ocean. Behind it arose a vegetable garden, adorned with cabbage-heads, potato-blossoms, and here and there an elderberry bush by way of variegation. At its wings stood the barn and appurtenances, and an orchard of stunted quince trees. In front flowed a narrow knee-deep rivulet, skirted beyond with a fringe of barberries, thistles and blue lilies; while above them towered a thick forest of firs. The house itself was like an oyster—tight, well filled, comfortable, somewhat polished in the interior, and withal enclosing a "pearl of great-price;" though roughcast and weatherbeaten on the outside. Yet Miss Angelina had contrived to ornament its uncouth walls with trails of parasitical plants, that clung to the main chance like politicians to the powers that be. Upon the whole the residence of Captain Skamble, as he was now styled, presented a tout ensemble quite refreshing to the eye that had previously wandered over the neighbouring region.

Among the gossips of the vicinity, it was a very current opinion that the old seaman, who had already settled large marriage portions upon his six elder daughters, must have obtained his vast wealth by other means than the curing of codfish and the pickling of mackarel. Some went so far as to say that he got it by mooncursing; others that he had found a large pot of guineas buried among the sands of the beach; and others, still more plausibly, conjectured that he had extracted it from the intestines of a wreck, that got on the Periwinkle Shoal, hard by, some twenty years ago. But the secret was not to be fathomed; it was too deeply inhumed within the bosom of its single possessor—and as the publick could only guess, and surmise, and wonder, without arriving at any sort of certainty or satisfaction, it is very evident that the fact had never been communicated even to the fisherman's wife. As to Miss Angelina, she neither cared nor thought about it. Immured in this rude and solitary vale, she knew not the worth nor the want of riches—she had never adopted the advice of Poor Richard, and ascertained the value of money by trying to borrow some. She had attained her seventeenth year, without having laid her eyes on more than eleven featherless bipeds of the masculine gender, including her father, her brother-in-law, the parson, and his nephew—the latter of whom was most murderously in love with her. Indeed, although as uncultivated as the cliffs and forests by which she was surrounded, she was albeit more beautiful than—reader! be kind enough to think of the prettiest being thou hast ever beheld, not only amidst the sober realities of existence, but in the most felicitous and romantick nightmares.

Though the minister's nephew, as we have before related, was in a predicament of affectionate desperation; still, the sentiment known in vulgar life by the name of love, had never yet crept in among the fancies of Miss Angelina Skamble. Her greatest delight consisted in wandering along the strand, gathering specimens of pebbles, shells and sea weed—or in tending her honey-suckles and creepers, as they stretched their stalks and fibres, through the sunshine, along the corners and window frames of her paternal domicile. One day, in her customary ramble on the sea side, after a long continuance of wind blowing off-shore, when the tides had receded far below their usual boundary, she observed a huge shell partly concealed in the sea-grass, upon the very border of the briny element. Considering it a prize of no ordinary magnitude, she advanced with greedy intention to make it her own. As she stooped to grapple the treasure, which was evidently nothing more than an immense clam, the testaceous monster opened its valves, sighed dismally, "Ah!" and sunk irretrievably into the subjacent mire.

Poor Angelina went home in tears, with that enormous mouth continually yawning before the eyes of her imagination. Night after night she dreamed of it—day after day, she sighed despondingly in the same melancholy and well remembered tone, "Ah, Ah!" She had heard of love; and now, as settled in her own mind, she felt it. Thus passed several weeks, wherein nothing occupied the disappointed maiden's sensorium, but the lamented submarine apparition—or rather disappearance—until one memorable fourteenth of February, seventeen hundred and odd, when a tremendous snow storm raged over the face of the country, like an elemental assortment of hurricanes, whirlwinds and tornadoes. Just at night-fall a rap was heard at the porch door. Miss Angelina was within, pondering on sighs and clam-shells, while the old folks were snoozing in the chimney corner. She lifted the latch, and a half-smothered seaman, dripping with brine, entered without ceremony. About his person there was nothing remarkable, save a mouth that extended from whisker to whisker, and gave to his profile the semblance of a tinman's shears. She asked if he had been ship-wrecked—and when he opened his mandibles, ejaculating "Ah!"—the sight and the sound fell upon her senses like rays of fruition upon the almost blighted blossoms of hope. The bewildered damsel fell upon his neck, sobbing, giggling, wailing, and rejoicing; while the hardy old tar, whose appearance indicated more than half a century's buffeting on the "boisterous main," dropped his nether jaw upon his collar-bone, and stood stark agast with amazement.

Meantime the sleepers in the corner awoke; and old Capt. Skamble's visage relaxed into an awful degree of longitude, on beholding the spectre before him. He knew that mouth, of old; but he had fondly hoped that the sharks had long since disjointed its hinges. But, as the rugged veteran was about to speak, the skipper raised his thumb in token of silence, and the tar's clapper came together like an alligator's. All sorts of comforts were immediately provided, and after remaining a week or two, it was announced in the newspapers that Richard Shive, aged 57, had espoused Angelina Skamble, aged 17. True, after becoming somewhat more acquainted with the world, lady Shive repented of her fantastick choice; but these affairs belong not to the story—which ends badly enough: for the parson's nephew drowned himself in the very cavity made by the mysterious shellfish in its unkind descent.

MISCELLANY.

RICHARD PLANTAGENET.

[From Tales of Modern Genins.]

It was on this awful night (the night preceding the battle of Bosworth Field) according to a letter which I have read from Dr. Thomas Brett to Dr. William Warren, president of Trinity Hall, that the King took his last farewell in his tent of Richard Plantagenet, his natural son, who himself thus describes that interview. "I was boarded with a Latin Schoolmaster, without knowing who my parents were till I was fifteen or sixteen years old; only a gentleman who acquainted me he was no relative of mine, came once a quarter and paid for my board, and took care to see that I wanted for nothing. One day this gentleman took me and carried me to a great fine house, where I passed through several stately rooms, in one of which he left me, bidding me stay there. Then a man richly dressed, with a star and garter, came to me, asked me some questions, talked kindly to me, and gave me some money. Then the fore-mentioned gentleman returned and conducted me back to my school.

"Some time after, the same gentleman came to me again with a horse and proper accoutrements, and told me I must take a journey with him into the country. We went into Leicestershire, and came to Bosworth Field, and I was carried to King Richard's tent. The King embraced me, and told me I was his son. 'But, child,' said he, 'tomorrow I must fight for my crown. And assure yourself that, if I lose that, I will lose my life too: but I hope to preserve both. When you stand on yonder hill, where you may see the battle out of danger, and when I have gained the victory, come to me; I will then own you to be mine, and take care of you. But if I should be so unfortunate as to lose the battle, then shift as well as you can, and take care to let no one know that I am your father; for no mercy will be shown to any one so nearly related to me.' The King then presented me with a purse of gold, and giving me a farewell embrace dismissed me from his tent. I followed the king's directions; and when I saw the battle lost and the king killed, I hastened back to London, sold my horse and fine clothes, and the better to conceal myself from all suspicion of being son to a king, and that I might have the means to live by my honest labour, I put myself apprentice to a bricklayer. But having a competent skill in the Latin tongue, I was unwilling to lose it; and having an inclination also to reading, and no delight in the conversation of those I am obliged to work with, I generally spend all the time I have to spare in reading by myself."

The letter says, "When Sir Thomas Moyle built Eastwell house, near London, about the year 1544, he observed his chief bricklayer, whenever he left off work, retired with a book. Sir Thomas had curiosity to know what book the man read, but it was some time before he could discover it, he still putting the book up if any one came towards him. However, at last Sir Thomas surprised him, and snatched the book from him, and looking into it found it to be Latin. He then examined him, and finding he pretty well understood that language, he inquired how he came by his learning. Hereupon the man told him, as he had been a good master to him, he would venture to trust him with a secret which he had never revealed before to any one. He then related the above story. Sir Thomas said 'You are now old and almost past your labour, I will give you the running of my kitchen as long as you live.' He answered, 'Sir, you have a numerous family, I have used to live retired, give me leave to build a house of one room for myself in such a field, and there, with your good leave, I will live and die.' Sir Thomas granted his request, he built his house, and there continued to his death. Richard Plantagenet was buried the 22d day of December, anno in supra ex registro de Eastwell sub 1550. This is all the register mentions of him, so that we cannot say whether he was buried in the church or churchyard; nor is there now any other memorial of him except the tradition in the family and some little marks where his house stood. This story my late lord Heneage, Earl of Winchelsea, told me in the year 1720." Thus lived and died in low and poor obscurity, the only remaining son of Richard III.

THE ASIATICK ASSASSINS.

[From the Foreign Quarterly Review.]

Von Hammer's history of the assassins gives a brief but pertinent detail of the rise, progress, and extinction of those tremendous sectarians, whose influence paralyzed for so many years the noblest Asiatick potentates. They originated, it seems, in the south of Persia, and their founder was a zealot, named Abdallah, whose professed object was to conceal the tenets of his disciples, till a prince of their persuasion should be seated on some African or Asiatick throne. This was, with some difficulty, after a lapse of years accomplished; a pretended descendant of Mahomet, released from prison, was placed on the throne of Egypt; and the doctrines of Abdallah, which, in their impious and daring absurdity, bore no slight resemblance to those of the revolutionary atheists of France—became the established religion of Africa. Not content with this triumph, the sectarians, through the zeal of their Dais, or missionaries, dispersed their heresies over Asia, until at length, in the 11th century, about two hundred years after their institution by

Abdallah, the famous Hassan Ben Sabah, a Persian of ignoble extraction, modified them so as to suit his own views and the spirit of the times, and spread them (under the title of the "Sect of the Assassins"—the word assassin being derived from Hassan, their chief promoter) over the greater part of the east. Hassan himself was one of those daring characters who stand out on the foreground of history, and singly fix its attention. His mind towered far above the world in which he lived, and never stooped from its eyrie to earth, without tracking its course in blood. He was, in fact, an Asiatick Cromwell, versed in all the varieties of dissimulation; patient, but unwearied to revenge; cool, calculating, and well read in the volume of human nature. Under his superintendence the Assassins obtained unprecedented supremacy throughout Asia; and from their strong Persian fastness at Alamoot, where Hassan,—or the Old Man of the Mountain, as himself and his descendants were styled,—resided, gave laws to the Caliphs at Bagdad. Their chief weapon was the dagger: they rarely engaged in open warfare; but, assuming every variety of disguise, and spread by thousands over every part of Asia, they executed their chieftain's behests, to whom they were devoted as to a deity, with adroit and insatiable enthusiasm.—Nothing was too mighty nor too inglorious for their revenge; neither prince nor peasant escaped them, for they moved like the Spirit of Night, in darkness; and, in point of numbers, consistency, and perseverance, equalled, if they did not exceed Bishop Hatto's army of rats. The manner in which Hassan first initiated each votary into his sect is thus picturesquely described:—

"There was at Alamoot, and also at Masiat, in Syria, a delicious garden, encompassed with lofty walls, adorned with leaves and flowers of every kind—with murmuring brooks and translucent lakes—with bowers of roses and trellices of the vine—airy halls and splendid kiosks, furnished with the carpets of Persia and the silks of Byzantium. Beautiful maidens and blooming boys were the inhabitants of this delicious spot, which ever resounded with the melody of birds, the murmur of streams and the ravishing tones of voices and instruments—all respired contentment and pleasure. When the chief noticed any youth to be distinguished for strength and resolution, he invited him to a banquet, where he placed him beside himself, conversed with him on the happiness reserved for the faithful, and contrived to administer to him an intoxicating draught prepared from the hyoscyamus. While insensible he was conveyed into the garden of delight; and there awakened by the application of vineyard. On opening his eyes all Paradise met his view; the black-eyed and blue-robed houries surrounded him, obedient to his wishes; sweet music filled his ears; the richest viands were served up in the most costly vessels; and the choicest wines sparkled in golden cups. The fortunate youth believed himself really in the Paradise of the Prophet, and the language of his attendants confirmed the delusion. When he had had his fill of enjoyment, and nature was yielding to exhaustion, the opium was again administered, and the sleeper transported back to the side of the chief, to whom he communicated what had passed, and who assured him of the truth and reality of all he had experienced, telling him such was the bliss reserved for the obedient servants of Imaum, and enjoining at the same time the strictest secrecy. Ever after the rapturous vision possessed the imagination of the deluded enthusiast, and he panted for the hour when death, received in obeying the commands of his superiour, should dismiss him to the bowers of Paradise."

After a sway (more or less in the ascendant) of centuries over Asia, the Assassins were finally exterminated by Mango the Great, Khan of Tartary.

NOLLEKENS.

[From Hazlitt's Table Talk.]

Mr. Nolleken's left £240,000 behind him, and the name of one of our best English sculptors. There was a great scramble among the legatees—a codicil to a will with large bequests unsigned, and that last triumph of the dead or dying over those who survive—hopes raised and defeated without a possibility of retaliation, or the smallest use in complaint. The king was first said to be left residuary legatee. This would have been a fine instance of romantick and gratuitous homage to majesty, in a man who all his life time could never be made to comprehend the abstract idea of the distinction of ranks, or even of persons. He would go up to the Duke of York or Prince of Wales (in spite of warning,) take them familiarly by the button like common acquaintance, ask them how their father did, and express pleasure at hearing he was well, saying, "when he was gone we should never get such another." He once, when the old king was sitting to him for his bust, fairly stuck a pair of compasses into his nose, to measure the distance from the upper lip to the forehead, as if he had been measuring a block of marble. His late majesty laughed heartily at this, and was amused to find that there was a person in the world ignorant of that vast interval which separated him from every other man. Nollekens, with all his loyalty, hardly liked the man, and cared nothing about the king (which was one of those mixed modes, as Mr. Locke calls them, of which he had no more idea than if he had been one of the cream-coloured horses)—handled him like so much common clay, and had no other notion of the matter, but that it was his business to make the best bust of him he possibly could, and to set about it in the regular way. There was something in his plainness and simplicity that savoured perhaps of the hardness and dryness of his art, and of his own peculiar severity of manners. Nollekens's style was comparatively hard and dry. He had as much truth and character, but none of the polished graces or transparent softness of Chantrey. He had more of rough, plain, downright honesty of his heart. It seemed to be his character. Mr. Northcote was once complimenting him on his acknowledged superiority—"Ay, you made the best busts of anybody!" "I don't know about that," said the other; his eyes (though their orbs were quenched) smiling with a gleam of smothered delight, "I only know I always tried to make them as like as I could."

ANECDOTE.

[Translated from the French.]

A carriage is overturned in a stony road near the little town of Gondrecourt. It must be set to rights; but there is much to be done, and consequently the delay will be long. Besides, there is no accommodation in the place; the judge, the curate, the bailiff and bailiffs, the procuratress-fiscal, and in fact all the best company, being in the country. Our traveller spies, in this pretty predicament, a very modest looking house, surmounted by as modest a belfrey. It is a little convent of capuchins. He walks up to it; his ring is heard; they open the door; and see a very lean man; somewhat unwell, but otherwise of good appearance and polite address, who solicits their hospitality.

Our stranger is well received and well cared for. After the customary compliments lavished on one side and returned on the other, with equal civility, they begin to talk of one thing and another. The traveller listens well, and speaks little, but when questions come in course, they find that he answers in a very sensible manner.

The bell rings for the Angelus. "Do you say your prayers, sir? inquired the good fathers. "The very thing I was going to propose to you!" said the stranger. Dinner comes next, plain of course, but still better than their every day fare; and they take care to have only wholesome things on the table; on account of the delicate health of the new guest. During dinner, theology is the subject. The stranger knows almost as much about it as the fathers, and is exactly of their opinion. They speak of different Capuchin Convents in France, and Germany, and Italy, which, to them, are the capitals of all true countries. The traveller is more knowing than they suspect him to be on this interesting question of geography. He talks highly of the peculiar talent of the children of St. Francis for finding out pretty situations for their settlement. They quote some anecdotes of the humility of the good St. Francis of Assisi; the stranger admires them, and, in turn, relates some others that the good fathers had not heard before.

It was no wonder that they grew very fond of this civil stranger; and that at last they hugged themselves for having been so polite to a man who deserved it so well on every account; a man who, in spite of his modesty, appeared to have received a brilliant education—a man who had undoubtedly studied, and could converse on every subject, inasmuch as he understood one or two Latin quotations almost as well as the Superiour—a man who appeared to have at his finger's ends every thing that interested the order—and who even promised to be one day in a condition to converse with their principal members without wearying them.—Things, at last, went so far that they were desirous of enrolling him in their order; and already the fathers showed him in perspective their most splendid dignities, if he would consent to take their habit. The stranger would think of it; he is sensible as he ought to be of the sentiments they entertain for him, and without refusing positively the offers that are made to him, he defends himself from so undeserved and honour. In the mean time his carriage is announced to be ready; the whole house is affliction, and there is no man in that good company who does not give and receive, at parting, the most lively demonstrations of interest and esteem. Now tell me, who was this man who gained the hearts of the Capuchins? It was—Voltaire.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1828.

Post masters and secretaries of chapters and lodges are requested to act as our agents.

Through the politeness of a friend in New-York, we have received during the last week, late numbers of the London Athenæum, the Age, High Life in London, and the Macclesfield Herald.

We owe an acknowledgement to another New-York friend, within a few days, for late numbers of the London New Times, and other English papers.

EXTRA-JUDICIAL OATHS. On Wednesday last, Mr. Childs, of Monroe county, from the committee of the assembly, to which was referred the memorial of the famous convention at Le Roy, made a report to the house, animadverting severely on the "abuse of the practice of administering oaths, as it is alleged to exist in masonick societies," as set forth by the aforesaid convention; and to conclude, brought in the following bill.

An Act to prevent the administration of extra judicial oaths.

The people of the State of New-York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:—

Section 1. It shall not be lawful for any person to administer an oath or affirmation, in any case not authorized by the laws of the state.

§ 2. It shall not be lawful for any person to take an oath or affirmation, in any case not required by the laws of the state.

§ 3. Any person offending against either of the preceding sections shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and on conviction shall be punished by fine and imprisonment; the fine not to exceed two hundred dollars, and the imprisonment not to exceed six months.

They who are aware that the constitution of this state guarantees a free and complete toleration to all religious denominations,—an unlimited exercise not only of their opinions, but also a free administration of such rules and matters of faith as their circumstances may make necessary among themselves,—will readily allow with us, that the above act is directly and pointedly an attack upon this constitutional guaranty. The privileges hitherto allowed to ecclesiastical tribunals, of receiving on oath the testimony, not only of their own members but of those without the pale of the church, in matters of church discipline, has been considered as protected by this same constitution. So far as offences and differences in a religious view are incognizable by civil tribunals, and so far as it is necessary to arrive at truth in such cases, it were unjust to debar them of this privilege, even had it no countenance of support from the constitution, or any existing laws. Many of the concessions made by legislative and judicial authority to the particular creed of different sects, have in our opinion a more dangerous power over the consciences and safety of our citizens than this principle, or even the "hydra headed monster" so much dreaded by the wise and politick self-constituted delegates at Le Roy. It has been decided in our courts of law, that the auricular confession of a Roman Catholic cannot be either required or admitted as evidence in trials before any judicial tribunal. This too is remarkable in a land like this, where the first prejudices our parents contrive to fix in our tender minds is an abhorrence of that church and its ordinances. If this decision were not founded on strict equity and supported by the broad protection of the constitution, how did it ever supersede such prejudices, and become a part of the law of the land? It cannot be even questioned that it is a matter of right, since it is a part of the faith of not a small portion of American citizens, and consequently as much the subject of toleration as any article of any creed. In this example of toleration may be considered all that appears dangerous to society and the laws. Experience has furnished no dreadful proofs of its deleterious effects; and if it belongs to the wise men of the west to prune away the dangerous clauses of our laws and constitution, let them attack this also,—and thus go on lopping off branch after branch, till we have neither civil nor religious liberty left us at all.

The bearing of this bill, should it ever become a law, upon freemasonry, let it be distinctly understood, is not the subject for which we have made these remarks. There can be no danger to the institution from that quarter, let the tables turn as they will. It is evident that the blow is aimed at freemasonry; but they must be wholly ignorant of the order, and the thousand ordeals it has passed through, who think to frame laws, having even the appearance of equity in them, that shall have any direct weight upon its prosperity. To use the eccentric comparison of an intimate, you may with the same propriety set a bear trap to catch a humming-bird.—Nothing short of universal proscription and massacre can suppress this persecuted brotherhood, even for a season. Let the apes of tyrants mark this declaration and despair.

We have before us the annual Report of the Regents of the University, to the legislature, made to the senate February 29, 1828. It certainly gives a favourable view of the literary prosperity of the state, and contains much matter of encouragement to the warm friends of our present highly improved system of education. Annexed to this report is an abstract from the returns of Meteorological Observations made to the regents of the university, by sundry academies in the state, in obedience to instructions dated March 1, 1825, prepared by Doctor T. ROMEYN BECK, principal, and JOSEPH HENRY, one of the professors of Albany Academy. To the scientific man who looks with a friendly eye to generations yet to come, this record of facts must be highly valued. Posterity will learn and be grateful to its projectors; for they alone will feel its full value. Let this measure be continued for a century or two, and our children's children will hardly be made to credit the fact that there ever was a generation so blind to philosophical interests as to neglect a duty so important to the ages before them.

POLITICKS. We are highly gratified with the perusal of the article in Thursday's Daily Advertiser, respecting the incorporation of the Morgan excitement with the presidential question. With a candour and independence highly honourable to them, the editors deprecate the indiscreet conduct of some of their political friends in this measure. Such a course, however it may gall the dupes of Thurlow Weed & Co. cannot fail of acquiring them the confidence of all good and honest men of every party.

FOREIGN. The latest arrivals in New-York have brought London dates to February 24th, and Liverpool to the 26th. Cadiz was on the eve of being evacuated by the French, and the Spanish troops were on their march to garrison that city. News from Constantinople is not so pacific as could be expected. That city is represented as one vast camp. The Porte has publicly declared to the pachas of the provinces, that his conduct after the battle of Navarino had no other object than to gain time for the armaments. The whole naval strength of Turkey guards the Bosphorus; yet no act of hostility has been dared by the Turks. The greatest concern is manifested in the christian kingdoms, for the safety of the Europeans in that city. The arrival daily of the Asiatick subjects of the Porte,—those savage hordes who spread murder and pillage along the whole line of their march in 1820—must feel their lives in jeopardy. Russia is concentrating her forces; and Poland, who has again become a nation both in name and fact, is also in the field against her old enemy, the Turk. If the Sultan does not choose his own capital for the field of combat, it is evident that he must abide by the choice of Wittgenstein, and contend where he may select.

FROM RIO GRANDE. The hostile armies of Brazil and Buenos Ayres, are approaching each other, and it is probable the next intelligence from that quarter will be of more than ordinary interest. This information was received by the brig Celeno, captain Frazier, arrived at Baltimore from Guayaquil. The Celeno was not permitted any communication with the Brazilian shore.

TABLE TALK.

It is both melancholy and amusing to a sober reader to peruse the "cut-and-thrust" eloquence of our members of congress. A short time since, Mr. Wright, of Ohio, happened to call the eccentric John Randolph to order, no doubt in a proper manner, only somewhat too late, and afterwards observed,—"I called the gentleman to order because he was addressing the chair after a motion had been made to adjourn; and upon my call the gentleman sat down." "I sat down before," quoth Mr. Randolph. "If the gentleman did not hear me" quoth Mr. Wright, "how can he know that he sat down before I called him to order." "Because I sat down before the gentleman had done speaking," quoth Mr. Randolph. "If the gentleman from Virginia wishes to build up a man of straw," quoth Mr. Wright, "I wish him success, and hope he will find one to suit him." "I have one already before me," quoth Mr. Randolph. —A member of the Massachusetts legislature lately closed his speech on the militia law with the following conclusive argument: "Mr. speaker, if this bill is postponed, I shall be as crazy as a bed-bug." The same member in the course of some remarks on another question, said he really believed he was instigated by the devil!—A sailor was observed not many mornings since, very early, working at one of the street pumps with as much industry as if he had been at sea with six feet water in the hold; but not finding the element wherewith to "cool his coppers," he went off muttering,—"d—n the pump;—drunk last night, just as I was;—both devilish dry."—The Western Advertiser, a Morgan paper, printed at Buffalo, died week before last, of hydrophobia, in consequence of the scanty and unwholesome sustenance afforded it. It might have lived a little longer, perhaps, but in one of its rabid fits, it cut its own throat with a meat axe! Its ghost is said to be spooking grimly about the office of the Buffalo Patriot.—We copy the following from the Little-Falls People's friend:—"Sale of a wife! No. 2.—We recently recorded an event of this kind which took place in our own neighbourhood; but the reader must not suppose that this new traffick is wholly confined to the rocky precincts of Little-Falls; other places have followed the delectable example. The amiable and accomplished companion of an inhabitant of one of the northern towns of this [Herkimer] county, eloped with a male acquaintance from the west, some two years since; but unfortunately blundering back to his former residence, in the vicinity of a certain state prison, was encountered by his own wife, and threatened with certain punishment within its gloomy walls. He therefore returned to his first love, and left his stolon Dulcinea to shift for herself. The latter wandering south, lately picked up a third husband near the Pennsylvania line, and 'with much fair speech and flattering of her lips,' induced him to return with her to this county to visit her friends. Without knowing that she had another husband, he did so; and when acquainted with the fact, took witnesses, and fairly purchased 'all the right, title, interest, and claim' of this valuable property, by paying to her loving spouse the sum of three dollars and fifty cents; thus converting this 'bone of contention' into his lawful rib, which he continues 'to have and to hold,' as aforesaid." [So it seems the commodity has taken a fall in the Herkimer market.]—An officer in the Galway custom department, long famous for pets of almost every kind, has now in his possession a very extraordinary one indeed—no less than a pet oyster!! taken off the Mayor's bed, the property of the corporation, and the largest and finest of the Poll Doo breed. Being fed on oat meal, for which it regularly opens its shell, and occasionally treated with a dip in its native element, it seems to enjoy a place in the curious menagerie, almost as well as its neighbours. But the most extraordinary trait in the history of this pet is, that it has proved an excellent mouser, having already destroyed five mice, by instantly crushing their heads, when they had the temerity to intrude them within his bivalvular clutches. Twice have two of the little trespassers suffered together.—The Lincolnshire Agricultural society, in England, has awarded a prize of ten guineas to one man, the father of seventeen children, (ten living,) and having been forty years in the service of one master; and to another a prize of five guineas, being the father of twenty-five children (ten living,) and a service of forty-one years with one master.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-YORK.

[Reported for the Record and Magazine.]

Friday, March 14. In senate bills read a third time and passed: to authorize Reuben Ellis to contract with the ordnance department of the United States to furnish this state certain fire arms in lieu of such as have heretofore been received under the act of congress of 1806, ayes 14, noes 10; authorizing the board of canal commissioners to pay Ara Broadwell a balance due him; authorizing David C. Case to erect a dam across the Chenango river; authorizing the removal of a gun-house in the village of Binghamton in the county of Broome; to repeal the act for the preservation of fish in the Crooked Lake, in the counties of Steuben and Yates.

In assembly, a report was received from the canal board on the petition of John Merriam and others, which was referred to the committee of the whole, when on the bill to extend the equitable powers of the canal board, and ordered to be printed.

In assembly, bills read a third time and passed: ceding certain lands on Staten Island to the United States for the use of a light-house; dividing the town of Bethel; altering the time of the meeting of the supervisors in Greene; amending the charter of the village of Salina; concerning gospel and school lots in the town of Sanford.

[From the Rutland (Vermont) Herald]

Martin Flint—the same who is trying to cut a small figure on this mundane sphere by his anti-masonick exertions—has sent us a number of the National (Albany) Observer, requesting us to publish a flimsy piece of his therein contained. It is proper for us to state that neither we nor our paper will enter the lists in a masonick controversy. Masonry is a thing we know nothing—and to speak our mind—care nothing about. We have no prejudices either for or against the institution. In a free country, we know no reason why masons should not enjoy their privileges unmolested. But we abhor a traitor—we despise a renegade; and certainly, an institution which has withstood the shocks of time—which appears to be built on the strong "rock of ages"—seems to us in no danger of being overturned by such an one as Martin Flint.

DIED.

POETRY.

THE SPIRIT'S MYSTERIES.

FROM THE KEEPSAKE.

The power that dwelleth in sweet sounds to waken
Vague yearnings like the sailor's from the shore,
And dim remembrances whose hue seems taken
From some bright former state, our own no more,—
Is not this all a mystery? who shall say
Whence are those thoughts, and whither tends their way?

The sudden images of vanished things
That o'er the spirit flash we know not why;
Tones from some broken harp's deserted strings;
Warm sunset hues of summers long gone by;
A rippling wave—the dashing of an oar;
A flower scent floating past our parents' door;

A word scarce noted in its hour perchance,
Yet back returning with a plaintive tone;
A smile—a sunny or a mournful glance,
Full of sweet meanings now from this world flown;—
Are not these mysteries when to life they start,
And press vain spring showers from the blighted heart?

And the far wanderings of the soul in dreams,
Calling up shrouded faces from the dead,
And with them bringing soft or solemn gleams,
Familiar objects brightly to o'erspread,
And wakening buried love, or joy, or fear—
These are night's mysteries—who shall make them clear?

And the strange inborn sense of coming ill,
That sometimes whispers to the haunted breast,
In a low sighing tone which nought can still,
Mid feasts and melodies a secret guest;—
Whence doth that murmur come,—that shadow fall?
Why shakes the spirit thus?—'tis mystery all!

Darkly we move—we press upon the brink
Haply of unseen worlds, and know it not!
Yes! it may be that nearer than we think
Are those whom death hath parted from our lot.
Fearfully, wondrously, our souls are made—
Let us walk humbly on, yet undismayed!

Humbly—for knowledge strives in vain to feel
Her way among these marvels of the mind;
Yet undismayed—for do they not reveal
The immortal nature with our dust entwined?
So let us deem! and even the tears they wake
Shall then be blessed, for that high nature's sake.

ON THE BIRTH DAY OF WASHINGTON.

BY J. G. C. BRAINARD.

Hic cinis—ubique fama.

Behold the mossed corner-stone dropped from the wall,
And gaze on its date, but remember its fall,
And hope that some hand may replace it;
Think not of its pride when with pomp it was laid,
But weep for the ruin its absence has made,
And the lapse of the years that efface it.

Mourn WASHINGTON's death when ye think of his birth,
And far from your thoughts be the lightness of mirth,
And far from your cheek be its smile.
To-day he was born,—'twas a loan—not a gift;
The dust of his body is all that is left
To hallow his funeral pile.

Flow gently, Potomack! thou wastest away
The sands where he trod, and the turf where he lay,
When youth brushed his cheek with her wing;
Breathe softly, ye wild winds, that circle around
That dearest, and purest, and holiest ground,
Ever pressed by the footprints of spring.

Each breeze be a sigh, and each dewdrop a tear,
Each wave be a whispering monitor near,
To remind the sad shore of his story;
And darker, and softer, and sadder the gloom
Of that evergreen mourner that bends o'er the tomb,
Where WASHINGTON sleeps in his glory.

Great God! when the spirit of freedom shall fail,
And the sons of the pilgrims in sorrow bewail
Their religion and liberty gone,
Oh, send back a form that shall stand as he stood,
Unsubdued by the tempest, unmoved by the flood;
And to TRIZZ be the glory alone.

A DREAM OF HEAVEN.

Lo, the seal of death is breaking,
Those who slept its sleep are waking,—
Eden opens her portals fair!
Hark, the harps of God are ringing,
Hark, the seraphs' hymn is singing,
And the living rills are flinging
Musick on immortal air!

There no more at eve declining,
Suns without a cloud are shining
O'er the land of life and love;
Heaven's own harvests woo the reaper;
Heaven's own dreams entrance the sleeper;
Not a tear is left the weeper
To profane one flower above.

No frail lilies there are breathing;
There no thorny rose is wreathing
In the bowers of Paradise;—
Where the fountains of life are flowing,
Flowers unknown to time are blowing,
Mid superber verdure glowing
Than is sunned by mortal skies.

There the groves of God, that never Fade or fall, are green forever,
Mirrored in the radiant tide;
There, along the sacred waters
Unprofaned by tears or slaughters,
Wander earth's immortal daughters,
Each a pure immortal's bride.

There no sigh of memory swelleth;
There no tear of misery welletth;
Hearts will bleed or break no more:
Passed is all the cold world's scorning;
Gone the night, and broke the morning,
With seraphic day adorning
Life's glad waves and golden shore.

Oh, on that bright shore to wander,
Trace those radiant waves' meander,
All we loved and lost to see,
Is this hope, so pure, so splendid,
Vainly with our being blended?
No! with time ye are not ended,
Visions of eternity!

DIRGE OF AN INFANT.

No bitter tears for thee be shed,
Blossom of being! seen and gone!
With flowers alone we strewed thy bed,
O blest departed one!
Whose all of life—a rosy ray—
Blushed into dawn and passed away.

Yes, thou art gone, ere guilt had power
To stain thy cherub soul and form!
Closed is the soft ephemeral flower
That never felt a storm!
The sunbeam's smile, the zephyr's breath,
All that it knew from birth to death.

Oh, hadst thou still on earth remained,
Vision of beauty—fair as brief!
How soon thy brightness had been stained
With passion, or with grief!
Now not a sullyng breath can rise
To dim thy glory in the skies.

We rear no marble o'er thy tomb,
No sculptured image there shall mourn,
Ah! fitter for the vernal bloom
Such dwellings to adorn;
Fragrance and flowers, and dews must be
The only emblems fit for thee.

Thy grave shall be a blessed shrine,
Adorned with nature's brightest wreath,
Each glowing season shall combine
Its incense there to breathe;
And often on the midnight air
Shall viewless harps be murmuring there.

And oh! sometimes in visions blest,
Sweet spirit visit our repose,
And bear from thine own world of rest
Some balm for human woes;
What form more lovely could be given
Than thine—to messenger of heaven?

"I'M NOT A POET NOW."

FROM THE BOSTON STATESMAN.

When I was in my little teens,
When I was half a man,
When I was always making love,
But never made a plan—
When I admired Anacreon Moore,
And never rose till ten,
I rhymed to every one I knew—
I was a poet then.

The Rhyming Dictionary then
My Vade mecum was,
And women to my fancy were
Aerial as gas—
I could have kissed a satin shoe,
Or challenged twenty men,
Or turned crusader—for a look—
I was a poet then.

I used to wear Macassar oil,
And murderous tight shoes,
And hunt for tender epithets
In tender hours to use;
I bought a razor and began
To shave when I was ten,
And mounted gills and quizzing glass—
I was a poet then.

But I am changed—my pocket book
My Vade mecum is,
And women weigh so many pounds,
And Cupid's but a quiz;
I never stand up to be shot;
I seldom make a bow;
"A look" is not worth looking for;—
I'm not a poet now.

My life, in short, is perfect prose;
I tie cravats behind;
I wear a pair of overshoes,
And keep a quiet mind—
I know a gravestone from a ghost,
A woman from a cow,—
I go to bed at ten o'clock—
I'm not a poet now.

FOR THE MASONICK RECORD AND SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

MR. EDITOR, I observe in your paper of March 29th, some remarks, from which I conclude that some person calling himself "Fair Play," has very unfairly saddled you with postage and very falsely and uncandidly accused me of having made an attack upon the Baptists as a denomination; and that through your columns. In answer to this charge, I would remark, that I intended my former article not as an attack upon any denomination whatever, as such,—but only as a defence of truth against the churches composing the Genesee Baptist Convention; and all other churches and individual professors of religion, who endeavour to oppress and violate the consciences of their brethren;—and under the cloak of religion, to exert an undue and dangerous influence on our political institutions; and by thus distracting the public mind, to undermine our government, and "deal damnation round the land."

I considered the object of that convention to be a political one, and in accordance with the object of those who commenced this unhallowed attack upon the institution of masonry; and the subsequent nomination of Solomon Southwick for governor of New-York, has proved beyond a rational doubt, that I had penetrated their ragged disguise and discovered their unholy purpose.

That individual Christians should be proscribed, and their consciences fettered, is entirely opposed to the spirit of the gospel; and although a Christian may, by a heated imagination and misguided zeal, be so far led astray as to adopt such a course, yet it must bring leanness to his own soul. But a real Christian, while under the influence of the Holy Spirit, can no more exercise such a disposition towards his brethren, than the inhabitants of the infernal regions can exercise sincere love towards the Lamb of God! because it is not congenial with the spirit of the gospel, the very essence of which is charity; and when the heart is warmed by this charity, the whole soul flows out in love to God, as the supreme source of all our enjoyments, and love to our brethren and fellow beings, as the work of His hands, and as the intermediate source of our earthly enjoyments. To this every person who has felt the divine influence pervade his soul, will bear me testimony.

That some are sincere in engaging in this persecution, I doubt not. Equally sincere was St. Paul when he "breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord;" for he testified that he verily thought that in so doing he was serving God. But sincerity was not then a sufficient excuse, much less is it now, when we have on record for our instruction the example of Paul, and also the testimony of one greater than Paul, who went about doing good, and enforcing the duties of charity, humility, meekness, and forbearance; and who so regarded the rights and consciences of his followers, that he made the following declaration,—"Whosoever shall offend one of these little ones, that believe on me, it were better for him that a millstone be hanged about his neck, and that he be drowned in the depths of the sea."

The apostle also in the same spirit of the gospel, exhorts his brethren,—"Let no man therefore judge you in meat," or in drink, or in respect of a holy-day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days;" and thus he would warn his brethren not to do violence to any man's conscience, or suffer others to do the like to them. Hence, I argue that a disposition to compel any person to renounce a sentiment, or an institution, which they have and can support, and still be Christians, is diametrically opposed to the temper of Christ and his holy apostles. Such a disposition may indeed as St. Paul says, "Have a show of wisdom in will worship;" but originates in the "beggary elements of the world."

I am compelled here to notice one figure in the Rev. Mr. Stearns' "Inquiry into the Nature and Tendency of Masonry!" He comes before the public as a minister of that gospel of peace we have just mentioned, and compares the institution of masonry, (from which, for aught I know, he has been expelled) to "Mystery, Babylon the great, mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth." Was this the purpose for which he entered the holy office of priest. Or has he forgotten the solemn determination of the apostle, "to know nothing among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified?" And may not the public justly conclude from the disposition manifested by the reverend gentleman, that he yet holds carnal intercourse with "the mother of harlots," and is striving with all his powers to become "drunken with the blood of the saints?"

The institution of masonry was antecedent to the advent of Christ; and if it was so derogatory to the Christian character, why did He not command his disciples to avoid it? Peradventure those who essay to minister at the altar in these days of wonders, may have become wiser than the great Head of the church, and better know the Christian's duty.

In case Morgan's exposition of masonry be true, it is no justification of the conduct of the Genesee convention; of Bernard (who if I mistake not has acknowledged himself an expelled member.) of Stearns; and the little editor of the North Star, at Danville, Vermont, who also professes religion; because if their consciences compelled them to renounce the institution, they could have done so without violating the solemn obligations which they must voluntarily have taken upon them, according to their own confessions; for curious indeed must be the fabric of that conscience, which compels its possessor to become guilty of perjury.

The editor of the Star, mentioned above, has joined the rabble; and as an excuse for so doing, says, that twenty eight years since, he was initiated into the mysteries of the first and second degrees of masonry; but in consequence of religious scruples, has made no further progress. But the truth is, that twenty years since, he endeavoured to rise to the third degree, but was found unworthy, and has ever since stuck fast in the mud. And it is not improbable that all who are pursuing a similar course are in the same, or a worse predicament.

I will now inform Mr. "Fair Play" that I depend not for support on perjured ministers or perjured editors; but on the volume of Divine Truth, some portion of which I may again present to his view, should he take the trouble to read.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

HORSE BUTCHERIES OF PARIS.

[From the New-York Journal of Commerce.]

We have just been looking into a new French work, lately published by the civic authorities of Paris, with the singular title of "Recherches et Considerations sur l'enlèvement et l'emploi des chevaux morts"—that is, "Researches and Considerations on the removal and disposal of dead horses;" which furnishes us with some curious facts.

It appears that there are in Paris a number of Horse Butcheries; and that in only two of them as many as 12,775 horses have been slaughtered in a single year. Of these about one fourth had died in the city, and the rest had been worn out with labour, exhausted by disease and old age, and sold by their owners, for a few francs, to these establishments. Here every part of the animal is turned to some account. The hair of the mane and tail is taken off before he is killed, and sent to the upholsterer, &c. After he is dead, the skin is sold to the tanners. The flesh is then cut up and sent about for food for cats and dogs, and possibly some morceaux of it pass through the hands of skilful cooks into the stomachs of men and women. Some other parts are disposed of to the farmers for manure. Occasionally, the small intestines are manufactured into cords for the wheels of turners. The tendons are valuable to the makers of glue. The fat, if any, is carefully separated and preserved. The old iron shoes and nails are not forgotten. The hoofs are separated and made into coarse combs, or if any of them are injured or defective, they are sold to the manufacturers of volatile alkali, and Prussian blue. The bones were formerly good for nothing and troublesome; but now there is a constant call for them from the cutlers, toy-men, and fan-makers.

These establishments, it seems, are infested with innumerable rats that make nothing of devouring the whole carcase of a horse (except the bones) is left exposed, during a single night. They are, however, paid for their pains, and forced to contribute to the profits of the concern—for they are caught and killed for their skins. More than 2600 of them have been killed in a day, and 9100 in four hunts; but the largest number despatched in a month was 16,050.

These Horse butcheries are chiefly established at Montfaucon; but they have become so noxious, and dangerous to the public health, that the authorities of Paris have been obliged to interfere, and the commissioners appointed to examine them and report, have found that the business at them has been managed with so much barbarity and disorder as to require a change of the whole system. They admit, however, that such places, under proper regulations are necessary, and useful; and the business, it seems, shocking and disgusting as it is offers chances for making fortunes.

SURGICAL.

[From the Williamstown (Mass.) Advocate.]

A grand-son of Mr. J. Burchard, aged 10 years was born with but one nostril and his mouth so much awry and deformed that he was unable to close it by the space of an inch. Surgeons of eminence, far and near, were requested to operate on the child, but so faint was the prospect of success they uniformly declined. On the 15th March, however, Dr. Emmons of this town gave it as his opinion that something might be done; and he accordingly commenced by cutting the left side of the face—after detaching the ligatures that held the skin and muscles askew, he brought down a flap from the left side over the nose which completely answered the purpose by forming another nostril. He then brought the parts of the mouth together in a proper shape and dressed the wounds in the usual way. Such is the success which has attended this operation that the boy is now well, and so much improved, both in looks and speech, that those who formerly knew him can hardly recognize him for the same person.

ILLINOIS LEAD MINES.

From the report of the superintendent of the United States' lead mines in Illinois and Missouri, during the last year yielded a clear revenue of 91,038 pounds of lead; and that the mines in this state during the same time, produced 518,218. During the year 1825, but 100 miners were employed at the mines near Galena. The number was increased in 1826 to 400. In 1827, to 1600. The amount of mineral obtained in 1825, was 1,278,528 pounds; in 1826, 1,848,164; in 1827, 11,248,366. In the last year, 5,192,180 lbs. of lead have been made, leaving on hand mineral and ashes sufficient to make 2,116,000 pounds more. The value of the lead made in 1827, including the amount which will be obtained from unsmelted mineral, is estimated at $305,735 64, one-tenth of which, is paid as rent to the United States, making $30,573 56.

The superintendent says, "from an examination of the mineral region on the east bank of the Upper Mississippi, I am fully convinced of the richness of it. It extends at least one hundred miles from south to north, and from thirty to fifty east and west. Much of the soil is very fertile; some parts of it exceedingly rich; it lies high; is well watered, containing fine springs, but is not well timbered in general; there are districts of it, however, covered with groves of thriving timber well adapted to smelting the ore; and the mines are of easy access to the Mississippi, where fuel is abundant."

[Illinois Intelligencer.]

SINGULAR HEAD.

At the Royal Institute of France, on the 2d of October, M. Julia Fontenelle presented a head of a New Zealander in a complete state of preservation. The teeth were sound and complete: the hair very black, rough, long, and curled; the skin was of a yellow colour, and the tattooed surface was black, very regular, and smooth. The head appeared to be that of a man about 30 or 40 years old. Notwithstanding this, the sutures of the skull were perfectly ossified internally, which is seldom the case, excepting in the skulls of old persons. The occipital region was very large, its projection well marked, whilst the frontal cavity was narrow. There was a vertical bony septum, of more than two lines in height, in the interior of the skull, which the members of the Academy had an opportunity of seeing. This anatomical variety having only been observed in animals, the facial angle of this head, as well as of the inhabitants generally of New Zealand, being very narrow, the frontal cavity very limited, M. J. Fontenelle concludes, that this race may be considered as a sort of link between man and the orang outang. The head presented by M. J. Fontenelle was evidently not tanned, but had only been immersed in a solution of chloruret of sodium (marine salt,) and then slowly dried.

EXTRAORDINARY CRANIA.

In the cabinet of natural history at Marseilles, there is preserved the cranium of a man, named Borghini, of very extraordinary dimensions. He died at the age of fifty, and was not quite four feet high. His head measured three feet round the sides, and one foot from the summit to the base. The intellectual faculties of this individual were not in proportion to the quantity of brain which nature had bestowed upon him, for tradition has yet kept up the proverb of "as great a fool as Borghi-ni." When he arrived at the age of manhood, he was obliged to support his unwieldy head by means of cushions placed upon each shoulder. A Moor resided some years at Tunis, whose head was of a most unusual size. His nose was four inches long, and his mouth so capacious, that he could put into it a middling sized melon. This man was an idiot. [London Medical Gazette.]

GEOGRAPHY.

The following curious passage is found in an ancient geographer, Pytheas, of Marseilles:—

"In the proximity of Great Britain, on the north side, distant about six days' sail, there appears neither land nor water, nor air; but these three elements confounded, forms a substance, which cements in its composition, all the parts of the world. Neither vessels, nor persons on foot, can break this impenetrable obstacle."

This passage was treated as a fable by the Abbe de Longuechamp, and other learned men, but particularly by the Benedictine monks, who published the Literary History of France. The substance, however, alluded to in the above passage, is unquestionably that immense mass of eternal ice which environs the poles, and which no navigator could ever yet pass. So that what Cook and Le Maire have proved in our days by demonstration, that the ice forms an insurmountable barrier to any access to the North Pole, appears to have been known even in the time of Pytheas, 2000 years ago. And the learned Benedictines unjustly derided a man, who appeared to them to relate a fabulous story; but which the sequel has proved to be a well established fact. The works of many ancient authors abound with passages still held as fabulous, but which may yet, perhaps, prove to be perfectly natural truths.

CEMENT FOR BOILERS.

It is stated by a correspondent in the London Mechanics' Magazine, that a cement of Lime, (made from oyster shells,) and worked into a paste with the white of an egg, and used upon a cracked boiler ten years ago, which has been in constant use ever since, is now as firm as when first put on. It effectually stops the escape of gas through any aperture, when no other cement could be made to rest. The lime must be fresh and unslacked, and the cement applied as soon as mixed, otherwise it becomes solid. It will resist the united action of fire and water; and even the concentrated acids are stated to have little or no effect on it.

RAILWAY CAR.

A car has been constructed at Charleston for use on the Railway about to be commenced from that city to the interior of which the Courier speaks as follows:—"The car weighs upwards of one ton, and is now loaded with 47 bales of cotton, average in weight upwards of 300 lbs. each. The road, commencing on Wentworth-street, ascends, during the first ninety feet, in the proportion of 22 1-2 feet per mile. The remainder is on a level. It required 16 horses, 16 drays, and 16 hands, to convey the cotton to the spot, yet one car, one horse, and one hand, in addition to the weight of the car, is sufficient to move it with facility. The total weight, including the car, is between 15 and 16000 weight; notwithstanding, a single horse draws it with apparently less exertion and fatigue than either of the 16 horses, employed to bring it up, underneath."

THE GATHERER.

SHEEP DOGS OF BRAZIL.

For the purpose of shepherding a flock of one thousand, two cur-dogs are sufficient, bred up in the following mode:—As soon as they are whelped, the lambs of a ewe are killed, the puppies are put to her, and she suckles them until she becomes habituated to treat them as her young, when upon opening their eyes, and seeing no other benefactor, they attach themselves to her, and play with the lambs as if they were of the same species. Nothing is ever given them to eat: they are shut in the fold with the sheep, and, on obtaining strength and vigour to attend the flock, they are suffered to go at large, when they accompany it to the field. In a little time, and without more instruction, they are so familiarized with the sheep that they never separate from them. When it happens that a ewe lamb is in the field, and the lamb cannot accompany the mother, in consequence of its not yet having sufficient strength to follow her, one of the dogs watches near, and if he finds that the lamb cannot follow the mother to the flock, he carries it in his mouth, without doing it the least harm. No other animal or unknown person can approach the sheep of which these dogs are the guardians, without the risk of being attacked. The other domestic dogs and the hordes of the chimarro dogs, are the greatest enemies to the flock: against them and the birds of prey, which pick out the eyes of the lambs, the vigilance of the watch-dogs is requisite.

VICISSITUDES OF FORTUNE.

The inhabitants of Falkirk have a picturesque remembrance of seeing riderless horses, after the battle of Falkirk Moor, scampering through the lanes which give entrance to the town on that side—their saddles turned round below their bellies, and many of them trailing their intestines on the ground. A brewer succeeded in securing a beautiful and unwounded horse, which he afterwards reduced to the humble labour of dragging his professional sledge. One day, some years after the battle, when the once spirited animal had become a patient and worn out drudge, the brewer was filling the barrel with which it was loaded at the public well, when a troop of dragoons, which happened to be in the town, was called into order by the sound of the trumpet, close to the spot where it was standing. No sooner did the old hack hear that lively point of war, than totally forgetting its present duties, it scampered off along the street, rushed up to the troop, which was then just falling into line, and with irresistible force, clearing room for itself among the bystanders, took its place, sledge, barrel, brewer and all, in the midst of the ranks. The commander of troop, highly amused at the scene, patted it kindly on the head, observing, "Ah, I see you've been a soldier in your day," and gave orders for its being gently led out of the line. HAIDEE.

BY LORD BYRON.

That isle is now all desolate and bare;
Its dwellings down, its tenants past away;
None but her own and father's grave is there,
And nothing outward tells of human clay;
Ye could not know where lies a thing so fair,—
No stone is there to show, no tone to say
What was,—no dirge, except the hollow sea's,
Mourns o'er the beauty of the Cyclades.

But many a Greek maid in a loving song
Sighs o'er her name; and many an islander
With her sire's story makes the night less long:
Valour was his, and beauty dwelt with her;
If she loved rashly, her life paid for wrong—
A heavy price must all pay who thus err,
In some shape;—let none think to fly the danger,
For soon or late love is its own avenger.

PRACTICAL DIVINITY.

While a parson was standing at his door, smoking a pipe near a country village, he was accosted by a poor labouring man. The parson told him he made it a rule not to encourage idleness, but if the man would go into his garden and root up the weeds he would pay him for it. "That's all I want," said the poor man. "Well then come along with me and I'll show you what's to be done." When they were in the garden the reverend gentleman agreed to give the man a shilling for his trouble; but after the job was done, he thought sixpence enough for the time he had worked. The poor man being half starved and finding the other would give no more, agreed to take it provided the parson would teach him the Lord's Prayer, which he consented to do, and began "Our Father"—"What," said the labourer, "the Father of both." "Yes, Yes," said the parson, come repeat after me—"Our Father,"—"what" said the labourer, again, "your father and mine too? "to be sure," said the parson. "Well, then," returned the labourer, "you must be a confounded rogue to cheat your brother of sixpence."

PICTURE OF A LITERARY PARTY.

Stop till the cloth is removed. Then for the conversation and play of intellect; the electric flash of wit; the condensed sententious wisdom; those gentle and fertilizing distillations, that fall from the lips of highly gifted men, when they pause from their severe studies in pleasing converse with congenial spirits. Nothing of this. The master minds of the age talked, debated, and prosed; but not a word was uttered that was worth remembering. It might be a feast of reason, but it was fit only for a Barmecide. Nothing was served up at it but the husks and shells of old, worn out subjects; nor did the epigrammatic terseness in which they were expressed, atone for their staleness and vulgarity. It was Dulness herself presiding at her most chosen rites. Whether it was from her leaden influence, or that of the philosophick port, I returned yawning home, feelingly convinced that if literary men could make books, they were quite incompetent to make clubs. SEASONABLE COUNSELS.

In an almanack, dated from the Council-Room of a learned university and society, are the following trite remarks:—"Preservation of Health: December—The convivial meetings, and the heated rooms consequent upon them, are the sources of many diseases in this month. Warm clothing, temperance, and regular hours, are therefore essential. January—Chilblains are prevented by promoting circulation in the fingers and the feet, by friction. February—No person should take medicine in this month without advice. April—The best spring physick is sulphur and cream of tartar. July—Frequently change linen, and take off flannel which has been worn next the skin. November—The body must now be encased in flannel."

HEADS.

Two Scotch clergymen, who were not so long-headed as they themselves imagined, met one day at the turning of a street, and ran their heads together unawares. The shock was rather stunning to one of them. He pulled off his hat, and laying his hand on his forehead, said, "Sic a blow! my heed's a' ringing again." "Nae wonder," said his companion, "your heed was aye Boss (empty) that makes it ring; my heed disna ring a bit."—"How could it ring," said the other, "seeing it is cracket! Cracket vessels never ring." Each described the other to a T.

LORD SANDWICH.

Lord Sandwich, when dressed, had a dignified appearance; but to see him in the street, he had an awkward, careless gait. Two gentlemen observing him when at Leicester, one of them remarked, "I think it is Lord Sandwich coming;" the other replied, that he thought he was mistaken. "Nay," said the gentleman, "I am sure it is Lord Sandwich; for, if you observe, he is walking down both sides of the street at once." But Lord Sandwich gave a better anecdote of himself:—"When I was at Paris I had a dancing-master; the man was very civil, and on taking leave of him I offered him any service in London. 'Then,' said the man, bowing, 'I should take it as a particular favour if your Lordship would never tell any one of whom you learned to dance.'" [Cradock's Memoirs.]

MARCH OF INTELLECT.

The following is to be seen on a window in Poole's-buildings, Gray's inn-lane London:—A Day School kept hear nite and morning. Children taught reeding, riting, sifring, and rithmittick. Books kept and closed. Caps, Gowns, Coats, and Pennyfoals made and Re-Paired. Letters rote. Petitions and Leases drawn.

A MODEST LADY.

A would be modest lady pulled the sleeve of her under garment over her wrist when a physician was about feeling her pulse. The doctor took the corner of his coat and laid it upon his patient's arm, saying "a linen pulse should have a woollen physician."

POPULR TALES.

THE COFFIN-MAKERS OF EISENACH.

[From Tales of an Antiquary.]

They who have known Eisenach for many years past, must remember a tall wooden pillar, standing near its entrance, on the road from Langensalz, bearing a carved and painted black 'scutcheon, surmounted by a baron's helmet and mantling, and charged with the effigy of a hideous red-haired dwarf, in a very ancient German habit, employed in making a coffin, over which he was looking with malicious joy, holding up a nail, and pointing to a scroll above him, on which was inscribed the words,—"Only seven are wanting!" Below the shield could be traced, by good eyes, the name of Adeliche Stark; though his story, and the date of its events, were entirely obliterated; yet as it was certain that every visiter to Eisenach used particularly to inquire about that strange armorial ensign, old Singpsalm, the Lutheran clerk, used generally to satisfy them by the following story; which is the more curious, as it seems to contain an allusion to smoking, at the least two centuries before it became general in Europe.

"In the earlier days of Eisenach," he would say, for every body knows that it is a town which existed even before the time of the great Friedrich Rothbart, "there used to live in it an idle fellow named Adeliche Stark, commonly called through the principality der Landstreicher, or the Vagabond, because he was one of those individuals who, though they are continually padding the hoof after employment, always pray heartily that they may never find it. Froschie Stark, the father of this hero, was as industrious a woodman as ever lifted an axe in the prince's forest lands; but neither advice, nor example, his mother Trudchen's entreaties, nor his uncle Stiebel's stick, could make him any thing else than Adeliche the Vagabond.

"But it is not to be thought that idleness alone was the cause of his not taking to work; no, truly, for he always asserted that it was simply his being too clever. There was not a man in all Thuringia who knew so many wild stories and songs as Adeliche; and the consequence was, that he was so much in request at the bier-schenkes, that he could at last do little else but wander from one to another, where his time and his legends were recompensed by black beer, straw, and potatoes. It is not wonderful that such a life should at last clothe him in a jerkin of rags, with a pair of nether-stocks of the same silk, which procured him the new surname of 'the Ragged Storyteller;' whilst his constitution being daily undermined, it was usual to say of him when he was seen seated in his glory on the ale-house bench,—'Ah! there's Stark the Landstreicher knocking another nail in his coffin!'

"But so delighted was Master Adeliche with this kind of life, that there was no man more contented, and very few so merry. Having nothing of his own, all that was given him was gain; and whilst he was telling his stories, if he could but get some generous traveller to bestow on him a flask of better wine, he not only made them happy, but became so himself in spite of his nakedness. However, to speak heaven's honest truth, as a biographer should do, this love of 'a jolly full bottle' was at once the spring and continuance of his ruin, since he ever liked a kegel-platz, or bowling-alley, better than a church; and Wenzel Malzmann, the publican, better than Lorenz Puchert the priest. Dame Trudchen had nothing to answer for concerning him, since her advice was equally unceasing and useless; and one of her principal arguments against his intemperance was grounded on the effect which it must have upon his health, and was expressed in the common proverb, 'Adeliche Stark, Adeliche Stark, you're knocking another nail into your coffin!'

"It is said to have been in the beginning of winter, after a long conversation, concluded with this ancient saw, that Adeliche set off to Malzmann's to decide upon a brewing which was that evening to be tried in full conclave. There were to be Claus Brommell, the charcoal-burner, and Karl Kranesnech, the tall goat-herd, and little Velten

Schwill, the swine-keeper, and I know not how many others, all good men and true, to pass the night with him; for he had promised to regale them with some of his best stories, and as he could command a truss in the stable he was not expected back till the morning.

"I never heard whether it were by the strength of the getranke, or the astonishing nature of Adeliche's tales, but it is said that about midnight, his host and his companions were all fast asleep, some on the floor, and some on the bier-bank remaining immovable under the roughest means which he used to wake them. A loud voice was now heard without, calling on host, house, and ostler, for shelter and provender; and Adeliche, after again stoutly though vainly kicking and shaking his friends, resolving that Wenzel should not lose a customer for the want of a little exertion, took up the lanthorn and opened the door, where he saw a remarkable short and stout man leading an immense black horse, to which he bore somewhat of the proportion of a bear's whelp to an elephant. It was a strange-looking night abroad, for whilst the distant prospect lay beneath a most beautiful moonlight sky, the planet itself was veiled by a dark purple cloud which hung like a curtain half drawn up, immediately in front and over the house, the rays of golden light falling in streams from beneath it. Adeliche at first stared a little at the traveller, but as he spoke in a blunt and good-humoured voice, he lighted him first to put up his horse, and then ushered him into the Bier-schenke. 'How's this, mine host!' said the stranger, looking at the slumbering peasants, 'is your ale so potent, or do ye always slumber thus soundly? I trow that I called lustily at the door, and my horse stamped and snorted loud enough to have waked half Eisenach.' 'In good truth,' answered Adeliche, 'I know not what ails them all, for it can hardly be the score of ale-cans that we've emptied. We met here to-night to take a draught of a fresh brewing with our host Wenzel,—that's he in the goatskin jerkin lying across yonder table,—and I'd been telling them some old tales of the Nibelungen; but about midnight, as I guess, they all fell asleep, and though I shook them soundly when I heard you call, there was no moving them any more than a full hogshead!'—'No,' returned the traveller, tossing one off a bench on to the ground, and kicking another out of his way, 'they won't wake at present, I'll warrant you; for they've been driving another nail in their coffins!'

"Again Adeliche stared at the guest, whom he now observed to be dressed in a more ancient habit than any he had ever yet seen: his face had a singularly ugly and sarcastick expression, whilst a profusion of red hair, and immense pointed ears, like a satyr's, did not greatly improve it. But though Adeliche might have some odd thoughts about the traveller, his frank and good-humoured manner soon gave him confidence, which increased when he drew from his pouch some excellent provision and wine, and invited Adeliche to sit down and partake with him. It proved a noble feast to our story-teller, who endeavoured to requite it by several of his most interesting romances; at the end of which the stranger said,—'You tell these tales bravely, though I've heard them before, and methinks you might be better employed, for the song and the bier-kanne do but drive another nail into your coffin! But you speak of the Nibelungen-land, I promise you there's some strange things there, that few people wot of.' 'So I should guess,' replied Adeliche, 'since nobody knows where it is; for some tell us it's in Norway, and some say it's in Burgundy.' 'Be it where it may,' rejoined the traveller, 'I came thence not an hour past. But you've played the host mightily well to-night, and I've a liking for you; now this odd thing I brought from the Nibelungen-land, and, if you use it rightly, 'twill make you tell a better tale than you ever yet heard of.' The stranger again felt in his pouch, and produced a short bent tube of some kind of yellow metal, having a large bowl and cover at one end, to which he put a lighted match, and then passing the instrument to Adeliche, continued,—'There, put the silver bit in your mouth, and suck away as you would with a reed in a Rhenish cask.'

"The simile was so perfectly adapted to Adeliche's understanding, that he soon became acquainted with the strange-looking tube, which seemed to inspire him with a feeling of delicious intoxication; and for awhile he thought himself in Paradise, clothed like a prince, and formed like an angel. Then, as he continued to inhale the fragrance of the burning perfume, he thought that a vast cloud of smoke arose from it, which conveyed him in his own shape and dress, along with his short companion, to the side of a mountain, in a wild forest, which echoed with the deafening sound of ten thousand hammers. Whilst he was looking round him at the perfect solitude of the spot, and wondering where the workmen were concealed, the traveller said to him,—'Well, how like ye the Nibelungen-land! this is the Knocking mountain; and yonder,'—he continued, pointing up to a terrific-looking cavity, at a great height, in a very precipitous part of it,—'Yonder is the goat's gateway; climb up it, and you'll see that which you won't forget for one while.' 'I get up there!' exclaimed Adeliche, 'why there's not room on the rock for a goat to set one foot! and for climbing to it,—I could as soon mount the steeple of Eisenach outside!'—'Try man, try,' returned his companion; 'that perfume of mine has made you stronger than you think for;' and so Adeliche set out cautiously and slowly, and at length stood safely before the goat's gateway.

"Upon looking in, he saw a vast cavern lighted by immense lamps of brass, and containing some thousands of persons, shaped and habited like his conductor, all employed in making coffins; some being engaged in cutting them out, and others in joining them, the nailing of which produced a tremendous noise, to which the cavern replied with its countless echoes. When he was able to look more steadfastly, he saw that each coffin was marked with some person's name, and that as they were finished they seemed to be sent away through a passage in the earth. He next observed that some of the names were familiar to him; and he felt a strange sensation of fear, when he read those of Velten Schwill, Karl Kranesnech, and Wenzel Malzmann his host, on coffins that were nearly finished; from which he half began to think that their heavy sleep would never have a waking. But he also observed that there were other coffins scarcely begun, and on one of these he read the name of Andreas Beyspiel, a hearty old shepherd, renowned throughout Thuringia for his temperance and piety. His age was not certainly known, but some said he was more than an hundred, yet he looked as youthful as if he were only a quarter of it.

"Whilst Adeliche was making these remarks, one of the most malicious-looking dwarfs in the whole crew, whose work was almost finished, called out to him—'Ho! honest friend, art there! wilt buy thee a coffin now! here's a sound one with thy name upon it,' continued he, showing him the lid, which had 'Adeliche Stark' fairly graven upon it. Dost know, now, that I've been these twenty years making this for thee! and I've often heard thy mother say thou wert driving a nail in thy coffin, when thou wert off to the bier-schenke.' 'And art thou making that black box for me?' said the trembling Adeliche. 'Aye,' said the dwarf, 'I shall send it home to you when it's finished, and somehow the owner don't live many hours afterwards. I had a round three hundred nails to drive into it at first; I hammered in one for every night you were carousing with your mates; and now,' added he, holding up a large nail and speaking in a solemn voice, 'only seven are wanting!' Adeliche heard no more, for whether it were the vapours of the perfume in his head, or the dwarf's terrific words, he knew not, but he fell backwards, and on his recovery found himself alone in the forest, as wretched and ragged as ever.

"With the most perfect recollection of all which had passed, he wandered on through the wild wood, till he reached an iron-forge belonging to a baron of Lower-Saxony, and as he had not a single coin in his pouch, and probably but a short time to live, he offered himself in a sort of desperate fit to blow at the furnace. In these old days there were no bellows, and so one of the smiths used to blow through an iron pipe; and whether this occupation gave him more breath, or temperance and labour made him more healthy, he could not tell, but he certainly began to look quite another man. He now wore a good coarse suit of clothes, and got together a little money; whilst years passed away and he heard no more of the coffin-makers, though he never forgot them. It was clear to Adeliche, that these dwarfs could be no other than the ancient inhabitants of Germany, who were driven into the forest and mountains, when Attila, king of the Huns, overran the country about the year of God 432. They are said to have taken with them all their great riches and wonderful secrets, and to be still living in the Nibelungen-land; but how true that may be I can't pretend to say. One thing, however, Adeliche had learned from their mountain-workshop, and that was the making of wooden bellows, by placing one box over another with a tube at one end, and then shutting them forcibly together. He made these somewhat in the form of coffins; and they raised so furious a blast, that many believed he had a familiar fiend confined in a box to blow for him as long as he lived. However, that was all an idle tale; but Adeliche told his secret only to the baron and his fellows, who kept it so well, that to this day the name of the inventor is doubtful; though it is acknowledged that wooden bellows were first used in the Hartz Forest. Schluter says, that the Bishop of Bamberg devised them; Andreas Reyher gives the credit to Klaus Schelhorn, a miller of Schmalebuche; and Calvor makes it out that Ludwig Pfannenschmidt, bellows-maker to the Hartz, first brought them out of Thuringia, which seems to trace them to the descendants of Adeliche Stark. When the baron died, he bequeathed the iron-forge to Adeliche in recompense for his invention, by which, and by the discovery of a golden wedge or two in his furnace, doubtless sent him from Nibelungen-land, he grew so rich, that he bought an estate in his native country, and set up the pillar and escutcheon to record his story. He died perfectly hearty somewhere about the age of 137; having repeated his fortunes to his great-grandchildren, and always closing his narrative with 'Idleness and the tankard drive the nails of our coffins, but temperance and labour will build us a palace.'"

BIOGRAPHY.

BELZONI.

John Belzoni the son of a poor barber at Padua, was born in the year 1788. When a boy, he worked at his father's trade, but had always a desire to see the world. At thirteen years of age he left his home, taking his brother Anthony with him, and made his way in the direction of Rome as far as the Appenines. Arrived at this point, and being almost in a state of destitution, the alarms of Anthony, who sat upon a rock, and refused to proceed farther, compelled the young traveller to return. Three years after, however, having enlisted a new companion, he started a second time, and then reached Rome in earnest. What Belzoni did at Rome is uncertain. It has been said that he applied himself to the study of hydraulicks, but we should doubt whether he ever received any regular instructions in that science. In the end, however, being fertile in resources, he took up the trade of a monk, for want of any better means of livelihood, and remained in that condition until the period of the revolution. Having laid aside the cowl, Belzoni returned to Padua; but finding but little prospect there, in 1800 he proceeded to Holland, proposing to instruct the Dutch in the science of hydraulicks. Apparently, however, there was some miscalculation in this arrangement; the Dutch turned out to know more of hydraulicks than their Italian master; and at the end of twelve months the traveller again appeared in Italy, from whence he proceeded to England in the year 1803. By this time his colossal figure began to develop itself, and his personal strength was in proportion to his exterior appearance. He married a young English woman, and being still something at a loss for a profession, he determined to profit by the curiosity, which his personal powers excited, and to exhibit from town to town through Great Britain his hydraulick experiments and feats of muscular strength. It was a curious spectacle to see this colossus coming forward on the stage, carrying sometimes as many as twenty men, placed in different ways upon his body.

This resource, however did not last long. The people got tired, and Belzoni was obliged to seek his fortune elsewhere. In 1812 he went with his wife to Portugal, and offered his services at the great theatre of San Carlos, in Lisbon. The Portuguese speculation did well for a time, for a pantomime, called Sampson, was brought out, and Belzoni attracted immense audiences in the principal character, but at length the people here got tired too, and Belzoni went to Malta, where he offered his services as a professor of hydraulicks to Ismael Gibraltair, agent of the Pacha of Egypt. Belzoni's exhibitions as a posture master, terminated at this period; but though he was engaged to the Pacha of Egypt, his first essay as a professor of hydraulicks was rather unfortunate. He had been presented to the Viceroy, who employed him to construct a machine to water the gardens of Sautra, a villa which he possessed on the banks of the Nile. The work was performed, and according to Belzoni's account successfully; but the event was unfortunate, and had nearly proved tragical. The Viceroy took it into his head to put fifteen men, besides Belzoni's Irish servant upon the machine when it was in motion. The result was that an accident occurred. The men were thrown, Belzoni's servant had his thigh broken, and, but for the exertion of his master's personal strength, would have been entirely destroyed. The superstitious temper of the Turks led them to regard this event as ominous; and that which, perhaps, went as far in finally knocking up the project, the Pacha discovered that it cost him more to water his gardens with the new machine than it had done by the old system with the bullocks.

Fortunately for Belzoni, he fell at this time into the hands of the consul, Mr. Salt, who, perceiving his capacities, employed him in those works by the performance of which he afterwards acquired so much reputation. His physical powers fitted him admirably for the execution of the new duties intrusted to him. Dressed in the Turkish garb, he ruled the Egyptian peasants with the gravity of a Cadi or an Aga; and it is said that he did not scruple to administer personal correction for any failures of duty of which they might be guilty. In his temper, however, and manners, he was mild in general, and unassuming; and M. Depping describes his peaceable demeanour as rather curiously contrasted with his Herculean figure and appearance. "One day," says Mr. Depping, relating his first interview with the eastern traveller, "in the autumn of the year 1821, I saw a man of extraordinary stature enter my house. He was built like a Hercules, and his head touched the top of the door as he came in. His shoulders were broad, and his hair thick and bushy; but his countenance was mild, and there was nothing fierce or alarming in his demeanour. He carried a book under his arm, and was followed by the publisher, Galignani; from which circumstances I instantly guessed that he was an author, though certainly I had never seen one of such dimensions. If the Patagonians wrote, possibly this fellow might be discovered among them. This Hercules, however, explained to me, with great mildness and simplicity the object of his visit, which was to get a translation made of his Egyptian travels, which had just appeared in English. At the time, I knew very little of the man, even by report; but I appreciated his character as soon as I looked over his work; and I was still more astonished when I became acquainted with the detail of his early life; and found the individual who had begun by walking upon stilts, and playing the mountebank for bread, concluded by opening the pyramids of Egypt, and digging out from under a mountain of sand the giantick temple of Ipsamboul. MISCELLANY.

MAN THE GREATEST OF ALL MIRACLES.

[From Buck's Beauties and Sublimities of Nature.]

No bee has ever introduced a single improvement in the construction of its cell; no beaver in the style of its architecture; and no bird in the formation of its nest. They respectively arrive at perfection by intuition. Man could form a cell as geometrically as a bee; but he can collect neither the honey nor the wax. He surpasses the beaver; and can collect the materials for the nest of a bird: but the utmost effort of his art will not enable him to put it together. He can neither make the leaf of a tree, nor the petal of a flower; nor can he, when he finds them already formed to his hand, inclose the one in a calyx or fold the other in a bud.

Beasts are covered with hair, with wool, and with fur; birds with feathers; fishes with scales; and insects by a skin so hard, that it not only supplies their want of bones, but preserves their warmth. Of these, the coverings of birds and fishes are the most perfect. There is a species of crab which clothes itself in the discarded shell of a lobster; but man is the only animal, that can regularly form a covering for itself. He is the only animal, also, to whom nature has intrusted the element of fire; an agent, which is the most wonderful of the elements, and which still baffles, by its opposite effects, the researches of philosophy.

Whether we consider man as one complete bodily machine, or in his relative parts of head, arms, hands, fingers, thighs, legs, and feet; bones, ligaments, and membranes; veins, arteries, glands, muscles, tendons, and nerves; the heart, the blood, the stomach, and the mechanism, by which all those members are connected, and the nice expedients, employed to convert the food into chyle, to blend it with the blood, and to diffuse it through the entire system; it may truly be said, that man presents to the astonished imagination, an attesting wonder! But if we extend the contemplation to his sensations in youth, his reason in age, and his capacities in every stage of manhood, the visible signs, by which speech is embodied, and by which sounds are realized, are found to be inadequate of media, by which to express the excellence of the wonderful machine.

In fact, man needs not blush to be proud, since he is capable of expressing all his wants and all his ideas by the medium of four and twenty characters; of calculating numbers to comparative infinity with only nine numerical figures; and with only seven separate notes, to elicit, on musical instruments, almost innumerable combinations of sound.

But the universe is replete with miracles: from the first source of calorick to the simple grain of sand, which contains animals, to which it is a world, as large as the whole circumference of the globe is to us. For nature constitutes a mirror, in which the Eternal seems to allow himself to be seen greatest in his smallest works; while, though a sublime mystery envelops and conceals, in awful solitude, the first principles of life and reason; yet, as it is the privilege of a great mind to be capable of seeing much, where common minds see little, the most apparently insignificant object will frequently present to an enlarged imagination more than all the associations, connected with Raphael's school of Athens.

TAKING OF EDINBURGH CASTLE.

[From Scott's Tales of a Grandfather.]

While Robert Bruce was gradually getting possession of the country, and driving out the English, Edinburgh, the principal town of Scotland, remained with its strong castle, in possession of the invaders. Sir Thomas Randolph was extremely desirous to gain this important place, but as you know, the castle is situated on a very steep and lofty rock, so that it is difficult or almost impossible even to get up to the foot of the walls, much more to climb over them. So, while Randolph was considering what was to be done, there came to him a Scottish gentleman, named Francis, who had joined Bruce's standard, and asked to speak with him in private. He then told Randolph that in his youth he had lived in the castle of Edinburgh, and that his father had then been keeper of the fortress. It happened at that time that Francis was much in love with a lady, who lived in a part of the town beneath the castle which is called the Grassmarket. Now, as he could not get out of the castle by day to see his mistress; he had practised a way of clambering by night down the castle crag on the south side, and returning up at pleasure; when he came to the foot of the wall he made use of a ladder to get over it, as it was not very high on that point, those who built it having trusted to the steepness of the crag. Francis had gone and come so frequently in this dangerous manner, that though it was now long ago, he told Randolph that he knew the road so well, that he would undertake to guide a small party of men, by night, to the bottom of the wall, and as they might bring ladders with them, there would be no difficulty in scaling it. The great risk was, that of their being discovered by the watchmen while in the act of ascending the cliff, in which case every man of them must have perished. Nevertheless Randolph did not hesitate to attempt the adventure. He took with him only thirty, (you must be sure they were chosen for activity and courage,) and came one dark night to the foot of the crag, which they began to ascend under the guidance of Francis, who went before them, upon his hands and feet, upon one cliff, and down another, where there was scarce room to support themselves. All the while these thirty men were obliged to follow in a line, one after the other, by a path that was fitter for a cat than a man. The noise of a stone falling, or a word spoken from one to another, would have alarmed the watchmen. They were obliged therefore, to move with the greatest precaution. When they were far up the crag, and near the foundation of the wall, they heard the guards going their rounds, to see that all was safe in and about the castle. Randolph and his party had nothing for it but to lie close and quiet each man under such crag as he happened to be placed, and trust that the guards would pass by without noticing them. And while they were waiting in breathless alarm, they got a new cause of fright. One of the soldiers of the castle, willing to startle his comrades, suddenly threw a stone from the wall, and cried out, "Aha, I see you well." The stone came thundering down over the head of Randolph and his men, who naturally thought themselves discovered. If they had stirred, or made the slightest noise, they would have been entirely destroyed, for the soldiers above might have killed every man of them, merely by rolling down stones. But being courageous and chosen men, they remained quiet, and the English soldiers, who thought their comrade was merely playing them a trick, (as indeed he was,) passed on without further examination. Then Randolph and his men got up, and came in haste to the foot of the wall, which was not above twice a man's height in that place. They planted the ladders they had brought, and Francis mounted first to show them the way: Sir Andrew Grey, a brave knight, followed him, and Randolph himself was the third man who got over. Then the rest followed. When once they were within the walls, there was not so much to do, for the garrison were asleep and unarmed, excepting the watch, who were speedily destroyed. Thus was Edinburgh castle taken in the year 1312-13.

A GRECIAN HEROINE.

[From Blaquiere's Letters from Greece.]

Sophia Condulimo was the wife of an officer of distinction, who fell during the siege of Missolonghi. When the Turks entered the town she was among the crowd who sought to escape the fury of the enemy by quitting the walls, accompanied by her son and daughter. They had not proceeded far, when the mother perceived a party of Turks coming towards them: horrified at the fate which was to befall her daughter, a beautiful girl of 16, she turned to her son, who was armed, and told him to shoot his sister, lest she should fall a victim of Musulman brutality! The youth instantly obeyed the dreadful mandate, drew a pistol from his girdle, and lodged the contents, four large slugs, in his sister's head, when she fell to the ground apparently a lifeless corpse. Thus relieved from a charge which the mother could not preserve, herself and son endeavoured to take refuge in a cavern. Just as they were entering it, a grape shot struck the boy in the leg. Scarcely had the mother succeeded in dragging him after her, than a piquet of Turkish cavalry came up, one of the party drawing a pistol, pointed it at the temple of poor Sophia, who, suddenly rising up, looked at the Turk and exclaimed, "Barbarian! do not you see that I am a woman!" This appeal had the desired effect, and both the mother and the son were spared to be conducted into slavery. The most extraordinary part of this story remains to be told. Being among two hundred ransomed by the continental Greek committees, they were sent over to Corfu, and placed with the others. Judge of the mother's astonishment on finding that her imaginary murdered daughter was among the number. To be brief, on perceiving she was a female, the Turks carried her back to Missolonghi, bound up her wounds, which had all the appearance of being mortal, but she recovered, and her story having attracted the attention of the ransoming agents, the interesting Cresula was rescued from bondage, and, what is more, thus singularly destined to be once more restored to the arms of her disconsolate parent.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1828.

Post masters and secretaries of chapters and lodges are requested to act as our agents.

We learn with astonishment that some respectable masons in the county of Saratoga have thought it advisable to recommend to the members of the different lodges in that county to discontinue their operations, and to surrender their charters. In conformity to this recommendation, we understand the lodge at Ballston Spa, has come to that determination. The Saratoga Sentinel, gives the following reason for so extraordinary a step; "It is, briefly, that the present state of public excitement on the subject of masonry is such, that it produces discord in neighbourhoods, and among members of the same family, and even in the church of Christ; to allay or to prevent which, is one of the fundamental principles of the order."

Without pretending to a superiour discrimination in the matters which relate to the influence of freemasonry on the moral character of community, we must dissent from our brethren of Saratoga county, and pronounce this step at once premature, imprudent, and inconsistent with the reasons assigned for it. The very enemies of the order will pick at this reason, and exultingly demand,—"Why then abandon it?—If the fundamental principles of the order are to allay or to prevent the evils mentioned, how much more will it allay or prevent them by dissolving the union that those principles have united? Or do the principles and the body form two distinct parts, which can be severed, or put together, as conscience or policy may demand?" Such must be the argument of our enemies, in this case, if, indeed, they ever do descend from the sublimity of rant and abuse into the level arena of argument. But what does it become a brother to say to this deliberate and open abandonment of the cause he so much venerates? When before did public excitement ever deter firm and faithful men from a good cause? When was the truth left to the mercy of its contemners, by those who wished to see its ultimate triumph? Will not these timid brethren incur the character of being brow-beaten, when, after this feverish state of the public mind has subsided, they again assume the badge and privileges of brotherhood?

In the reason given above, there is a very striking example of the inefficacy of a religious or a masonick institution without the energy to enforce its proper discipline. It is stated that the public excitement produces discord among neighbours and among members of the same family. Now, brethren of that district, we ask you one simple question, which we beg of you to put to your consciences. In your hands have been the discipline of our order; how have you answered for your duty to the brotherhood in the exercise of this discipline? Neighbours and members of the same family quarrel to maintain the principles of freemasonry;—and instead of admonishing and exhorting with brethren thus offending, or even, when irreclaimable, of suspending them from the privileges of the lodge, the influence and example of the whole body, together with its salutary authority, must be given up, and its members left to wrangle on with the enemies of the order, unadvised, unadmonished, and unchecked! A neighbour, a husband, a father, or a son, who flies to bitterness and invective with his relatives and associates, to defend the order, no matter how much reviled, is a subject for the sharpest reproof from the brotherhood, if he belongs to their body. But the reason extends further. Even into the church of Christ this question carries its discord! Is there then no discipline in the church? Shall brethren in the strong kindred of christian brotherhood be suffered to revile and scandalize each other? and the church unable to avert an evil of such magnitude? Surely then the day we live in is a time for universal peace. If every social compact must give way to such difficulties, why shall we not with the same propriety dissolve our constitution, because some disaffected intriguers are jealous of its protection? Why shall we not dismember our great confederate republic, because the people cannot all agree in a candidate for its supreme magistrate? And why shall not the holy church of Christ declare itself extinct, because it is agitated by enemies without and conflicting opinions within?

BEETHOVEN. Many in this country, who have admired the exquisitely finished compositions of this great musician, have not even known the author by name. Much less has it been the fortune of American amateurs to read the music of the soul, which was the life, the happiness, and the torture of Beethoven. It is too common that the mind which nature has made the receptacle of the most exquisite musical taste, is rendered a desert, by the vanity, or the ignorance which accompany it. We are led to condemn the construction put upon the expression of Shakspeare, when he speaks of "music in the soul;" for we have a better opinion of that attribute than to believe so pure an intellect as Shakspeare's, would identify this idea with that taste for sound, which is often the property of the veriest clown. There is a music which ear never heard,—which only can be felt,—which even the voiceless elements have power to waken into extatic melody to the human soul. In a word, whatever may be said of the songs of supernatural spirits, may be properly exemplified by the idea of "music in the soul."

Beethoven was afflicted with the greatest natural evil which could befall a musical amateur,—deafness. The consequence of this infirmity, was a shyness, and a dislike of society which his relatives attributed to a morbid and misanthropic state of mind. Being dangerously ill in the year 1802, and having a kind of superstitious impression that his end was near, he wrote, with his own hand, a document which has recently been given to the public, under the name of Beethoven's Will.

In this paper, he exculpates himself from the charge of misanthropy, and leads those who were accustomed to look with contempt on his shyness and apparent insociability, to sentiments of the most exalted pity.

"When I ventured," says the sufferer, "to appear in society, I seemed to myself a kind of excommunicated being. If circumstances compelled me to appear in the presence of strangers, an indescribable agitation seized me; I was tortured by the fear of being rendered conspicuous by my infirmity only."

It is natural to suppose that a mind like his could not but impart its tone of melancholy to the powers of animal existence. By the advice of his physician, he retired to the country; yet here his malady did not find the relief which ordinarily is felt in a rural retirement. The beauties of the country are to be heard as well as seen; and our musician was subject to the same deprivation here as elsewhere.

"How bitter," says he "was the mortification I experienced, when some one near me would stand listening to the tones of a flute, which I could not hear; or to the shepherd's song, sounding from the valley, not one note of which I could distinguish! Such occurrences had the effect of driving me almost to despair: nay, even raised gloomy thoughts in my mind of seeking relief in self destruction. It was nothing but my art restrained me; it appeared impossible for me to quit the world, till I had accomplished the objects I felt myself, as it were, destined to fulfil."

But in his postscript, is his true pathos of spirit more clearly expressed.

"Thus then do I bid you farewell—and with heartfelt sorrow too! Yes, the delightful hope of being restored to health, and the use of my faculties, which till now I had never ceased to cherish, has entirely abandoned me, as the leaves in autumn forsake the tree, leaving it naked and forlorn. Even so am I deserted; and as I came into life, so do I go out of it. Even the inspiring delight which overflowed my soul in the fine season of spring has fled. Oh! that Providence would but permit one single day of pure joy to shine upon me as before; for, alas, too long is it since the interior voice of unmixed delight has spoken to my bosom. When, when, oh Father of Goodness! shall I again taste happiness in the temple of nature, and in the society of man? Never? Ah, no! that would be too severe!"

Look;—listen;—ye insensible masses of clay, who wear the form, and assume the title of men! Forbear to vent the innate cruelty of your nature on beings whose sorrows ye can never feel. Yet be the humiliating truth known, that far more intolerable is the highest enjoyment of such sordid souls, than even the deepest gloom that can darken a soul like that of Beethoven.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE LADIES MAGAZINE. This truly interesting periodical, published monthly in Boston, and edited by Mrs. SARAH J. HALE, is one of the few literary works which we can with confidence recommend to our friends and patrons as worthy their particular notice. The talents of Mrs. Hale, as a writer, both in prose and verse, are too well known to need our commendation. Suffice it to say, that her reputation as a writer is well sustained in this work, and that the lover of literature who is governed by a correct taste, will not fail of receiving a rational and complete satisfaction by the perusal of the Ladies' Magazine. The contents of the March number are,—Sketch of a beauty; Sketches of American character, No. 3; Accomplishments; Notice of Gallaudet's Address on Female education; Legend of the White Mountains. CRITICAL NOTICES:—"Blue Stocking Hall;" "Flirtation;" "The well spent Hour." ORIGINAL POETRY:—Stanzas written on journeying in the Low Country of South Carolina; The Sacrifice; The two Maidens; The old Elm Tree; The Dream; The Departed; Children at their Winter Sports; Sonnet—to Marianne.

Mrs. Hale is a widow, with five children,—and besides the claims which her talents and industry have upon the patronage of the publick, to our patrons we recommend her as the widow of a worthy brother,—and such a claim, though scoffed at by our hypocritical opponents, will not be unregarded by the man who unites the character of a scholar and a mason. We need hardly acquaint our readers, that we shall be proud of the opportunity to serve both them and Mrs. Hale, by becoming agent for the work. The Ladies' Magazine is printed in the pamphlet form, of forty-eight pages, at three dollars a year, payable in advance or on the delivery of the third number;—making two volumes per annum of about three hundred pages each. Subscriptions will be attended to at our office, where a copy of the work is kept for the inspection of such as wish to satisfy themselves of its merit.

¶ We have received "an Address on the Character and Services of De Witt Clinton," delivered at Nashville Tennessee, March 11, 1828, at the request of the Grand Chapter of Tennessee; by WILLIAM GIBBS HUNT, General Grand Marshal of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, and Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter of Tennessee. We have not had time to give it a perusal, but shall present it to our readers as soon as circumstances will permit, knowing that the character and talents of the author will entitle it to their attention.

¶ Proposals have been issued at Pittsburgh for publishing the Masonick Souvenir and Pittsburgh Literary Gazette, devoted to Freemasonry, Literature, Science, the Arts, &c., by Lewis F. W. Andrews, of that city. It will be issued weekly on a fine super-royal sheet, in the quarto form, and in a style of extra neatness,—advertisements excluded,—at three dollars per annum, payable always in advance. No subscription received for less than a year.—Agents will be allowed every ninth copy gratis, or one dollar on every three subscriptions, for which the cash is forwarded. It is with pleasure we see this accession about to be made to the media of masonick intelligence. The most permanent as well as the most efficient organ of light is the press; for by that, when its object is to disseminate the truth, every specious disguise of bigotry and intolerance is torn off, and the foe to intellectual light, "to be hated needs but to be seen."

TABLE TALK.

"How strange it is," said a lady, "that fashionable parties are called routs! Why, rout signifies the defeat of an army, where all are put to flight, or to the sword." "Not improperly named," replied a clergyman, "for by them whole families are often routed out of house and home."—At the trial of a man for stealing a pair of boots, the judge asked the witness who seized the prisoner,—"What did he say when you caught him?" "He said, sir, that he took the boots in joke," answered the witness. "And pray how far did he carry the joke?" demanded the judge. "About forty yards, please your honour," said the witness. —A sporting gentleman passing along the street, observed on a door, the separate names of a physician and a surgeon, and remarked that the incident reminded him of a double barrellled gun; for if one misses the other is sure to kill.—Thurlow Weed, of the anti-masonick humbug, at Rochester, will not support Solomon Southwick for governor. Now, if this anti-masonick fever be genuine, it is strange that the very father of the patriotick policy is to be thus neglected.—The Waterford Chronicle, (Ireland,) renders the exploits of Leander, Lord Byron, and even Malgherita Spolecina, almost contemptible, by the relation of a recent instance of female determination. "Last night about ten o'clock, a young female was observed on the parade ground, standing in rather a forlorn attitude upon the brink of the river. After a moment or two, she proceeded to take off her clothes; but before she had quite unrobed herself, a sailor from the brig Apollo, who had observed her with astonishment, and suspected her intentions, rushed from the vessel and caught the unfortunate creature, at the moment she was about to plunge into the river. She stated that she was an English girl, and that she was going to swim after her lover, who was gone to America.—Some time in May last, a body, supposed to be that of Henry Martin, a printer, was found dead on the road, in Georgia. He was supposed to have died in a fit, while on his way to visit his parents. The corpse was recognized by the parents, relatives, and many personal acquaintances, of Henry Martin, and at the funeral a sermon was preached to a numerous audience. Yet the identical Henry Martin is still living, and was very recently at the office the Sentinel, in Burlington, Vt. on his way to visit his mourning parents.

POETRY.

FOR THE MASONICK RECORD AND SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

TO MATILDA.

My daughter,—lovely visions meet me
When I think of thee,
And spurn at time and space to greet me
With thine artless glee;
In sleep while thou perhaps art sinking
At thy mother's side,
Thy father is awake and thinking
Of his infant pride.

And in thy heart,—though I forget it—
Shall this token rest;
So pure a love will never let it
Wander from thy breast;
And when in silence I am sleeping,
Thou wilt lean above
My grassy couch, and there with weeping,
Read thy father's love.

I sighed to watch the tear just gushing
Down thy little cheek,
And sudden through my brain came rushing
Thoughts I dared not speak!
There is within that infant sorrow,
Brilliant though it shine,
The germ of grief which shall tomorrow
Spring to growth like mine.

Yes; though all outward likeness vanish
As thy youth retires,
Time never from thy breast can banish
Warmth that was thy sire's;
And to that warmth, the false world's favour,
Or the cold world's breath,
Comes with a chill which blasts forever,
Like the frost of death!

But smile thou on, my little gay one,—
Smile, and joy thy fill;
No grief of thine would now allay one
Throe of future ill.
And when in silence I am sleeping,
Come and weep above
My grave; for thine is sinless weeping
For thy father's love.

PASSAGES.

FROM THE BOSTON STATESMAN.

She was not pretty—short and small—
You would not like her face at all.
Her brow was ample—high—but oh
It was a scandal upon snow;
Her face was broad—her cheek and chin
With not a sign of a dimple in—
Her features coarse and wanted chiselling,
Her hair untamed and wanted frizzling,
And how to prove her red and white
Would puzzle a painter's managed light.

And yet her eye!—that matchless eye!
'Twas like a drop of a midnight sky,
The darkest—purest—deepest blue
That e'er distilled the silent dew—
And every light unthinking glance
Seemed kindling with a prophet's trance,
And met and melted in your eye
As 'twere its life to look and die!

I loved—oh how I loved her!—yet
I could not—did not—quite forget
Her features—and 'twould sometimes come
Like sadness in a festal room,
And brood unbidden in my breast,
Like a bad spell to poison rest,
Till that large eyelid's rise and fall,
Like a swift magick, broke it all!

So looked I on. We walked one night,
Simply to breathe in the clear moonlight—
Disturbing not that dreamy spell,
The heart's deep fibres know so well;
And as across the silver moon
Stole one thin cloud, like clouds of June,

I turned to meet a still reply
For some stray thought in that rich eye—
And only saw the fallen lid
By which its liquid light was hid.

I looked again—her face alone,
With its rude mass of flesh and bone—
The face as of an ugly sleeper—
The face as of a nine day's weeper—
It met me with a loving smile
On lips a Caffre would revile—
Its fond expression, all—alas!
Confined to that unmeaning mass—
Till—spite of that exalted soul
It seemed so ludicrously droll—
That, had all heaven and earth forbid,
I must have laughed—and laugh I did!

I meet that face—I see that eye—
It thrills me as I pass it by—
But that one look, by moonlight caught
Comes over me like a haunting thought,
And then again her eye is shut—
And so I laugh—and so am "cut!"

CASSIUS.

TO A VERY OLD MAN.

Of the years that are vanished and fled,
Thou standest a relick alone!
The winter of age hath encircled thy head,
With a white and immaculate zone!
And brightly thou shinest a landmark between
The days that are now, and the years that have been!

The sun in his gorgeous career,
Unnumbered the times, thou hast viewed—
When bright in arising his splendours appear,
Or mild in his evening mood,
When calmly he sinks in the waves of the west,
Like a spirit of earth in the sleep of the blest!

But say, bath his glory decreased
Since the dawn and the morn of thy day?
His might and his splendour to show hath he ceased?
Or to lighten the world with his ray?
No! mighty in power—eternal in bloom;
He dreads neither death nor the night of the tomb!

But a different race he illumines
From those he beheld in thy youth;
For they have gone down to their separate tombs—
Their vigour—their virtue—their truth!
Whilst thou art remaining, a limb of the dead!
Yet rescued by time from oblivion's bed!

Thus oft have I seen in the field,
When the work of the reapers was o'er,
A stalk that eluded the death-dealing wield
Of the scythe, and bloomed on as before—
But soon did stern winter its beauty deform.
It quivered and sunk 'neath the arm of the storm!

The watch word is sounded aloud—
"Death—death is approaching to all!"
And o'er us, enrobed in the folds of the shroud,
Shall yet wave the wide flowing pall!
And oh! may our day in its verging decline,
Have a sky as unclouded and spotless as thine!

There rest thee, thou remnant alone
Of a race now embracing the clod!
And mayst thou triumphantly ascend to the throne—
The mansion of bliss in the mansions of God!
Sink calmly and sweet to thy slumber of rest—
Mount, spirit, from earth! to the realms of the blest!

STANZAS TO GREECE.

FROM THE BOSTON LITERARY GAZETTE.

Hand of the time,—the song,—the lute—
Lure of the sword,—the spear,—the shield,—
The Spartan blade and Dorick flute
Once more are on thy battle field;
And high above the ranks of war
Rings wild the Dorian Alala.

Land of all great and glorious things,—
Whose soil is full of heroes' hearts,—
Back to the fountain of its springs
The current of my life blood darts
To feel,—oh, shame!—that thou shouldst be
For one short moment less than free.

The memory of a thousand years
Is as a dream of yesterday,
When in the waste no deed appears
To mark these ages past away;
While the base offspring of the slave
Crawls to his undistinguished grave.

But ye have risen like the flush
Of morning on a dreary night,—
And now be like the cataract's rush,
Mighty and glorious in the light,—
On,—torrents,—on, and sweep away
These barbarous hordes of haughty clay.

The spirit of an elder time,
When men's right hands were made for swords;
When Athens, on her rocks sublime,
Bought no vile breath of foreign lords,—
That spirit is upon you now,
And like a glory lights your brow.

The voice of ages long gone by Comes awful from the shades below;
"Your fathers' sword is at your thigh,—
Your fathers' curse is on the foe;—
Son of the Greek! the veriest slave
May look for freedom in the grave."

And now the cross is overhead,
The sabre hilt is in your hand,
Beneath you are the glorious dead;
Your foot is on your father land,
Rank,—deluged with the blood and tears
Of twice two hundred festering years.

And generous hearts, that scorn alike
The tyrant and the willing slave,—
Shall bless each noble blow you strike,—
The good, the beautiful, the brave,
From the sweet south's eternal smile
To ocean's uttermost blue isle.

STANZAS.

FROM THE ETONIAN.

There was a voice,—a foolish voice,
In my heart's summer echoing through me;
It bade me hope,—it bade rejoice;—
And still its sound were precious to me—
But thou hast plighted that deep vow,
And it were sin to love thee now!

I will not love thee! I am taught
To shun the dream on which I floated,
And tear my soul from every thought
On which its dearest vision doted,
And I have prayed to look on thee
As coldly as thou dost on me.

Alas! the love indeed is gone,
But still I feel its melancholy;
And the deep struggle, long and lone,
That stifled all my youthful folly,
Took but away the guilt of sin,
And left me all its pain within.

Adieu! if thou hadst seen the heart,
The silly heart thou wert beguiling,
Thou wouldst not have inflamed the smart,
With all thy bright unconscious smiling;
Thou wouldst not so have fanned the blaze,
That grew beneath those quiet rays!

Nay! it was well,—for smiles like this
Delayed at least my bosom's fever!
Nay! it was well, since hope and bliss
Were fleeting quickly,—and forever,—
To snatch them as they passed away,
And meet the anguish all to-day!

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ADDRESS,

On the Character and Services of DE WITT CLINTON, delivered at Nashville, March 11, 1828, at the request of the Grand Chapter of Tennessee.

BY WILLIAM GIBBES HUNT,

General Grand Marshal of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, and Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter of Tennessee.

Companions and Brethren,

It is among the happiest tendencies of the venerable order to which we are attached, to teach us the value of departed worth, and to inspire us with a suitable veneration for the illustrious dead. The primary objects of masonry are, indeed, to smooth the rugged road of life, to remove the asperities of the human character, and to increase, at once, the usefulness and happiness of man. But these objects are sought through the influence of example as well as of precept, and no where is example so powerfully efficacious as in the recollection and the history of those who are gone. It is not till the whole career of life is run that the character can be considered as unalterably fixed, or its real merits can be fairly appreciated. It is not till the grave has closed over its victim, and buried forever, with his mouldering remains, the jealousies, and rivalships, and petty hostilities, by which all are surrounded while living, that impartial justice can be done to the most illustrious benefactor of mankind. It is not till the immortal spirits of the good and great have taken their upward flight to the scenes of their ultimate triumph and reward, that the brilliancy of their course on earth can be clearly discerned, and the clouds which had obscured the full-orbed splendour of their fame can be thoroughly and finally dispersed.

Masonry, it is true, teaches us to regard all mankind as upon a level, and claims, for all, the enjoyment of equal rights and privileges. She respects not the accidental or arbitrary distinctions of wealth or rank, but looks at personal merit only, and very properly inculcates the lesson "that he who faithfully performs his duty, even in a subordinate or private station, is as justly entitled to esteem and respect, as he who is invested with supreme authority." Her favourite and most appropriate sphere of operation is indeed in the retired circle, in the cultivation of the social affections, the encouragement of domestic virtues and the promotion of individual happiness. The humblest citizen, who, by his industry, frugality and cheerfulness, gives comfort and support to a dependent family, and irradiates with his virtues the contracted sphere in which he moves, is as truly an object of masonick regard, as the most exalted individual on the catalogue of fame. When the obscure but amiable and useful parent, relative or friend is taken away from the little circle by which he was respected and beloved, masonry drops the sympathetic tear and tenders the balm of consolation with as much sincerity and ardour as when called to lament the loss of the most illustrious benefactor of our race. Yet it would be absurd to suppose that the same degree of importance would be given to the event in the one case as in the other. It is in the power of us all to be upright and virtuous citizens, and to secure the affections of our neighbours and friends; but it is the lot only of a favoured few to be able to shed a lustre on the age in which they live, to be known and esteemed throughout the habitable globe, and eminently to contribute by their talents and services, to the improvement of the general condition of man. Unfortunately, too, those brilliant and rarely gifted minds, designed and calculated to enlighten and to bless, are sometimes perverted to purposes of mischief and employed as instruments to blight and destroy. The same orb of day, which imparts a genial warmth, and by its temperate influence vivifies and sustains, inflicts also a mortal blow—parches and consumes. The same wind which wafts the vessel on its way and impels it rapidly towards its destined port, sometimes impedes its progress, excites the turbulence of the waves, and drives it onward to inevitable destruction. So likewise the same intellectual powers, which, rightly employed, might add to the dignity and welfare of man, when unattended by moral principle, exercise a baleful and pernicious influence. Amidst, therefore, the whirlwinds of passion, the conflicting elements of pride and ambition, and the raging billows of faction and of war, how seldom can we discern those towering and brilliant minds, upon which the eye of the patriot and philanthropist may repose with unmingled delight! Thinly scattered at remote distances throughout the range of the mental vision, they appear

"Like specks of azure in a clouded sky,
Like sunny islands in a stormy sea."

No wonder then, that when these master-spirits of the age are taken from the sphere of their influence and cut off in the midst of their usefulness, the shock is felt and the loss deplored—not by a family circle only—not by the inhabitants of a village or a city—but by a nation and by the world. On such occasions, surely masonry cannot fail to participate in the general sorrow, nor can she be backward in the exercise of those sympathies, which are always ready for the consolation of the afflicted. Sometimes, too, as at present, masonry herself is directly concerned, being called to mourn the loss of her own distinguished votaries and friends.

We are assembled to-day, companions, brethren and fellow citizens, in obedience to the impulse of feelings alike natural and honourable, to mingle our expressions of heartfelt regret with those of the whole masonick family and of every class and description of people in this extensive republic—nay, of every friend to virtue, science, and human improvement throughout the world—for the unexpected loss of one who was not only the pride and ornament of our institution, but an eminent blessing to his country and to mankind. The unusual suddenness of the shock renders it the more peculiarly and painfully severe. While our hopes with regard to his future usefulness and fame are yet glowing with more than ordinary brilliancy and warmth, they are, in an instant, extinguished forever. No preparatory warning precedes the fatal blow; no gathering cloud portends the approaching desolation. One moment DE WITT CLINTON stands firm and erect in the vigour of health, and the eyes of his grateful country are fixed upon him with pride, exultation, and hope. But the next moment he is gone, and the eyes of his country are suffused with tears. He is gone, and learning deplors the loss of an efficient advocate and powerful patron. He is gone, and public improvement is deprived of its most ardent and successful promoter. He is gone, and masonry mourns for the most prominent and distinguished among her champions and friends. His family are overwhelmed with the desolating blow. His wife, rendered frantic by the shock, finds only in the wildness of delirium those hopes and consolations which reason and truth are unable to afford. His neighbours rush forward to the spot with breathless solicitude, to learn the extent of the calamity. A whole city is instantly electrified, and animated with a single all-absorbing interest, and the anxious throng, forgetting their individual cares and deserting their ordinary pursuits, are concerned only for the general loss. The legislature of the great state, over which he presided with such distinguished ability, and whose interests he promoted with such unrivalled success, pause in the midst of their public labours, and join the chorus of universal lamentation. Opposing parties drop their weapons of contention and are anxious only to be foremost in expressions of respect for the memory of the deceased. The melancholy intelligence travels with unexampled rapidity, and reaches in every direction the extremities of our republic in anticipation of the ordinary channels of information. Every where it is received with the same poignant regret, and every where spontaneous and unequivocal bursts of feeling attest the severity and keenness of the loss. We too, my friends, remotely situated as we are from the place of his residence and the immediate theatre of his useful labours, have left, for a time, our business and our pleasures, and have come up together to this temple of the Most High, here to enjoy the melancholy satisfaction of expressing our sorrow and of uniting in the contemplation of the character and services of him whom we mourn. Let us then, in pursuance of this object, take a brief and a rapid survey of the eventful and valuable life of the illustrious deceased, and dwell, for a few moments, on those prominent traits, which elevated him so far above the mass of his contemporaries.

De Witt Clinton was born in Orange county, in the state of New-York, in March, 1769. His family was distinguished and highly respected. His father was a major general in the army of the revolution, and his uncle, the venerable George Clinton, filled, successively, the important offices of governor of the state of New-York and vice president of the United States. Young De Witt received the rudiments of a classical education at Columbia College, in the city of New-York, being the first student who entered that seminary after the conclusion of the revolutionary war. Having obtained the honours of his Alma Mater, he entered with assiduity upon the study of the law, and, in due season, was licensed to practise that profession. Other pursuits however soon attracted his attention, and prevented him from prosecuting his original design. At an early age he was appointed secretary of his uncle, then governor of New-York, and entered, with characteristic ardour and signal ability, into the political discussions of the day. After the retirement of his uncle from the executive office, he was himself elected, without opposition, in his twenty-eighth year, a member of the legislature from the city of New-York.—Here he commenced that career of practical utility and steady devotion to the cause of science and benevolence, for which he was afterwards so preeminently distinguished. Already regarded as the leader and most efficient member of a great political party, he was not, however so blinded by zeal for the interests of his friends as to lose sight of the claims of philanthropy and learning, but, by directing a large portion of his attention to these important considerations, he was the instrument of much good to others, and added greatly to his popularity and influence. In the year 1802 he was elected to the senate of the United States and was eminently distinguished as an able and efficient member of that body. For many years he occupied with signal ability and success the very important and responsible office of mayor of the great and growing city of New-York. He was afterwards again placed in the legislature of his native state, and was, as before, the zealous and powerful friend of the interests of education and benevolence, urging the patronage of schools and colleges, the incorporation of valuable societies and the support of hospitals and other charitable institutions. Here too he took the lead in behalf of that splendid and magnificent system of internal improvement, the success of which has so largely contributed to the prosperity and glory of the state of New-York, enkindled the fire of emulation in other states, and reflected a lustre upon the names of all who were active in support of its adoption. In 1811 he was chosen lieutenant governor of New-York, and in 1812 he was nominated, and zealously supported by a portion of the people, as a candidate for the office of president of the United States. In 1817, he was elected, by an almost unanimous vote, to the elevated station of governor of the state of New-York, and, with the exception of a single term of two years, during which he declined a re-election, he continued to occupy that station with unrivalled dignity, utility, and splendour, actively and laboriously devoted to the faithful discharge of its arduous and responsible duties, till the hour of his sudden and melancholy exit. During his active life, he was a prominent and useful member, and often an efficient officer, of many literary, scientific and benevolent institutions, of some of which he was the founder; and, in the several orders of masonry and knighthood, he filled, from time to time, all the most important and dignified stations.

Mr. Clinton possessed a mind of the highest order—original, powerful and capacious—disciplined by habits of patient and laborious investigation and profound reflection. His conceptions were clear, rapid, and vigorous; and his judgement was sound and accurate. He, like WASHINGTON, was distinguished rather for solidity of understanding than for brilliancy of imagination—rather for practical good sense than for the lofty and excursive soarings of fancy. His examination of every subject presented to his notice, was thorough, critical, and severe. His opinions were maturely and deliberately formed, and his reasoning in their defence, if not always convincing, was at least forcible, logical and clear. His views were enlarged, liberal, and enlightened, his designs bold and extensive, and his plans for their execution practical and sagacious. He possessed, in an eminent degree, that courage of the cabinet which has been justly said to be no less rare, and often more important than that of the field, and uniformly evinced a fearless and persevering spirit, which no difficulties could discourage, no obstacles subdue. When convinced of the importance and practicability of an object, and once resolved upon its attainment, he marched boldly and resolutely forward, rather animated than depressed by difficulties, dangers and impediments. In the transaction of business he was prompt, decisive and energetic. He was accurate and minute in his attention to details, and displayed no less facility and correctness in the execution of his plans, than originality and boldness in their conception.

As a politician, Mr. Clinton was early connected with the great party in his native state, which had long borne the name of his family, and of which he afterwards became the rallying point and the head. How far his judgement was biased and his opinions affected by the partialities and prejudices invariably connected with party feeling, it is perhaps impossible to decide. The peculiar relation in which he stood towards a great portion of the people, who had been closely attached to the principles and fortunes of his venerable uncle, and the zeal with which, in the hey-day of youthful ardour, and under the influence of a natural and honourable family and personal attachment, he entered upon the defence of those principles and the support of those fortunes, were certainly eminently calculated to exercise a permanent influence over his political opinions and prospects. Yet, making due allowance for these peculiar circumstances, without undertaking to decide upon the merits of the controversies, which have long and violently agitated the state, between his friends and opponents, we may confidently assert, that notwithstanding the powerful temptations by which he was surrounded, it could never be justly said of him, amidst all the collisions and conflicts of the day, that he narrowed his mind

And to party gave up what was meant for mankind.

On the contrary, he was fully aware of the important truth, and acted under that conviction, that, whatever temporary influence may be derived from mere party association, any reputation, thus acquired, must be ephemeral and local, and totally unworthy the effort of any man of high and honourable ambition. He sought therefore to build his fame upon a more substantial and durable foundation. He sunk the character of the politician in that of the statesman, and, while he laboured for the promotion of his party and their cause, he laboured still more intensely for the interests of his country and of mankind. By this course he secured, at once, immediate popularity and permanent renown. The one is attested by the remarkable fact, that, notwithstanding all the contests of party and the ever-varying results with which they are attended, he never failed of obtaining his election, whenever he was a candidate for any office in the gift of the people of New-York. The other is abundantly proved by the universal and spontaneous admission of all ranks and parties, and by the anxious solicitude with which his warmest political opponents now press forward to proclaim his pre-eminent usefulness and worth.

As a scholar, Mr. Clinton occupied the most elevated ground. His reading was extensive, various, well directed, and profitable. His ready and capacious memory enabled him to store up vast funds of learning, which were subservient to his call whenever required. Abstruse scientific investigations occupied a portion of his time and aided the discipline of his mind, while classical and elegant literature constituted the amusement and delight of his leisure hours. His style, as a writer, was at once vigorous and rich—distinguished, like his mind, rather for solid thought than for brilliant imagery—preserving a happy medium between the inflated and the dull; sufficiently ornamented, yet dignified, perspicuous and strong. His executive messages to the legislature of New-York, unlike the great mass of similar productions, have been read with interest and profit far beyond the limits of the state for which they were designed, and have been, not merely useful as matters of form or as temporary state-papers, but worthy of preservation as valuable treasures of practical wisdom.

The zeal with which this great man employed the energies of his powerful mind, the weight of his personal popularity, and the influence of his official stations for the relief of human misery, and the general advancement of human happiness, will be remembered with gratitude and admiration, for a succession of ages after the political questions and parties of the day shall have been buried beneath the fathomless ocean of oblivion. His disinterested efforts in behalf of charitable institutions, in favour of an amelioration of the criminal code, for the promotion of the useful arts, and the encouragement of industry and talent, have not only produced, as their immediate effects, the improvements so much needed and desired, but, by their influence as examples to future statesmen, and by their tendency to excite a noble emulation in the glorious work of philanthropy, may be a prolific source of unnumbered and incalculable blessings throughout all future time. As a friend of science, an able advocate for the cause of education, and a liberal patron of seminaries of learning and other literary institutions, Mr. Clinton has, also, left behind him a lasting and brilliant fame. But it is probably as the enlightened projector, and resolute, intrepid, and unconquerable friend and promoter of the great work of internal improvement, that he will be most extensively and permanently known. Without Clinton, or some one possessing the spirit of Clinton, the great canals of New-York would not have been constructed. Common minds could not realize the practicability, with the limited resources of a young nation like ours, of pouring the waters of the lakes, through an artificial channel, upwards of three hundred miles in length, over mountains and through valleys, into the great Atlantick. Men even of powerful intellects, enterprising, patriotic and bold, regarded as chimerical and absurd the project of transporting by water to the city of New-York the productions of the whole northwestern country. But Clinton was not to be discouraged by the ridicule of his opponents or by the faint hopes and disheartening predictions of his friends. With a firmness of purpose almost unequalled—but which has been, not unaptly, compared to that of Columbus on the broad and untried ocean, his needle no longer true to the pole and his whole crew heartless and despondent—he maintained with unwavering confidence the practicability, no less than the importance, of the object, rallied the almost extinguished zeal of the few who were willing to remain with him to the last, encountered with unshaken fortitude the shafts of opposition, and, at length, obtained a splendid and triumphant victory—which left behind it no blood-stained field, but which extensively diffused wealth, prosperity and happiness even among the vanquished, while it has erected a noble and perennial monument to the genius, and firmness, and undaunted heroism of the illustrious conqueror.

In the private relations of domestic life, in his intercourse with his friends, in his manners towards his fellow-citizens in the transaction of business and the exercise of courtesy, Mr. Clinton was all that could be reasonably expected or desired—the kind husband, the fond parent, the ardent friend, the polished gentleman, at once dignified, and affable, and easy of access, the liberal benefactor and the pious christian. His moral character was without a stain, and in religion he was tolerant, liberal and devout.

It remains only to speak of him in a relation peculiarly dear and interesting to us. De Witt Clinton was a genuine mason, and, as such, his memory is entitled to all the respect and veneration, which we as a body can bestow. He was initiated at an early age, and always maintained a warm and undeviating attachment to the order. He was never inclined to desert it, or to treat it with disrespect, on account of temporary abuses or the occasional misconduct of some of its members. He was soon called to preside over Holland Lodge, of which he was a member, and delivered on the evening of his installation, in December, 1793, an address on the principles of our institution, abounding in all that good sense and that fine feeling which so eminently characterized his subsequent writings. He afterwards successively occupied all the highest offices in the several masonic bodies with which he was connected in his native state, and for many years held, to the universal satisfaction of the fraternity, the dignified and important stations of presiding officer in the two highest masonic bodies in the union, having each a jurisdiction co-extensive with the federal republic—the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States, and the General Grand Encampment of Knights Templars and the appendant orders.

Such is a faint sketch of the life, character and services of this illustrious man. And now my companions, before I complete this feeble performance of the task you have assigned me, I am called upon to discharge another painful duty. Since the summons was issued, convening you as a body on the present occasion, intelligence has reached us, that one of the prominent individuals to whom it was addressed, had himself just departed to his eternal home. Yes, my companions, death has invaded our little circle, and EDWARD H. STEELE, who has so often united with us in our masonic labours, and constituted so important a link in our chain of masonic sympathy and love, is unable to partake with us in the duties of this melancholy day. I cannot now dwell in detail on the many excellent traits which adorned his character. We all knew the intelligence of his mind, the polish of his manners, the warmth of his affections, and the virtues of his heart. He too is gone, and instead of coming here to-day, as we had confidently hoped and expected, to join with us in the tribute of affectionate and cordial respect to the memory of the venerated Clinton, he has closely followed Clinton, through the outer courts of the tabernacle to seek for an admission within the veil of the Grand Chapter above. It is worthy also of remark, and affords a striking and impressive memento of the frailty and uncertainty of every thing human, that Clinton had himself left unperformed a similar task. The eulogy designed for the lamented EMERSON is still unpronounced, and that tongue which was expected to have uttered it, is, by the dread fiat of omnipotence, silenced forever. That kindred spirit which would so faithfully have told his worth and so justly appreciated his character, has taken its flight to the same mansions of glory.—And now, sainted shades, as you look down from your blissful abodes upon the fleeting scenes of this transitory existence, how do you exult in the contemplation of the realities by which you are surrounded, and unite in the chorus of gratitude and joy, that at length you have found something durable and certain, upon which you may safely and confidently repose during the future progress of an interminable existence!

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

POISONOUS MUSCLES.

[From a recent work on Animal and Vegetable Poisons.]

The second order of fish, which only produces occasionally dangerous symptoms, are the congor eel, the dolphin, the muscle, the eel, the salmon, and (in particular constitutions) all the varieties of the shell fish. Of these, the muscle may be considered by far the most frequently injurious; and there are few persons who have not witnessed in themselves, or in their friends, the bad effects produced by eating this fish. Two interesting cases are reported in the Medical Repository for June, 1815, by Dr. Burrows, one of the editors; where the eating of muscles, taken from the foul bottom of a fishing smack in the canal at Chatham, had proved fatal in sixty-seven hours. One of these was a boy of fourteen years of age, and the other was a boy of nine years. The leading symptoms in these cases "were nausea, headach, vomiting of a dark green fluid, an eruption like the nettle rash on the skin, attended with intolerable itching, great difficulty of breathing, excessive pain in the abdomen and bowels, intense thirst, swelling of the abdomen and face, a numbness and coldness of the extremities; delirium, coma or stupor, dilated pupils of the eyes, a sunk, low, and tremulous pulse, subsultus or catching of the tendons, convulsions and death. The bodies soon after death became livid and putrid; but, as their unhappy mother objected to their being opened, the appearance on dissection could not be ascertained." Captain Vancouver relates that several of his men were ill from eating muscles, which they collected, while exploring the coast of America in the North Pacific Ocean. Three of them suffered more than the others; and one of them died in less than five hours after the fish had been swallowed, very tranquil and apparently in a deep sleep. His lips had turned very black, and his extremities were much swollen. The other two men, by drinking plentifully of warm water and exciting vomiting, escaped with their lives, but were ill for many days afterwards. Upon our arrival at Gibraltar, in the year 1788, five years after the last memorable siege, we were informed that some persons had very lately been poisoned, and others much injured, by the eating of muscles; and that upon inquiry it was ascertained, that the fish which had produced these mischievous effects, had attached themselves to the copper bottoms and broken portions of the Spanish gun boats and floating batteries which had been sunk in the bay, when the last unavailing effort had been made by the enemy to get possession of the garrison. Muscles were, in consequence, considered a poisonous fish, and fell into complete disuse; and oysters, which there are of a very fine quality, were eaten for some time with great caution. Much ambiguity attaches to the sources from which these, and some other fish, derive their poisonous qualities, as well as in what part of the fish the poison is the most active. It appears to be a good precaution, however, (and which is confirmed by the testimony of Dr. Thomas, who states, that the entrails of the tropical poison fish, if well removed, destroys its deleterious quality, or if given to a dog, cat, or duck, immediately poisons them,) to gut all fish well, and to wash the inside very clean before it used; and in the muscle, to remove every dark and black portion from it previously to its being eaten; and to find out, if possible, upon what bank or shore it has been taken.

THE GATHERER.

LEGISLATIVE ELOQUENCE.

The following extract from a speech of Major Ives of Westfield, in the house of representatives of the state of Massachusetts, on the theatre question, is published in the Westfield Register.

Mr. Ives rose!—"Mr. Speaker—Sir—I rise, Sir, to state that I did not solicit the station which I hold here nor did I expect it—nor am I qualified for it; and I think, Mr. Speaker, you and this honourable house will think so, before I get half through—but, I am a consistent man, and wish to be considered as such. I find that I was wrong in my vote yesterday—I am convinced so from the great and respectable majority that was against me. Mr. Speaker, Sir, I believe I was instigated by the devil in my vote yesterday—Sir, we were told here, yesterday, by the gentleman from Boston, a long and pitiful story of one young man being ruined in consequence of theatres—What, Sir! is this the only solitary instance that can be found? I presume so, or we should have heard from it. What, Sir! tell me of the deleterious or immoral effect of theatres! Sir, I think the morals of this place are very good—the citizens are very polite! I hear no cursing, or swearing—Sir! I have seen more immorality, in the little town I have the honour to represent—more drunkards—more lying at taverns—more cursing and swearing, than in this great metropolis! Sir, I believe I was instigated by the devil, in my vote yesterday—I am convinced I was wrong—Sir! I am a consistent man." Here Mr. Ives was called to order by the Speaker, because he could not perceive the pertinency of his remarks to the question.

A NOBLE THIEF.

The following appears in a native Bengalese paper:—"Lately, in the district of Bankora, a thief had made an entrance into the house of a Bramin. Whilst searching for booty, he heard voices, and was about to retreat, when he found the parties close to the spot where he had entered, consisting of the Bramin's wife and her gallant engaged in conversation. The woman complained of the jealousy of her husband, and her lover recommended her to take advantage of his being asleep to murder him, giving her a weapon for the purpose. She objected, however, that if he should wake he might be too strong for her; and urged the gallant to undertake the deed himself, to which he consented: as he advanced to enter the house, the thief, although disposed to make free with the Bramin's property, thought it incumbent on him to protect the Bramin's life, and as the intended murderer passed the spot where he was secreted, he thrust the instrument with which he had made his way through the wall into the man's belly and killed him; after which he made his escape. The woman seeing her gallant slain made an outcry, which brought her husband and the neighbours to the spot, when she accused the former of having committed the murder. He was accordingly secured and tried, and, as appearances were strong against him, sentenced to be hanged. From this fate he was again rescued by the heroism of the freebooter, who, on hearing the turn events had taken, gave himself up, and acknowledged his crime. We have not heard what decision was pronounced in the case."

MR. GOURLAY.

A curious communication from Mr. Gourlay, who has been confined in Cold Bath Fields' Prison for five years, for horsewhipping Mr. Brougham, appears in the London Courier of January 9th, being his thoughts on the departure of the old and the coming of the new year. In the latter effusion he thus pictures the happiness of a prison. "Who in this world is so secure as I am! Walled in, railed in, locked in, barred in, bolted in; while they who put me in cannot take me out. Here I am safe from fire and arrest; here moth and rust corrupt not; nor do thieves break through to steal.

Here I have food and raiment, fire and candle, washing and mending, and hair cutting, postage paid, paper, pens, and ink; the best of governours, an excellent doctor, a good ma'tron, civil servants, and thank God, in no need of a chaplain. 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely;' but none of ye are half so blessed in this way as I am: therefore let me 'rejoice and be exceeding glad.'" He then proceeds to state that he had opened plans to the King and the Colonial Secretary for paying off the national debt in fifty years, and for the emigration of 200,000 paupers free of expense; both which plans had not been regarded, and he therefore proposes to lay them before the publick at a publick meeting.

A SEA-SOLICITOR MADE CHIEF JUSTICE.

In Hayti, the Grand Judge, Mons. Freshnell, is an infirm old man of colour, nearly eighty years of age. Until he arrived at middle age, he had been actively and successfully employed in the marauding career of a pirate. His legal knowledge is just what might have been expected from his previous avocations. He is a modest old man it is true, for when his present appointment was offered to him, he declined it, as he said himself, from his incompetency to fill it, and to perform the duties it required. Boyer, however, insisted on his accepting it, and remarked that "it did not require talent or legal knowledge to execute the duties of it, he was only to do as he was directed."

[Franklin's present State of Hayti, (1823.)]

A JUDGE.

A grave magistrate was sitting at table between two young coxcombs, who took it into their heads to attempt making him the butt of their ridicule. "Gentlemen," said he, "I plainly perceive your design; but, to save unnecessary trouble, I must beg leave to give you a just idea of my character. Be it known to you, therefore, that I am not precisely a fool, nor altogether a knave, but (as you see) something between both."

PREJUDICE.

"The correction of one single prejudice," says Dugald Stewart in his Philosophical Essays, "has often been attended with consequences more important and extensive than could be produced by any positive accession to the stock of our scientific information. Such is the condition of man, that a great part of a philosopher's life must necessarily be spent, not in enlarging the circle of his knowledge, but in unlearning the errors of the crowd, and the pretended wisdom of the schools, and that the most substantial benefit he can bestow on his fellow creatures, as well as the noblest species of power to which he can aspire, is to impart to others the light he has struck out by his meditations, and to encourage human reason by his example to assert its liberty."

BACKGAMMON BOARDS.

We frequently find backgammon boards with backs lettered as if they were two folio volumes. The origin of it was thus; Eudes, bishop of Sully, forbade his clergy to play at chess. As they were resolved not to obey the commandment, and yet dared not have a chess-board seen in their houses or cloisters, they had them bound and lettered as books, and played at night, before they went to bed, instead of reading the New Testament or the Lives of the Saints; and the monks called the draft or chess-board their wooden gospels. They had also drinking vessels bound to resemble the breviary, and were found drinking, when it was supposed they were at prayer.

IRISH SENTINEL.

When the French landed at Bantry Bay, an Irish peasant, who was posted with a musket upon one of the cliffs, and had wandered a little out of his position, was accosted by an English officer with "What are you here for?" "Faith, your honour," said Pat, with his accustomed grin of good humour, "they tell me I'm here for a century."

An officer being intoxicated, an old soldier observed that he was afraid there was something wrong at head quarters.

POPULAR TALES.

THE LAZZARONI.

I should be unwilling to question the delights of the Island of Calypso, with its refreshing shades, or of the cool grotto of Circe; I would give the garden of Alcinous its fabled charms; nor do I detract from their several merits, when I would add one other spot to this short catalogue of earthly paradises. There is a softness and a witchery of beauty in Palermo, that has awed even Saracens, and their barbaric inscriptions even now attest that they could feel and spare. She has suffered under the rod of the Turk, has bowed beneath the iron sway of the Norman, and has been debilitated by the licentiousness of the French; yet the vesper bell has tolled in token of her energies, for like the sea that fondles at her feet, or Ætna, the giant mountain, she either boils with rage, or slumbers in repose. Still she has received successive dynasties ever preserving her monuments intact, and she now stands a solitary example to the world of having been loved and not abused.

At times I have stood upon the strand enamoured of the scene before me. I have gazed with somewhat of passion on the gently heaving billow of the sea, and as I toyed with it in fancy, as with a mistress, I have thought that the Monte Pellegrino seemed to frown upon me from above, as a cautious and sullen guardian of his daughter's charms. I have then in fear turned from his rebuke, and wandered along the shore, lost in love.

It was in such a mood that I once strayed further than was my custom towards the Bagheria. I had paused to remark the stillness of all around me. On the sea were a few guardians of the thunny nets, whose only toil was not to slumber at their posts, whilst their companions in watching their unwieldy prey were basking upon the shore. I gazed awhile on the tall and beautiful forms that were spread around me. "The harmony of nature is universal," I said. "There must be tones of the mind to accord with this grace and beauty of person. Touch but the right chords, and the spirit within shall surely respond."

Even as I spoke, the general listlessness was broken by the appearance of a female. As she approached, I marked in her an intelligence of countenance beyond her station, for she seemed but as an humble messenger carrying a meagre provision of goat's milk and macaroni. As she passed the groups of lazzaroni, she gave a significant and forbidding shake of the head. It was an ill-omened look; they gazed awhile upon her with a stare of mingled affection and inquiry. And when she had passed, they strained their eyes in the direction she went along the shore, as if it had been a supernatural apparition.

Almost instinctively I followed her. She soon quitted the strand, and struck into a winding path that led to a doorless and windowless cabin. A towering aloe stood as it were as sentinels at the wicket, and within the precincts, a cumbersome wild fig-tree lent a grateful shade. It served, as I fancied, to conceal me from the observation of the messenger. For whosoever the provision was destined, it was given in silence; heartless appeared the being that extended it, and comfortless the look that accompanied it. Yes, it seemed an act prompted by duty, cold, cheerless, and calculated. The step slow and measured in the approach, but quickened as it receded, betokened the intentions of the visitor. She was gone, and I could have cursed her even for her charity.

I still remained in my concealment, for I reflected that my intrusion might be deemed impertinent. I should have retired, had not a groan attracted my notice. It might be—a thousand possibilities occurred to me. In a moment I stood upon the very threshold of the hut. I observed before me, on a bed of straw, a pale emaciated being. A fisherman's cloak was carelessly thrown over him, and as I appeared, his eyes became fixed, but with fear not with interest; his mouth was partly open, his hands grasped firmer the cloak that partially covered him, his head fell upon his shoulder, and he seemed to crouch within himself, as though he awaited a blow he could not ward. I drew nearer to him, but with the consciousness of one who knows that his presence is unwelcome. I could not leave him. He breathed loud and quick. An occasional gurgling in the throat, as though nature struggled for life within him, gave a fearful interest to the moment. Each time she might be vanquished, and I might be the—murderer. My motives were of little consequence. I had occasioned the sufferings; gradually, however, he breathed more freely; the conflict of the spasms was less severe, his hand loosened its grasp, his muscles were unstrung, and he slumbered.

In the awful silence that succeeded, I contemplated this remnant of clay. The sun just sinking into the sea, as if to refresh himself from the labours of the day, cast a stronger and a ruddier light through the aperture of the door way; and nature seemed to smile as she thus played with mortality. Death riding on a whirlwind, or starting through the chasm of an earthquake, is indeed terrible; but I appreciate the smiles of nature more than I fear her frowns, and she smiled so sweetly, and looked so lovely, that never did I cling to life more fondly than at that moment. To this exuberance of health without, the form before me bore a sorry contrast. I approached it. The heart beat slower and less audibly. I thought that it had even ceased to beat. I listened, I bent down, I knelt beside him, already I had touched the cloak, I would have forced my way to his heart,—but,—and I turned to the appeal of a voice behind me, calmly calling upon me to desist. It was the figure I had before seen.

"Touch that flesh," she said, "and if thou canst doubt its doom, so mayst thou too expect to survive."

"Talk not to me of doubt," I exclaimed as I rose, "it were a mockery in the certainty of such misery. Who art thou? What is he?"

"A lazar," she rejoined, "and yet not of us." As she spoke, she smiled as if in triumph, and then calmly added, "As I would spare myself your questions, I will tell you that you did not enter unobserved. I well knew the effect that such a sight would produce upon him, for the consciousness of the extent of the evil is its proper bane. Think not, however, that he would have lingered long; one other day had ended his sufferings. My tale is short. I am here to minister to his wants by the sternest law of our country—ancient prejudice. The world has stigmatized us with the appellation of lazzaroni. It is often lightly said, but hadst thou bared that bosom, thou hadst seen a lazar; hadst thou touched that flesh, thy doom had been as irrevocably fixed as is the wretch's now before thee. We have received this pious inheritance from the crusades. The barrier against oriental contagion is termed a lazar house, and we are become a byword to the world, as heirs to heaven's worst curse. Still we have our patron saint—Saint Lazarus. We have our solitary bond of union. To the observance of this tie, he is indebted for the daily visit I have paid him for two long years. The wound has widened, till his whole body has become scaled and cankered, and the slumber of this moment is the pause of nature, before the soul bursts from the surrounding corruption. But the world is false," and her countenance brightened as she spoke; "for not we alone are the undivided heirs to this propagated curse, fair patrimony indeed!—Enough. If thou remainest, approach him not. Before the morrow's sun has set, all will be over. Thou mayst be of service to him in attending to some wishes long since committed to paper, and which will be found after our last ceremonies. Of these hereafter, yet know one thing more,—that were he of thine own blood, as he is of thy country, the body of the leper is ours."

She disappeared. It was in vain to call her back. I would have asked her a thousand questions. Her tone was not unkind, and she had perhaps saved me from a similar fate.

There was in her manner a gleam of satisfaction, such as will at times be felt upon a comparison of the miseries of another with our own; that secret spring of negative happiness that we would cheat ourselves to disbelieve in, for she felt that others were equally subject to the corruption.

It was already night, for the short twilight had finished with the conference, and I was now left in this sad chamber of death. I could not leave him, although my presence was unasked, and I hardly dared to stay. Almost bereft of life myself, I stood, not venturing to move, and scarcely to breathe. As the pale light of the rising moon shone upon the bare clay of the hut, I perceived, and I tremble to record it, the creatures that were hastening to claim their inheritance. The wall, cold and damp, was dotted with beetles and scorpions; and even on the floor the harmless lizard, that came to shelter itself from the night dew, was transformed by the imagination into a merciless claimant for this wreck of humanity. For a moment I thought that it must be fancy. The decree of the wretch's fate was too cruel, too unjust. To assure myself of its reality, I would fix my eyes upon one motionless, black spot—it did not move—it could not live—and these terrors then were of my own creation. I turned to another, another, and another—all were still; but they had moved, and even then they moved again. I fancied that they approached me—perhaps I was their victim. During the last few hours contagion might have marked me too for her prey. I tottered, and almost fell to the ground, and then inwardly cursed my selfish cowardice.

"Oh God!" I cried, "it was indeed well devised that upon the nearest and dearest friend should devolve the task of closing the eyes in death!"

It is time that this scene should close, though the recollection of what I then suffered has lightened the weight of other woes. Never did the hours appear so tardy. The struggles for life recommenced—they succeeded quicker and quicker, and as the morning dawned I saw that the whole frame of the poor sufferer was convulsed. He raised his head, threw back partially his cloak, for a moment gazed upon me piteously but unconsciously, drew one long breath, and fell extended upon the ground. Whatever it might be, the trial or the punishment, it was over.

I was not long alone, for as if aware of the catastrophe, Marguerita was presently in the cabin.

"Well," she exclaimed, "his doom is sealed—is it not? By the favour of Santa Rosalia thou hast passed this awful night. Thou must now remove from this scene—our most important duties are beginning. When thou shalt see the funeral pile lighted, or hear the first notes of our dirge, then, and not till then, approach. All that belonged to the deceased shall be faithfully consigned to thee. That thou hast witnessed his dying moments gives us confidence in thee. May Saint Lazarus be propitious to thee!"

I obeyed her injunctions instantaneously, and removed to a short distance from the hut, where I had a commanding view of the shore, and of the sea. I laid myself down upon the ground, worn out with fatigue; the big drops of perspiration rolled down my forehead. I was weak and exhausted, and I fell asleep.

Then, as if I had not already suffered enough, the miserable leper stood before me in my dream. At one time I thought that he supplicated me to approach him, and extended his hand to me with savage pleasure; and then, as I gazed upon him, he would turn away in disgust, as if conscious of the contagion. At another, I thought that I was summoned before the judges in hell: I saw those who had been deified by men for their justice passing judgement on the son for the sins of the father; and as I cursed the code that authorized the tyranny I started from my slumbers. Again that wretched form approached me; thanked me for giving the lie to the world that said there was no compassion for him; called me his guardian spirit, or what he said was dearer to him, brother, for he had never known one; I railed at Providence for not having given him this one tie of affection, and I awoke to a reality almost worse than the delusion I had dreamed of.

In such unrefreshing slumbers the day passed on. It was noon. I arose and saw the shore covered with the bustling forms of, what I had hitherto supposed to be, inactive Lazzaroni; The preparations were far advanced—the pile was erected. I went to a spring not far off and refreshed my parched lips—I needed no other sustenance.

I awaited the signal, and in my spirit greeted the ceremony that was to haul off their prey the creatures that spring from our very flesh, and rot again upon our very bones. The Egyptians embalmed—the old civilized world burnt—whilst we bury!

The sun had now set—the signal was given, and the pile blazed high to heaven. I descended, and as I passed at no great distance from where the cottage had stood, I was astonished at not seeing a vestige of it remaining. Can this be a people proverbial for their apathy? Yes; but there is a bond of union amongst them, cemented by the consciousness of the stigma affixed to their name by the world, and as it has grown and been matured in misery, so will it outlast, and bind stronger than all those more endearing ties of love, affection, or friendship.

As I drew nearer to the pile I observed that Marguerita enacted the chief priestess. An urn was placed immediately under the body to receive the ashes—the beautifully picturesque forms of the surrounding votaries, clad in the slight dress of the ancient biblical lepers—the earnestness of their devotion—the crackling of the wood—the wild cries of the sea-gulls as they circled round the sacrifice—lent to the whole scene an air of wildness that I can never forget. There was an exultation in their looks and in their song—it was the victory of death—hear their strains.

THE LEPERS' DIRGE.

I.
On the wings of the spirits of lepers gone
We send our prayers to St. Lazarus' throne.
By the curse that formed our bands
Come ye from the burning sands!
Chaplets for the victim twine—
Hew the cedar—split the pine.
Now the serpent-crested fire
Gayly mounts the funeral pyre,
Whilst the curlew swoops to the ravens' cry,
And the screech-owl hoots as the flame mounts high.

II.
Death flies with the winds, when from Lepari's caves,
As maddened by Freedom they sweep o'er the waves.
Scylla's hell hounds hark we hear!
Phantoms of the dead appear!
In mid air destruction broods,
Chaos starts from 'neath the floods!
Rocks are rent! The river's course,
Rushing headlong from its source,
Is lost in the wreck!—From the mother's breast
The infant is torn in its hour of rest!

III.
On the bosom of earth see the night-mare stalks;
On the breast of the billow the siroc walks.
Spirit of the mighty great?
Freed awhile from Aëta's weight,
Though thy breath more poisonous be
Than the baneful upas-tree;
And the fiery gulph beneath
Lend its withering blast to Death!
Thy power is past, for the trial is o'er,
The curse of existence can torture no more!

The ceremony was now drawing to a close. There remained scarcely the embers of the funeral pile. The urn stood with its contents unveiled. Marguerita then took it in her hands, and surrounded by the whole body of attendants, they together raised one long wild shriek, and the officiating priestess cast the last dust of leprosy to the winds.

I waited patiently for the part I was to perform. She presently approached me, and giving me a small box, said, "Fear no contagion. Our mountains are not so barren but that they produce herbs that can purify. There is still virtue in the vine leaf.* Since you left me this morning, the process has been observed, and now farewell. Our duty is a sacred one, and we have performed it. Do thou likewise thine."

* Pliny says that vine leaves are a cure for the leprosy.

HISTORICAL.

TRIAL OF CHARLES I.

[From the French of M Guizot.]

On the morning of January 20th, 1649, towards noon, the High Court, having first held its secret sitting in the Painted Chamber, prepared to enter upon the final details of its mission. Prayers were scarcely over, before it was announced that the king, borne in a close sedan between two rows of soldiers, was on the point of making his appearance. Cromwell ran to the windows, and as suddenly hastened back, pale, yet highly excited—"He is here, he is here, sirs; the hour for this grand affair draws nigh. Decide promptly, I beseech you, what you intend to reply; for he will instantly inquire in whose name and by what authority you presume to try him." No one making any reply, Henry Martin at length observed—"In the name of the Commons assembled in Parliament, and of all the good people of England." To this no objection was made. The court proceeded in solemn procession towards Westminster Hall, the President Bradshaw at its head; before him were borne the mace and sword; and sixteen officers armed with partisans, preceded the court. The President took his place in an arm-chair adorned with crimson velvet; at his feet sat the clerk, near a table covered with a rich Turkey carpet, and upon which were placed the mace and sword. On the right and left appeared the members of the court upon seats of scarlet cloth; while at the two ends of the hall stood the guards, all armed, a little in advance of the tribunal. The court being installed, all the doors were thrown open; the crowd rushed into the hall. Silence being restored, the act of the Commons appointing the court was read, the names were called over, and sixty-nine members were found to be present. "Sergeant," said Bradshaw, "let the prisoner be brought forward."

The king appeared under guard of Colonel Hacker and thirty-two officers. An arm-chair, adorned with crimson velvet, was in readiness for him at the bar. He came forward; fixed a long and severe look upon the court, and seated himself without taking off his hat. Suddenly he rose, looked round at the guard upon the left, and at the spectators upon the right of the hall; again fixed his eyes upon his judges, and then sat down, amidst the general silence of the court.

Bradshaw rose instantly—"Charles Stuart, King of England, the English Commons assembled in Parliament, deeply penetrated with a sense of the evils that have fallen upon this nation, and of which you are considered the chief author, are resolved to inquire into this sanguinary crime. With this view they have instituted this High Court of Justice, before which you are summoned this day. You will now hear the charges to be preferred against you."

The Attorney General Coke now rose. "Silence!" exclaimed the king, at the same time touching him on the shoulder with his cane. Coke, surprised and irritated, turned round; the handle of the king's cane fell off, and for a few moments he appeared deeply affected. None of his attendants were at hand to take it up; he stooped and picked it up himself, and then resumed his seat. Coke proceeded to read the act imputing to the king all the evils arising first out of his tyranny, subsequently from the war; and requiring that he should be bound to reply to the charges, and that judgement should be pronounced against him as a tyrant, a traitor, and a murderer.

During this time, the king continued seated, directing his eyes towards his judges, or towards the spectators, without betraying any emotion. Once he rose; turned his back upon the court to see what was passing behind him, and again sat down with an expression at once of inquisitiveness and indifference in his manner. Upon hearing the words: "Charles Stuart, a tyrant, traitor, and murderer," he laughed, though he still remained silent.

The act being read, "Sir," said Bradshaw, "you have now heard the act of accusation against you: the court expects you to reply."

The King. "First, I wish to know by what authority I am summoned here. A short time since, I was in the Isle of Wight engaged in negotiations with both houses of parliament, under guarantee of the public faith. We were upon the point of concluding a treaty. I would be informed by what authority—I say legitimate authority—for of illegitimate authorities there are, I know, many like that of robbers on the highway;—I would be informed, I repeat, by what authority I have been dragged from place to place, I know not with what views. When I am made acquainted with this legitimate authority, I will reply."

Bradshaw. "If you had attended to what was addressed to you by the court upon your arrival, you would know in what this authority consisted. It calls upon you, in the name of the people of England, of whom you were elected king, to make a reply."

The King. "No, sir, I deny this."

Bradshaw. "If you refuse to acknowledge the authority of the court, it will proceed against you."

The King. "I maintain that England never was an elective kingdom; for nearly the space of a thousand years it has been altogether an hereditary one. Let me know, then, by what authority I am summoned here. Inquire from Colonel Cobbet, who is here at hand, if I were not brought by force from the Isle of Wight. I will yield to none in maintaining the just privileges of the House of Commons in this place. But where are the Lords? I see no Lords here necessary to constitute a parliament. A king, moreover, is essential to it. Now is this what is meant by bringing the king to meet his parliament?"

Bradshaw. "Sir, the court awaits a definitive answer from you. If what we have stated respecting our authority does not satisfy you, it is sufficient for us, we know that it is founded upon the authority of God and of the country."

The King. "It is neither my opinion nor yours which should decide."

Bradshaw. "The court has heard you; you will be disposed of according to its orders. Let the prisoner be removed. The court adjourns until Monday."

The court then withdrew; and the king retired under the same escort that had accompanied him. Upon rising he perceived the sword placed upon the table. "I have no fear of that," he observed, pointing towards it with his cane. As he descended the staircase, several voices called out "Justice! justice!" but far the greater number were heard to exclaim, "God save the king! God save your majesty!"

On the morrow at the opening of the sitting, sixty-two members being present, the court ordered strict silence to be observed under pain of imprisonment. On his arrival, however, the king was not the less received with marked applause. The same sort of discussion commenced, and with equal obstinacy on both sides. "Sir," at length, exclaimed Bradshaw, "neither you, nor any other person shall be permitted to question the jurisdiction of this court. It sits by authority of the Commons of England—an authority to which both you and your predecessors are to be held responsible."

The King. "I deny that. Show me a single precedent." Bradshaw rose up in a passion:—"Sir, we do not sit here to reply to your questions. Plead to the accusation, guilty or not guilty?"

The King. "You have not yet heard my reasons."

Bradshaw. "Sir, no reason can be advanced against the highest of all jurisdictions."

The King. "Point out to me this jurisdiction; or you refuse to hear reason."

Bradshaw. "Sir, we show it to you here. Here are the Commons of England. Sergeant, remove the prisoner."

The king on this turned suddenly round towards the people. "Bear in mind," he said, "that the king of England has been condemned without being permitted to state his reasons in support of the people's liberty." These words were followed by an almost general cry of God save the king.

On the 27th at noon, after two hours conference in the painted chamber, the court opened, as usual, by calling a list of the names. At the name of Fairfax, a woman's voice from the bottom of the gallery was heard to exclaim, "He has too much sense to be here." After some moments' surprise and hesitation, the names were called over, and sixty-seven members were present. When the king entered the hall, there was a violent outcry: "Execution! justice! execution!" The soldiers became very insolent; some officers, in particular Axtel, commander of the guards, excited them to this uproar; the groups spread about through the hall, as busily seconded them. The people, struck with consternation, were silent.

"Sir," said the king, addressing Bradshaw, before he sat down, "I demand to speak a word; I hope that I shall give you no cause to interrupt me."

Bradshaw. "You will be heard in your turn. Listen first to the court."

The King. "Sir, if you please, I wish to be heard. It is only a word. An immediate decision."

Bradshaw. "Sir, you shall be heard at the proper time—first, you must listen to the court."

The King. "Sir, I desire,—what I have to say applies to what the court is, I believe, about to pronounce; and it is difficult, sir, to recall a precipitate verdict."

Bradshaw. "We shall hear you, sir, before judgement is pronounced. Until then you ought to abstain from speaking." Upon this assurance the king became more calm; he sat down, and Bradshaw proceeded:

"Gentlemen—it is well known that the prisoner at your bar has now been many times brought before this court to reply to a charge of treason, and other high crimes, exhibited against him in the name of the English people!"

"Not half the people," exclaimed the same voice that had spoken on hearing the name of Fairfax, "where is the people!—where is its consent!—Olivier Cromwell is a traitor."

The whole assembly seemed electrified:—all eyes turned towards the gallery: "Down with the w—s," cried Axtel; "soldiers fire upon them!" It was lady Fairfax. A general confusion now arose; the soldiers, though everywhere fierce and active, could with difficulty repress it. Order being at length a little restored, Bradshaw again insisted upon the king's obstinate refusal to reply to the charge, upon the notoriety of the crimes imputed to him, and declared that the court, though unanimous in its sentence, had nevertheless consented to hear the prisoner's defence, provided that he would cease to question its jurisdiction.

"I demand," said the king, "to be heard in the painted chamber, by both lords and commons, upon a proposition which concerns the peace of the kingdom and the liberty of my subjects much more nearly than my own preservation."

A violent tumult now spread throughout the court, and the whole assembly. Friends and enemies were all eager to divine for what purpose the king had demanded this conference with the two houses, and what it was his intention to propose to them.

Colonel Downs, a member of the court, expressed a wish that the king's proposition should be heard.

"Since one of the members desires it," said Bradshaw, gravely, "the court must retire;" and they immediately passed into a neighbouring hall.

In about half an hour the court returned, and Bradshaw informed the king that his proposition was rejected.

Charles appeared to be subdued, and no longer insisted with any degree of vigour.

"If you have nothing to add," said Bradshaw, "the court will proceed to give sentence."

"I shall add nothing, sir," said the king; "and only request that what I have said may be recorded." Without replying to this, Bradshaw informed him that he was about to hear his sentence; but before he ordered it to be read, he addressed to the king a long discourse, as a solemn apology for the proceedings of parliament, enumerating all the evil deeds of the king, and imputing to him alone all the misfortunes of the civil war, since it was his tyranny that had made resistance as much a matter of duty as of necessity. The orator's language was harsh and bitter, but grave, pious, free from insult, and stamped with profound conviction, though with a slight mixture of vindictive feeling. The king heard him without offering any interruption, and with equal gravity. In proportion, however, as the discourse drew towards a close, he became visibly troubled; and as soon as Bradshaw was silent, he endeavoured to speak: Bradshaw prevented him, and commanded the clerk to read the sentence. This being done, he said, "This is the act, opinion, and unanimous judgement of the court, and the whole court rose up in token of assent. 'Sir,' said the king, abruptly, 'will you hear one word?'"

Bradshaw. "Sir, you cannot be heard after sentence has been passed."

The King. "No sir!"

Bradshaw. "No, sir, with your permission, sir. Guards, remove the prisoner."

The King. "I can speak after sentence.—With your permission, sir, I have still a right to speak after sentence.—With your permission—Stay—The sentence, sir—I say, sir, that—I am not permitted to speak—think what justice others are to expect!"

At this moment he was surrounded by soldiers, and removed from the bar.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1828.

A tigress robbed of young, a lioness,
Or any interesting beast of prey,
Are smiles at hand for the distress
Of ladies who can not have their own way.

BYRON.

In a certain town in the county of blank, and state of ditto, an action was brought before a court of special sessions against Mrs. A. by the people, for an assault and battery on Mrs. B., the complainant, at which the following facts appeared, as sworn to by Mrs. B. and another woman present. It appeared that Mrs. A. went to the residence of Mrs. B., about three-fourths of a mile from her own house, for the express and avowed purpose of getting Morgan's Illustrations of Masonry, which she knew to be in the possession of Mrs. B. Whether the good woman had a pious regard for the salvation of her beloved spouse and intended by means of the book aforesaid to warn him of the dangerous tendency of freemasonry, doth not appear in evidence. We merely mention this as the probable motive of her visit, and can only regret that a few hundred copies of the Solemn Warning were not also distributed in that neighbourhood. But to proceed with the narration, Mrs. B. stated to Mrs. A. that the book had been loaned to her by a neighbour, with strict injunction not to let it pass from her possession without his order. She consequently refused to let Mrs. A. have the book. "But I will have the book," quoth Mrs. A.; "You shall not have the book," quoth Mrs. B. Here, gentle reader, if Tristram Shandy was forced to dwell for a whole chapter on the delicacy of his situation, when he was obliged to record the exclamation of Phutatorius, in the affair of the hot chestnut, how much more reluctant should we be to pollute our columns with the oath of a woman! Mrs. A. swore a terrible oath that she would have the book!

Finding that words were of no avail, and determined to leave no efforts untried to put her oath in force, [wonder if this oath may properly come under the denomination of extra judicial?] she undertook the experiment to see what effect pulling hair would have upon the obstinacy of Mrs. B. and forthwith commenced her lessons in that sublime art, by seizing as much of the hair on Mrs. B.'s forehead as she could hold in her grasp, and with the strength of a giant, dragging her towards the door. Mrs. B. naturally concluding that her own house was the most proper place for her, and at any rate, being not much inclined to make her exit in a hurry, laid hold of the door posts and maintained her position until the chief dependence of Mrs. A. came all out by the roots, leaving her nearly bald on one side of her forehead. Foiled in this attempt, Mrs. A. tried her next remaining resource, and having a good brawny fist of her own, manifested no little dexter-ity in its application upon the vulnerable parts of Mrs. B.'s head, face, and body. Whether she succeeded in bearing off the prize or not, the evidence not requiring it, we have not heard. It is however certain that she instructed her husband in a judicial degree to the tune of $10 and costs. Owing to the indigent circumstances, and in consideration of the benefits he would probably derive from his spouse's lectures on freemasonry, he was excused from any heavier public manifestation of the value which the law attached to his rib. Oh, what virtue there must be in masonick knowledge, when it produces so much harmony among the females, even novices in its mysteries! Go on patriotic expounders, and desist not till every woman and child is a "Scald Miserable Mason," and every door yard a lodge! Our daughters shall fancy their distaffs gavels; their check aprons, lambskins; and their stocking yarn a cabletow.

CEREMONIES AT NASHVILLE. The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of Tennessee, convened at Nashville, on Monday, the 10th of March last, pursuant to a special order, to testify their respect to the memory of the late General Grand High Priest, DE WITT CLINTON, at which nearly all the subordinate chapters were duly represented. On Tuesday, at 11 o'clock, a masonick procession was formed, by the Grand Chapter, together with the subordinate chapter and lodge of that town, and proceeded to the court house, where they were joined by the officers and students of the University of Nashville, and the whole of the Presbyterian church. In the church the whole ceremonies were appropriate and solemn. A solemn dirge was performed by a band, and a prayer offered by the Grand Chaplain, after which the address that we publish in the Record of to-day, by the Grand High Priest. Another hymn, and an address to the Throne of Grace, completed the exercises. The day was immoderately rainy, and the weather quite unfavourable to the proper observance of the day; yet this did not prevent the "brethren of the mystick tie," nor the University, from participating in this honourable testimony to the virtues of a worthy companion and brother, a philanthropist, and a scholar.

GREAT MEN. The definition of this term is so very indefinite, if we may use the expression, that in its unequalled application it may be said to mean almost any thing.—In the retrospect of history we see nothing but great men, from the common father of the human race down to Colonel Pluck and Orator Emmons; for history takes no subject under her guardianship without a reference to their measure,—or in other words, a man must be either a great philosopher, a great general, a great statesman, a great poet, a great orator, a great tyrant, a great scoundrel or a great fool, in order to have a place assigned him among the few whom history makes immortal. Consequently we know nothing of man but in his greatness, except in the little sphere of our acquaintance, while we are in the world ourselves; nothing of the little beyond our personal intercourse.

The numerous paths to greatness have however filled the temple of history with worshippers of the "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal." There is an assortment there of all degrees, and all statures; all hues and shades; of all nations, and kindreds, and tongues;—all crowded together, and all sueing for eminence at the high court of posterity. There is Leonidas, with his glorious three hundred who fought their way to greatness, through their own blood, and the craven sole survivor, who found the same immortality by flight, and stands with the same conspicuity on the page of infamy, as his martyred companions in arms do on the scroll of glory. Solomon made himself immortal by his temple and his "cities in the wilderness;" Titus also immortalized his name in destroying the one, and Aurelian the other.—Ctesiphon, the chief architect, is only remembered on the same page of the volume of greatness, with Eratosthratus, the incendiary, who went to immortality through the flames of the temple of Diana.

After all, what is to be great. To hand down to posterity a name of five, ten, fifteen, or more letters, to be repeated in mock-heroic poems, or tortured to death in the jaws of holyday orators;—to have the few private virtues which you possess, eclipsed by the glory of your many public crimes;—to have every noble deed coupled with its relative meanness, which grows more mean in the same proportion that it detracts from the brilliancy of its parallel;—to be praised when dead by lips which scorned you when living;—to become the anathema of those who kneeled and flattered in your presence;—and to add one proof more to the theorem, that fame and infamy are similar and collateral diagrams, which nothing but sophistry can separate.

We see many of our cotemporaries, striving to be great, by any means,—no matter how,—since conscience forms no part of their rule of search. Study, labour, travel, flattery, and calumny, liberality and parsimony, candour and intrigue,—are all had in requisition and used as occasion may require, by the crawling apes of human greatness. And what is their recompense for a life of such remediless pain and folly? Nine out of ten will not be remembered twenty years after their death; and were it otherwise,—would an eternity of fame ever atone for a life of self torture and jeopardy to future existence? If the sceptre of the world is despicable in comparison with present peace or future beatitude, how much more despicable must be the vanity of a great name, which at best is but breath.

To close these desultory thoughts, we must again come back to the language of plain simple nature, the first teachings of whose lips are that true happiness is the chief end of our being. To be upright, and to be happy are all that heaven requires of us; and he who neglects either of these requirements for the possession of any of the uncertainties of time, is a rebel against heaven and the sovereignty of his own soul. The natural inference then is, that one day in the pursuit of true happiness is better than a whole life of vain and uncertain contention with fate, for an age or two of profligate fame.

FOREIGN. The packet ships Brighton and Manchester, arrived at New-York, bring London papers to the evening of the second of March, inclusive. The London Times of February 28, mentions the fact that the house of commons, in a vote taken the preceding Tuesday, gave a majority of 44 in favour of repealing the celebrated test and corporation acts. The government of the Netherlands have revived the project of cutting a canal to unite the gulf of Mexico with the Pacific ocean. A vessel is fitting out for an expedition to Guatemala, to carry out engineers &c., and the government of Guatemala are to aid and protect the work.

At Constantinople matters seem to approach something like a crisis. Rigorous measures still continue; and the closing of the Bosphorus against all christian nations, is conclusive proof that Turkey no longer cares for the maintenance of the existing treaties with other governments. Accounts from Vienna dated February 17, represent that the situation of the christians in Constantinople is considered so alarming, that it is feared the Russians will immediately cross the Pruth.

The new Brunswick theatre lately erected in London, has been totally demolished by the falling in of its immense iron roof. The accident happened in the forenoon during a rehearsal, on the 28th of February. Nineteen persons, attached to the company and building, lost their lives. The weight of the roof is stated to have been sixty tons, and the walls only three bricks thick. Eight thousand persons were in the building the Monday previous, and it is almost a miracle the immense pressure had not then crushed the walls, and proved even a greater calamity than fire, to the unwary audience.

THE MORGAN COMMISSIONER.

[In Assembly, April 12.]

Sketch of the debate on the third reading of the bill "to provide for the employment of counsel for the purposes therein mentioned."

Mr. WILLIAMS at length, and with more than his usual ability, addressed the house, against the passage of the bill. (Mr. W. was absent when the bill was the second time acted on in committee of the whole.) He objected strongly to the appointment of an officer with such unheard of powers, for a special purpose. If necessary, he would enlarge the powers of the district attorneys, or he would direct the attorney general to spend a whole year in making investigations; he would appoint a solicitor general, and let this be his first duty, but he would not appoint an officer like that proposed by this bill. Mr. W. asked if this bill was intended to destroy the fraternity of masons, and if some men did not aim to rise into power on its ruins. He feared it was a political bark, and if so, he apprehended its navigators would be wrecked, before they arrived at their intended haven.

What good can arise from this bill, when it is evident that it grew out of a party scuffle. Whether true or not, the subject has now got into such a situation, that unless we put down the bill by common consent, the world will believe that it was intended for political effect. Mr. W. would not lend his aid, directly or indirectly to persecute any society. He was not a mason, but he had friends who were,—men that were ornaments to religion, and blessings to society. He could not believe these men were hypocrites. Washington presided over a lodge for many years, which he would not have done, had there been any thing in masonry dangerous to his country. Many other worthies were prominent masons, and it could not be believed that they would conspire against virtue or liberty, or that their "oaths were blasphemies, and their veracity perjury." There was a Judas among the Twelve. Because there are some wicked masons, is the whole fraternity to be persecuted, condemned, and destroyed? Because religion produces fanatics, would you abolish it? He knew that from masonry good had resulted. He knew one instance where savage ferocity had been tamed and the tomahawk arrested through its influence. The late Col. John M'Kinstry of Columbia county had been taken by the Indians, and was tied to the stake of death, when Brandt discovered him to be a mason, and he was saved. Mr. W. apprehended the greatest evils would be the consequence of this bill. A commissioner is appointed whose business it is to suspect. Father and mother are to be brought before him to accuse their offspring: brother is to be arrayed against brother: the wife against her husband. He may seize the papers of individuals and of lodges, and expose their secrets to the world, by the exercise of this inquisitorial power. And who are the subjects of this power? Every man in every part of the state. Suppose a man is asked what oaths masons take, and he says he don't choose to tell. What then? Why, commit him! Fill your jails with persons who will not answer every question which shall be put to them, by the commissioner, and which questions are limited only by his own discretion and caprice! The liberty of the citizen depends on the will of this officer, and no man is sure that he will possess his liberty for an hour!

The individual questioned does not know but the object is to obtain testimony to be used against himself hereafter; and is it proper that he should be compelled to answer questions under such circumstances? It is in vain that I shall be told that only proper questions will be put. The possibility that improper interrogatories may be made, is enough to induce me to vote against it. Will you grant these alarming powers, or will you not rather leave the people in possession of the rights secured to them by the constitution. The throne of England was once shaken almost to its foundation, by the feeling excited by the issuing of warrants to seize papers of suspected persons, at the fiat of the minister. Will the legislature of New-York authorize the exercise of such a power in this land? Will they pass an act which is dangerous in its principles, and in its details alarming to liberty? They will rue the day in which they pass it!

It will but add fuel to the flame in the west, and which I fear already burns with portentous aspect; but which I hope will not consume our liberties, as I am satisfied it has consumed the discretion of some of the members.

Many will believe that it is intended to put down masonry, and others that it is for political purposes. The public indignation may be turned from the murderers of Morgan, against those who have the baseness to use the excitement for wicked purposes.

Mr. W. said that for one he would not sacrifice his country to preserve his party. This commissioner will not act even under the solemnity of an oath, not even a mason's oath. He is to have all this power without any responsibility, except responsibility to his creator—party. All the hope is, that the executive will not appoint an improper person to wield powers so improvidently given.

Mr. EDGERTON said he should not have troubled the house with any remarks upon the bill now before them, but for the conviction upon his mind, that it was intended for political purposes, and for political effect. I am, sir, a mason, and have been for many years, and with other gentlemen who have gone before me in the discussion, am ready here and elsewhere to avow it, but for different reasons, and I trust from other motives. As a mason, sir, I regard not the measure now proposed to be taken; for it will pass by "like the idle wind;" it will not injure masons; it will not detect the base and cold blooded murderers of Morgan, or restore him to life. I do not then, as a mason oppose this bill; but as a representative of a free people, and as an American citizen, I am compelled to enter my serious and solemn protest against its passage. What are we about to do? The bill proposes to invest an individual to be appointed by the person administering the government of this state, with the power of all your district attorneys, and your attorney general, to visit every part of your state, to hunt up witnesses, and the persons implicated in the crime of the abduction of Morgan. No oath is required of this officer for the faithful discharge of his duty; his power is almost unlimited, and he is to be a sort of vicegerent throughout your state. This individual with his semi-omnipotence and his ubiquity, is one to use the language of the poet, "dressed in a little brief authority, and may play such fantastic tricks before high heaven, as to make the angels weep." The world has seen and felt too much of this work already, and very little will be more than is wanted in this free community. There is enough lurking in the vindictive passion and prejudices of mankind, without its being fomented by panders and sophists. I know, sir, that tyrants and political demagogues, who ride upon the necks of the people, never think of patting, until they have worn out the lashes of their whips, and broken the rowels of their spurs. All experience in all ages, has proved this. I have said that this excitement was kept up for political purposes at the west; and its continuance is to secure votes for this man, that man or the other. This bill is intended to be passed to catch the popular breeze, and to secure votes. I care not what political party it will benefit; nor do I care who are anxious to get into the giddy current. One thing, I will venture to predict, that party which depends on such fragile props, such broken reeds, will tumble into ruin; and I defy gentlemen, to tell me, on whose head this political volcano will eventually burst. The excitement at the west, is a powder house, and it will be dangerous, I apprehend, to play with torches amidst materials so combustible, and whose explosion will produce such desolation.

Many of my best friends are masons, and I would appeal to the gentlemen from the west, whether they do not find among masons as much talent, integrity and elevated patriotism, as among any class of our citizens. Why then this crusade against a class of men for the crimes of the guilty? Why are the worst passions of our frail nature to be armed with triple vengeance against the masonic fraternity? I, sir, for one, will treat that man as a calumniator and a slanderer, who charges me, or the whole masonic fraternity with the murder of Morgan; or as being accessory to it, in thought word or deed. If, sir, the masonic fraternity is wicked and corrupt, there is a power as matchless and resistless as the wave of the ocean, that can annihilate and crush it to atoms. That power is public opinion, to which you and I, and this house are accountable, and whose will we dare not disregard, and whose voice we dare not disobey. Let that opinion effect its destruction, let that with all its energies be put in requisition, and if that is against it, its total, its final and perpetual destruction is sealed. The law now on your table will not, can not reach this object. If the masonic institution is chargeable with the crime of Morgan's murder, it will be disclosed, it will be published; and let the constituted authorities of your state, as they now exist, do their duty; but do not let the constitution and the laws be violated by such a course. Another objection to this law is, that it is to continue in force but one year. Will it be possible for this officer to traverse your state, and to complete this investigation before his term of office will expire. It will be impossible; it cannot be done. What are you to do? here are individuals who by his clemency and mercy are bound to appear and answer at a court. Others are in the same situation, or perhaps the tender mercies of this officer has caused them to be committed to prison, to await their trial for being suspected: his office expires, and the individuals are to be thus confined until he can be re-appointed, or further proceedings can be had. Sir, I feel degraded, to be compelled to oppose such a bill at this enlightened day; and as a matter of history, this day's proceedings, when our bodies "are beneath the cold clouds of the valley," will be looked upon by our posterity as we look upon the persecution of the Quakers by our forefathers who, like masons, "will still do good by stealth, and blush to think it fame." In addition to the constitutional objections to this bill, which have been so ably urged, neither policy or expediency call for its passage; its object is to secure popularity for political purposes, and as such I can not and will not vote for it to serve any party.

Messrs. Emmet and Gross, also spoke against the bill, and Messrs. Wardwell, Dana, Granger, and Cheever, for it. A call by Mr. Ruggles for the previous question, stopped debate, and also prevented Mr. Emmet from making a motion to re-commit the bill to a committee of the whole. The bill then passed, 66 to 44; the vote being as follows:

Ayes—Messrs. Alburta, Armstrong, Barber, Bates, Belding, Blakely, Boyd, Bradish, Brinkerhoff, Bryan, D. Burt, Butler, Carrier, Cary, Chapin, Cheever, Childs, J. Clark, Dana, Dayton, Dean, Doyle, Dyckman, Fillmore, Fitch, Frothingham, Garney, Glover, Granger, Greene, Hammond, Hadden, Howland, Jones, Knorrigh, Livingston, Lynde, A. [From the New-York Evening Post of April 14.]

MORGAN DISCOVERED IN ASIA. We have seen and conversed with the captain of a ship recently arrived from Smyrna, who has informed us that there is now living at Smyrna an American, who is undoubtedly, the much-talked of, mysterious Mr. Morgan. He arrived at Smyrna about a year and a half ago, in a brig from Boston, and immediately on his arrival placed himself under the protection of the Hadgi Bey, was circumcised—induced himself with a monstrous turban and a pair of wide trowsers—had his head shaved, and so became an accomplished and undoubted Mussulman. He frequently spoke of the United States, and manifested a very intimate acquaintance with the western part of this state and the Canadas. He had, when he arrived at Smyrna, a considerable sum of money, with which he commenced business; but the Turks took an opportunity of robbing him, in spite of his turban; and when our informant left, Mr. Morgan was very anxious to return to the United States. His real name could not be ascertained, because, when asked, he gave himself different appellations; but it was the general opinion among the American merchants and captains at Smyrna, that he was no other than the unhappy, murdered Morgan. He was commonly known by the name of the American Turk. Our informant describes him as being a man about 50—about 5 feet 8 or 9 inches high, and rather stout built.

On Thursday morning last, between 12 and 1 o'clock, twenty-eight buildings, exclusive of out-houses and stables, situated in Beaver, Hudson and Green streets, in this city, were entirely destroyed by fire.

FOR AN ALBUM.

Many a weary line has glided
From my tuneless quill,
And the thoughts in which I prided
Haunt my fancy still;
But fair eyes have lost their wonted
Sympathizing tear,
And even friendship's smile is blunted
By the critick's sneer.

Hopes, that strung my lyre, are scattered
To the breeze of night;—
They, like others came and flattered
But to take their flight:
Yet I mourn not for the hollow
Cheerings that they gave,—
Meet it is that hope should follow
Friendship to the grave!

Maiden,—let thy cherished pages
Hold these lines in trust,
Till distracted malice rages
Vainly o'er my dust:—
Then may they escape the blighting
Far sublimer verse
Has encountered in the biting
Of the critick's curse.

The article following has been forwarded to us, with several others, as the productions of two young men, brothers, who have lately commenced scribbling. If their effusions are strictly original, they are not wholly destitute of merit, and the authors may safely venture the task of enlarging, and improving their taste. There is a wide field for their Pegasus to range in.

MY OLD COAT.

Ah, many days have lonely flown
Since thou wert with the rubbish thrown,
And wild 's the sorrow I have known
Since last we met—
Dame fortune sour and sullen grown,
And I in debt.

Old coat,—when first thou gracedst my back,
My boat had got the golden track,
And fortune drove me with a smack
Full swiftly on,—
But now the jade, alack!—alack!
Has surely flown.

When first I wore thee, hope was strong,
And bore me carelessly along;—
'Twas then I reckless wed to song—
But now I reck
That e'er, her fated bowers among,
I thrust my neck.

Farewell, old coat—thy fate is mine,
I've lost my wealth,—and thou thy shine—
I've served my turn, as thou hast thine;—
Be this thy knell:
I mind thee now "for auld lang syne"—
Old coat, farewell!

LOVE'S VAGARIES.

Reader—kind gentle reader,—it is now
Some seven weeks past I sung to thee about Divers and sundry freaks of love—and how,
By turns, each flame was kindled and went out;—
Until at last—by chance Dan Cupid fell
Upon a maiden ycleped Christabelle:—

And then I stopped, as in love's duty bound—
But with a promise, that, should any thing
Unloose the chain which turns my heart around
With beauty's witchery—my muse should sing
Again. Now though your hearts no doubt are glad To hear her music—mine is very sad!

Sad as—a piece of faded silk—which erst
Sported a thousand colours, but at last

Faded and worn out—like a thing accursed,
Amid the wreck of perished stuff is cast,
Unfit even for patch-work—and too poor
To rub a piece of household furniture.

Would I had never met with such a belle
As this same Christa—one!—oh, such a race
Ne'er did a poor heart run!—and passing well
Thine eye might read it in my pallid face:—
Once full—now thin as parchment—and mine eye,
A pure fac-simile of vacancy.

I don't know how it happened—for my glass
Told me I looked the same—and quite as fair—
I never doubted it:—but let that pass,
"Women like moths are ever caught by glare,"—
So sang Lord Byron—and I am inclined,
Just now, to be precisely of his mind.

I can't tell how it was:—some way or other
My Christabelle grew cold, and did not smile
So fondly as at first—perhaps, another
Stole in, "old serpent fashion," to beguile
Her "young affections"—till at length 'twas plain
My sighs and tender looks were all in vain.

It grew so bad at last—I almost blush
To name it—that as often as I tried
To win her love, she only answered "tush!"—
And when I said she would—she said I ****!
And bade me, if I would not be a fool,
To mind my business—or go back to school!

Odds bows and arrows!... how my heart did swell,
To think that such a trifling thing should tease me!
But when I come to think upon it well,
I found she was not near the thing to please me....
And so... I'm up again for sale.... who 'll buy me?
Ladies, I'm in the market.... come and try me!

MY FATHER'S BIRTH-DAY.

My father, on thy brow
That fifty winters have passed o'er, and left
Traces of care, and toil, and love bereft:
Where youth no more her seal of hope hath set,
But manhood's loftiness is lingering yet,—
Be blessings now!

My father, on thy form,
Where sorrow's storms have beaten heavily—
But which still standeth proud and boldly free,
Where, at the call of liberty and truth,
The heart yet boundeth with the glow of youth,
Be blessings warm!

My father, on thy soul
May memory's fountains gush in loveliness—
And all that in life's morn had power to bless,
Be in thy age a store of beauty fraught
With recollected joys. Tides of sweet thought
Over thee roll!

And ere that head shall bow
To the dark conqueror, and the spirit part
From all that makes earth lovely,—when the heart
Now beating with affection shall be chilled,
And the loved voice forever stilled,
Be thy child's lowt

THE DEPARTED.

Lament not the dead!
He is peacefully sleeping;
And love near his bed
Her long vigil is keeping;
The young eye of gladness
Is faded and dim;
And fond ones in sadness
Are mourning for him.

Their grief will depart;
Their affections deceive them;
And we to the heart
That too firmly believes them.
The tears of their sorrow
Are fervent to-day,
But hope comes to-morrow
And charms them away.

But there's one will be true
Though all the rest alter;

Her tears may be few,
But her heart will not falter
In life they were parted;
He was not her own:
But now, broken hearted,
She weeps him alone.

Knows she not there's a rest
Where love will be surer,
And the hearts of the blessed
Shall be brighter and purer?
Long ages and pleasures
Shall dawn on despair,
And the heart that she treasures
Shall welcome her there.

THE DYING POET.

'Tis over! life's bewildering dream is fading from my sight,
And soon my weary heart shall rest in death's untroubled night;
To-morrow's setting sun will gleam upon the icy brow
Of him who turns with failing eye to watch its glories now

Thou setting sun! how oft on thee I've gazed in early years,
Until my infant eyes have filled with soft delicious tears;
Alas! I little knew such tears from those deep fountains sprung,
Which since o'er all the flowers of life their venom'd sweets have flung

My thoughts were not as others' thoughts, for nature ever spoke
A deeper language to my heart, and sweeter feeling awoke;
The golden sun, the flower decked earth, the mountain's rushing stream
Each filled my wild and restless thought with some enrapturing dream.

Oh! ne'er can I forget the hour—the blissful hour, when first
O'er Castaly's pure fount I bent to quench my spirit's thirst;
When, dazzled by my glorious dreams, o'ermastered by a throng
Of thoughts too beautiful for speech, I poured them forth in song.

And then too came the voice of praise, whose all-resistless spell
Upon my burning fancy sweet as dews of evening fell;
Alas! as night-dews fall alike to freshen weeds and flowers,
Thus while it wakened loftier thoughts it roused dark passion's powers.

With fearless foot I dared to climb ambition's dizzy way,
For by its own resplendent light my soul was led astray;
I lived but on the breath of fame—the gentler hopes of life
Were all unheeded, while I gave myself to envious strife.

Yet there was one—a gentle girl, whose look had power to still
The busy demon in my heart, and mould me to her will;
But ah! she feared to share with me a poet's wayward fate,—
She could not prize a minstrel's love, and—I am desolate!

Yet not unblest has been my life; my song has had high power
To cheer the heavy thoughts of wo in many a weary hour;
And many a gentle heart has ceased to feel its own distress,
While bending o'er the page that told a poet's wretchedness.

My lot has been a lonely one, and now unwept I die;
Strangers will close my glazing eyes and hear my latest sigh;
Yet they will write upon the stone that marks my lowly grave,—
"Joyless and lone he passed his life,—but joy to others gave!"

EPITAPH.

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

She lived! what further can be said
Of all the generations dead?
She died!—what more can be foretold
Of all the living, young and old?
She lived,—as in her maker's eye,
At every step prepared to die:
She died,—as one exchanging breath
For immortality in death:
Her dust is here, her spirit there—
Eternity! O tell me where!

MASONICK RECORD.

Communicated for the American Masonick Record.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered before Western Light Lodge, No, 105, at Union Village, Broome county, on the anniversary of St. John the Evangelist, December 27, 5827.

BY BR. SAMUEL M. HUNT.

It has been the practice amongst all civilized nations to devote certain days for the celebration of events of a pleasing and joyous nature. The Jewish nation observed many periodical festivals, which not only served to exhibit their gratitude for the favours received, but was the means of transmitting to posterity glorious events that had distinguished them as a peculiar people. Other nations imitating their examples have regarded particular days as worthy to be noticed on account of some achievement performed, some glorious revolution accomplished, or as the birth day of some conspicuous personage.

In accordance with this custom we have assembled on this occasion to celebrate the nativity of an illustrious character, distinguished not as an aspiring hero in the annals of war, but as a philanthropist, and one eminent for piety and true religion. Should we refer to history for the character of Saint John the Evangelist, and trace him through the various vicissitudes of life, we should find him zealously engaged in meliorating the condition of mankind. While employed in his domestic concerns he received a call to enter into a more public and important station in life. He immediately renounced the pleasures of the world and became one of the most worthy of the christian disciples. This is the one who leaned upon the breast of the Saviour;—this is he of whom it is written "the disciple whom Jesus loved."

While many professing christians proved treacherous and dishonest, and attempted a perversion of the doctrines of christianity, Saint John remitted no exertion, but continued actively employed as an evangelist in promulgating the truth which he had received. Even while persecuted by the unrelenting hand of tyranny, separated from his friends and brethren on the remote and desert island of Patmos, there was no remission of his zeal. It was even there he had the most exalted views of the person and character of Deity.

Although many generations have passed since the day which gave birth to this celebrated individual, there can be no rational objection produced against the propriety of celebrating the day which bestowed upon the world so great and such a distinguished blessing. All allow the propriety of christians assembling together in order to keep in memory the anniversary of their ancient brother; yet there may be some in this assembly who would inquire, why we have convened in the peculiar character of masons to celebrate this event? To this inquiry I would reply that the views of our patron saint were not confined to the narrow precincts of one church or society; but wherever he discovered an institution embracing principles of virtue and morality, established for the cultivation of reason, promoting true friendship among the different ranks and orders of mankind, with their primary object of rendering themselves serviceable to their fellow creatures, he never thought it derogatory to the dignity of his character to attach himself to them, to patronize their assemblies, and extend their utility. Hence we have not only met this day to speak of his character as a christtian, but we have come in this garb to venerate his memory as a mason. Illustrious event! memorable era! that witnessed so many virtues concentrated in one inspired individual of our mortal race!

No generation ever witnessed such exhibitions of distinguished characters. For the nations of the earth that had long lain in darkness saw great light! the blazing star in the east guiding the wise men to the place of the Infant Redeemer's nativity.—At this period likewise lived Saint John the Baptist, whose memory also every true mason delights to honour.

But perhaps an inquiry might be made how we know that Saint John ever bore the character of a freemason, since the scriptures say nothing on the subject! Can any one infer from the scriptures alone that this was not the case? Should we take the scriptures as the only authentick source of information, of the lives and characters of individuals, and depend upon them solely for the history of the arts and sciences, narrow indeed must be our scope of information. The bible was designed to teach men religion, not to describe the rise and progress of every moral society. The observance of certain rights and ceremonies as commemorative of events, has ever been held to establish their authenticity, by connecting circumstances back to their origin. The ceremony of the passover most forcibly establishes the truth that the Jews were remarkably preserved and delivered from Egyptian bondage. For this was kept as a memorial and to be duly observed by them and their sons forever, as an ordinance indicative of the salvation that was wrought in their behalf, while their enemies fell by the hand of the destroyer. They were directed to say unto their children when they inquired "what mean ye by this service?"—"it is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians and delivered our houses." If then the observance of such ordinances serve to prove the authenticity of such events we have the same authority to conclude that Saint John was in reality a mason. To those who have made considerable proficiency in the science of masonry it is a fact well known and elucidated;—and those who have barely been initiated into the rudiments of the art, or who have formed the slightest knowledge of speculative masonry, may judge from this fact, that all masons professing Christianity, dedicate their lodges to Saint John the Baptist and Saint John the Evangelist. But the objector will say, if such were the characters who anciently embraced and supported the principles of masonry, your system must have undergone a sad change since their day. Not so, my friend; the principles of masonry remain the same, and are subject to no particular change, being established on a basis which is not impaired by the revolution of time.—But that men professing masonry may change, and men of corrupt principles impose upon our lodges and evade for awhile the scrutiny of honest brethren, is a fact I shall not pretend to deny.

Perhaps there never was a period when circumstances of so unpleasant a nature have occurred as at the present day, to excite publick prejudice against our ancient institution. The enemies of masonry seem to exult in the belief that a fatal blow has been levelled at the foundation of the order. If individuals of any particular society have violated civil laws, and justly exposed themselves to the resentment of an incensed community, would it be just to exterminate the whole of such society, and punish the innocent equally with the guilty! Yet some pretend to say that all masons were in some measure concerned in the accomplishment of that foul deed to which we refer, viz: the kidnaping and subsequent disposal of Morgan. But I think I need not resort to any argument in such an enlightened community, in order to refute so palpable an error. An assertion so inconsistent and nefarious in its intent, need but to be suggested in order to be despised. Every honest man in community, however illiberal his sentiments may be towards our institution, is constrained to discredit so foul a charge.

And again it is argued, if we were not in a manner accessory to the deed, still we justify the conduct of those who were concerned in it. This is another assertion which we most solemnly deny.—We know moreover that not an individual, while under the influence of the principles of the institution, could ever countenance so flagrant a violation of the laws of our happy land. Hence, whoever supposes that they were impelled by a sense of their duty as masons to commit the outrage, is positively most grossly mistaken. And any man who ever belonged to the fraternity, who countenances such an assertion, imposing upon the credulity of those who are ready to believe any thing that is prejudicial to the order, must violate his conscience, by sanctioning that which he absolutely knows to be false! And now, instead of withholding any thing in relation to that disgraceful transaction from the publick, we anxiously wish for the time to arrive, when the truth, and nothing but the truth, shall be disclosed,—that the innocent may no longer be censured, while the guilty may be brought to condign punishment. Then would this unhappy excitement be allayed, which now unfortunately produces such a diversity of opinion. While the accounts in our publick prints are so contradictory upon this subject, as at the present, we know not when to give credit, nor when to withhold belief.

That there are evil disposed persons, wishing to take advantage of the times to prejudice community in their favour, for the purpose of raising themselves to office, without talents or reputation, having no other qualifications than their boasted ill will to masonry, must appear obvious, when we reflect upon the course pursued, in putting in circulation reports which they knew were false, imposing upon the credulity of the publick, and boasting they would "answer their purpose until after election." While men are thus imposing upon the sympathies of many, crying down the institution of masonry, representing themselves as friends to the rights of man, and bound to support them whenever invaded, the unbiassed eye may discover them in their true character,—not unlike a Robespierre and other infidel self-styled republicans in the French revolution, aiming at the destruction of every religious institution.

To produce discord among christians, they encourage the editors of religious papers to publish essays calculated to militate against the feelings of masonick brethren of their churches, destroying harmony among those who had dwelt together for years in unity, and

"Like kindred drops been mingled one to one."

Brethren of the fraternity who had long been distinguished for piety, and had enjoyed the privileges of the church which none of their christian friends felt disposed to envy them on account of their improvement in the science of masonry, are now witnessing the frowns of their brethren. And clergymen, who had long been members of the fraternity, and who had been respected as the most exemplary men of piety, and distinguished as profound advocates for the true gospel, are threatened to be silenced, unless they will come forth to this modern inquisition, and not only renounce masonry, but pronounce it to be a bad institution, which their love of truth cannot suffer them to utter.—Taking advantage of the prejudice and superstition of church members, evil minded men would gladly subvert every principle of religion. For they know that the saying of the Saviour is true, "a house divided against itself cannot stand."—Through the fatal influence of bad men, how many good meaning christians are taking up the sword of persecution with as much malignity as a Saul of Tarsus. They do not credit the solemn declaration of their brethren, that there is nothing in the secrets of masonry repugnant to christianity. On other subjects they would acknowledge themselves blameable to discredit their integrity; but when they speak favourably of masonry, that good opinion is lost in the vortex of prejudice. Of all the indications of mental imbecility, this appears most prominent, that men should judge so harshly of things beyond their knowledge; for how can they possibly judge of a subject that they know nothing about? Opinions thus formed must be as imperfect as an infant's ideas of algebra. Hence we find men arguing against masonry, and deducing reasons as foreign to the subject as light is to darkness. How often have we heard it said that masons are obliged to keep each other's secrets, and if called upon as witnesses, or jurors, they must rather violate their duty as good citizens, than suffer their brethren though guilty to be brought to justice. This is an assertion on which the enemies of masonry found their principal arguments,—which if true, I admit would be sufficient to demolish the institution. But this is as repugnant to truth as it is contrary to the voice of reason.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

OHIO.

Extract from the Minutes of the Lafayette Lodge, in Cincinnati, Ohio, at a stated meeting, on the evening of the 12th March, A. L. 5828.

The following preamble and resolutions were offered, and unanimously adopted:—

Whereas, one of the most grateful duties that devolve upon society, consists in offering to exalted merit the voluntary tribute of admiration and respect: and whereas, it has been customary in all civilized countries, for societies to give some distinctive evidence of sorrow and regret, when individual excellence of more than ordinary character, and connected with them, is suddenly snatched from the world by the remorseless hand of death: and whereas, masonry from her diffident and retiring nature can not give that public and imposing demonstration of the estimation in which she holds individual worth, that the members of common society can indulge in; but is forced by her unobtrusive disposition to conceal to a certain extent, her official acts, as she does her charities: and whereas there is one way for brethren to give vent to those sentiments of gratitude and respect, which the recollection of private worth and public services naturally inspire, by pouring their feelings into the bosom of the fraternity and inscribing them on the rolls of the order; therefore

Resolved, that the members of Lafayette Lodge have heard with the most deep-felt sensations of grief, of the bereavement which masonry and our country have sustained in the unexpected death of the distinguished statesman, the untiring patriot and accomplished mason, DE WITT CLINTON: that while we sympathize with the citizens of a great state on being deprived of the master spirit that gave life and energy to the great cause of internal improvement, by embracing with his vigorous intellect the whole system of operative, as well as speculative masonry; while we mourn with our country at large the loss of a man whose history is identified with her fame and her glory, yet as masons, we feel a still more intense sorrow at the loss of a brother, whose career presented to the world the most perfect illustration of the lessons of the craft; who in every station of life, however exalted, continued firm in his devotion to the cause of masonry, and whose exertions have shed a halo round her brow, that has restored to her much of her ancient splendour.

Resolved, that the brethren of Lafayette Lodge, appear in the lodge room on six successive nights, with black crapes on the left arm, in token of their respect for the memory of this great citizen, and distinguished mason.

Resolved, that a committee of two be appointed to meet committees which may be appointed from the other lodges of this city, to take further measures for showing their respect for the memory of their deceased brother.

Resolved, that brother Past Master Neville and brother R. E. Lytle be this committee.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

ARTIFICIAL FRUITS AND FLOWERS.

From the National Aegis.

The following curious paper appears in an old volume of "Transactions of the Italian Academy." Naturalists tell us, that the embryos of future plants exist in the seeds, formed even before the flower-leaves expand: and it is possible, though not very probable, that they may vegetate in fluids. This mode of production rests on the authority of the Jesuit Father, its author: we are not aware that the experiment has been repeated since 1670, by modern cultivators. The air of sincerity, over the account, may render it an exception to the deceptive fictions coined by the vivid imagination of speculative men, in a remote age.

Memoir by Father Francisco Lana.

I took a quantity of flowers of the Orange Tree, and put them into about half a pound of oil of almonds together with a little alum, and so enclosed all in a glass vial; which being well stopp'd, I exposed to the sun for a month, adding more flowers when the first decayed, yet without removing those. A month being passed, I poured off the oil, impregnated with the virtues of the flowers and very odoriferous, into other glass vials, and carefully set them aside, leaving them untouched until the next spring;—then on looking into the vials, I observed in them certain little plants with flowers swimming in the oil, which to me appeared not at all different from the true and fresh leaves of the orange tree: but the wonder increased some months afterwards, when the hot season being advanced, the flowers were turned into little fruits, about the same time that such fruit ripened upon the tree, there being at the bottom of the vials some small oranges with their proper colours, together with those minute specks that fruit usually has: so that they were in nothing distinguishable from true oranges except in smallness. There are many individuals in the college of Rome whom I might mention as witnesses of this curious and strange metamorphosis; but I will mention only one—His Excellency Innocentia Conti, Lieutenant General of the army of the church, a man of rare valour and sublime genius, to whom I presented one of my vials, in which every year, hitherto, in the blooming season, have appeared such flowers, which are afterwards transformed into fruits like those I have described.

POISONOUS INGREDIENTS.

[From a recent work on Animal and Vegetable Poisons.]

The seeds of the berries of the strychnos, more commonly known by the name of nux vomica, which is brought from the East Indies, is a very active poison, and particularly so to dogs and to the brute species in general, though it has been used on the continent in moderate doses for various diseases, which there it has had the reputation of curing. In this country, it has rarely been prescribed. It is one of the articles employed in the adulteration of fermented liquors, to which it imparts an intoxicating, and, we may add, a very poisonous quality. When taken in an overdose, nux vomica produces very rapidly a general torpor of the system, nervous tremblings, coma, convulsions, tetanus or locked jaw, and death; its actions being confined principally to the brain and nervous system, and affecting but little the stomach and intestines. The cocculus indicus, a berry well known in this country, is also a narcotick poison, frequently put into porter to impart to it an inebriating quality, and though by no means so active or so dangerous as the nux vomica, yet it is a very improper article to be used for such purposes.

HABITS OF SEALS.

From the Edinburgh Quarterly Journal.

The brain of this animal, observes Dr. Harwood, is I think, doubtless, of greater proportionate magnitude than in any other quadruped, and not only does it exhibit in its countenance, the appearance of sagacity, but its intelligence is in reality far greater than in most land quadrupeds: hence its domestication is rendered much easier than that of other animals, and it is susceptible of more powerful attachment. The large seal, which was exhibited some time ago at Exeter 'Change, appeared to me to understand the language of its keeper as perfectly as the most faithful dog. When he entered at one end of its long apartment, it raised its body from the water, in which it was injudiciously too constantly kept, supporting itself erect against the bar of its enclosure, and wherever he moved, keeping its large, dark eyes steadfastly fixed upon him. When desired to make obeisance to visitors, it quickly threw itself on one side, and struck the opposite one several times in quick succession with its fore-foot, producing a loud noise. The young seal, again, which was kept on board the Alexander, in one of the northern expeditions, became so much attached to its new mode of life, that after being thrown into the sea, and it had become tired of swimming at liberty, it regularly returned to the side of the boat, to be retaken on board. Such examples might be greatly multiplied; and I cannot help stating, that aware of this disposition to become familiar, and this participation in the good qualities of the dog, it is astonishing that mankind have not chosen this intellectual and finely organized quadruped, for aquatic services scarcely less important than some of those in which the dog is employed on the surface of the land.

SHEEP IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Abridged from Loudon's Encyclopedia.

The long woolled British sheep are the Teeswater, old and new Leicester, Devenshire Nots, Exmoor, and Heath breeds. The short woolled are the Dorsetshire, Hereford or Ryeland, South Down, Norfolk, Cheviot, Shetland and Merinos.

The old Leicester or Lincolnshire breed have no horns. The carcass is long and thin, and the wethers weigh from 20 to 30 pounds per quarter. The wool is from 10 to 19 inches long, and weighs from 8 to 14 pounds per fleece. The Teeswater are similar to the Lincolnshire, but the wool is shorter. Some of them have been fed so as to weigh 55 pounds per quarter. The Dishley or new Leicester breed have round, barrel shaped bodies, and no horns. They are peculiar for being fat. They yield from 6 to 8 pounds of wool, and weigh from 18 to 26 pounds per quarter. The Devenshire Nots have narrow backs and coarse wool. The Exmoor sheep are small and flat sided. The Heath sheep are a race which ranges over the mountainous districts of Britain. They have large horns, black faces and legs, and coarse shaggy wool.

The Dorsetshire sheep are mostly horned, stand high upon small legs, and are long and thin in the carcass. The fleece weighs 3 or 4 pounds. Some have no wool upon their bellies. [Many of the native sheep of New-England resemble the Dorsetshire breed.] The Herefordshire sheep are without horns and bear fine short wool; weighing about 2 pounds a fleece. The mutton is excellent, and weighs from 10 to 18 pounds per quarter. The South Downs have dark faces and legs, and no horns. The fleece is fine, and weighs from 2 1-2 to 3 pounds. The mutton is good, and weighs about 18 pounds per quarter. The Norfolk sheep have large horns and black faces and legs. The wool is fine, about 2 pounds per fleece. The Cheviots have long bodies, and no horns. The Hebridean sheep is the smallest animal of its kind, weighing when fat only five pounds per quarter. The Shetland sheep have hair and wool mixed together.

The Spanish or Merino breed bear the finest wool of the sheep species. They are not very numerous in England. The fleece is from 3 to 5 pounds. Mr. Loudon says the harder the fleece is, and the more it resists the external pressure of the hand, the more close and fine will be the wool. Here and there a fine pile may be found in an open fleece, but this seldom occurs.

THE CAMEL.

In the museum of the college of surgeons are several preparations illustrative of the structure of the stomach of this animal. The stomach itself, as blown up and preserved by John Hunter, 30 years ago, may still be seen; but many curious particulars, not known to that great naturalist, have been since observed. The camel usually drinks from six to eight gallons of water in the day, and consumes in the same period about a peck of oats, one of chaff, and one third of a truss of hay. The stomach upon being opened after death, is found to consist of two cavities, one of which contains the solid food, the other, water in a pure state. The camel, therefore, when it drinks, conducts the water in a pure state into the second cavity, where part of it is retained, while part runs over into the cellular structure of the first. The quantity of water these two cavities are found capable of containing after death, was between eight and nine quarts, much less than they would be capable of containing during the animal's life.

THE GATHERER.

INTOXICATION.

Condensed from a recent Swedish Work.

The laws against intoxication are enforced with great rigour in Sweden. Who ever is seen drunk is fined, for the first offence, three dollars; for the second six; for the third and fourth a still larger sum—and is also deprived of the right of voting at elections, and of being appointed a representative. He is, besides, publicly exposed in the parish church on the following Sunday. If the same individual is found committing the same offence a fifth time, he is shut up in a house of correction, and condemned to six months hard labour; and if he is again guilty, to a twelvemonth's punishment of a similar description. If the offence has been committed in publick, such as at a fair, at an auction, &c. the fine is doubled; and if the offender has made his appearance in a church, the punishment is still more severe. Who ever is convicted of having induced another to intoxicate himself, is fined three dollars, which sum is doubled if the drunken person is a minor. An ecclesiastick who falls into this offence loses his benefice; if it is a layman who occupies any considerable post, his functions are suspended and perhaps he is dismissed. Drunkenness is never admitted as an excuse for any crime; and who ever dies while drunk, is buried ignominiously, and deprived of the prayers of the church. It is forbidden to give, and more explicitly to sell, any spirituous liquor to students, workmen, servants, apprentices, and private soldiers. Who ever is observed drunk in the streets, or making a noise in a tavern, is sure to be taken to prison, and detained until sober, without, however, being on that account exempted from the fines. Half these fines goes to the informers, who are generally police officers, the other half to the poor. If the delinquent has no money, he is kept in prison until some one pays for him or until he has worked out his enlargement. Twice a year the delinquents are reviewed, and the fines are paid.

the clergy; and every tavern-keeper is bound, under the penalty of a heavy fine, to have a copy of them hung in the principal rooms of his house.

SHAKSPEARE.

Shakspeare's pedigree is known solely by the entries on the Court Rolls of the manor of Rowington. "It there appears that John Shakspeare, the eldest son of Richard, died in 1609, and that Thomas Shakspeare was admitted to the Hill Farm, as his son and heir. This Thomas, from his will, which was made in 1614, appears to have been a mealman or baker, and lived at Mously end in the Rowington, May 5, 1614, his widow was admitted in the Court Baron to her free bench, and afterwards surrendered to her son John, who was then admitted accordingly. He died in February 1652-3, leaving two sons, William who died in 1690, and John: who died in 1710." No less than five descents appear in this instance on the copyhold Court Rolls; there may possibly be further particulars upon them.

MAGNANIMITY OF A BARBARIAN.

When Guatimozin, after the fall of Mexico, was, with one of his officers, put to the torture by order of Cortes, the monarch bore what ever the refined cruelty of his tormentors could inflict, with the invincible fortitude of an American warrior. His fellow sufferer, overcome by the violence of the anguish, turned a dejected eye towards his master, which seemed to implore his permission to reveal all that he knew. But the high spirited prince, darting on him a look of authority mingled with scorn, checked his weakness by asking "Am I now reposing on a bed of flowers?" Overawed by the reproach, the favourite persevered in his dutiful silence and expired. Cortes, ashamed of a scene so horrid, rescued the royal victim from the hands of his torturers, and prolonged a life reserved for new indignities and sufferings.—Robertson's History of America.—It is well known that the unhappy monarch was shortly afterwards hanged by the order of Cortes.

INQUISITION IN ITALY.

In the sixteenth century drowning was the mode of death to which Protestants were doomed, either because it was less cruel and odious than committing them to the flames, or because it accorded with the customs of Venice. But if the auto da fe of the queen of the Adriatick were less barbarous than those of Spain, the solitude and silence with which they were accompanied was calculated to excite the deepest horror. At the dead hour of midnight the prisoner was taken from his cell, and put into a gondola, or Venetian boat, attended only, besides the sailors, by a single priest, to act as confessor. He was rowed out into the sea beyond the Two Castles, where another boat was in waiting. A plank was then laid across the two gondolas, upon which the prisoner, having his body chained, and a heavy stone affixed to his feet, was placed; and, on a signal given, the gondolas retiring from one another, he was precipitated into the deep.

NEGROES' HEIR LOOM.

Some years ago, the boiler-men negroes on Hucklenfield estate were overheard by the book-keeper discoursing on this subject, (the superiority of the whites,) and various opinions were given, till the question was thus set at rest by an old African:—"When God Almighty make de world, him make two men, a nigger and a buckra; and him give dem two box, and him tell dem for make dem choice. Nigger, (nigger greedy from time,) when him find one box heavy, him take it, and buckra take t'other; when dem open de box, buckra see pen, ink, and paper; nigger box full up with hoe and bill, and hoe and bill for nigger till this day."

CAFRE MARRIAGES.

When a female of respectable rank is to be married, an address is delivered to her by one of the elders of her clan, before she leaves the home of her kindred, in which she is admonished to conduct herself as a prudent house-wife, to be obedient to her husband, attentive to his aged parents, and to her duties as a wife and mother.

above all, to be submissive when insulted, and "to remain silent even though called a witch." On arriving at the kral of the bridegroom, she is conducted to a new hut, the young man dancing before her, and sweeping the ground with green boughs, as an intimation that she is expected to be always neat, clean, and orderly in her household.

HOLY WATER.

A friend of mine (says Mr. Lambert, in his travels,) was once present at the house of a French lady in Canada, when a violent thunder storm commenced. The shutters were immediately closed, and the room darkened. The lady of the house, not willing to leave the safety of herself and company to chance, began to search her closets for the bottle of holy water, which by a sudden flash of lightning, she fortunately found. The bottle was uncorked, and its contents immediately sprinkled over the ladies and gentlemen. It was a most dreadful storm, and lasted a considerable time; she therefore redoubled her sprinklings and benedictions at every clap of thunder or flash of lightning. At length the storm abated, and the party were providentially saved from its effects; which the good lady attributed solely to the precious water. But when the shutters were opened, and the light admitted, the company found, to the destruction of their white gowns and muslin handkerchiefs; their coats, waistcoats, and breeches, that instead of holy water, the pious lady had sprinkled them with ink.

SUSCEPTIBLE WOMAN.

Lady Scott, the late wife of the "Great Unknown," did not in any degree partake of the high poetick feeling of her literary husband. One day, whilst he was contemplating with much delight the gambols of some lambs, that were sporting on the lawn before the door of his country residence, he burst forth with a warm effusion on the beauty of the rural subject; and after he had enlarged on it for some time, her ladyship very coolly replied, "That she saw no beauty whatever in the lambs as they then were, but she thought well enough of them when they were dressed and served up for dinner."

[Liverpool Chronicle.]

LORD BYRON.

When Lord Byron was cut by the great, on account of his quarrel with his wife, he stood leaning on a marble slab at the entrance of a room, while troops of duchesses and countesses poured out. One little pert red-haired girl stood a few paces behind the rest, and as she passed him said, with a nod, "Aye, you should have married me, and then this wouldn't have happened to you."

GRAVITY.

That profound philosopher and divine, Dr. Samuel Clark, was of a very playful disposition, and was pleased with the company of young people. One day, while he was partaking in the sports of his little comrades, he was informed of the arrival of a certain fop. "Now, my friends," said he to them, "let us look grave, here comes a fool."

PARR ON PRIESTLY.

Let Priestly be confuted where he is mistaken. Let him be exposed where he is superficial. Let him be repressed where he is dogmatical. Let him be rebuked where he is censorious. But let not his attainments be depreciated, because they are numerous, almost without a parallel. Let not his talents be ridiculed, because they are superlatively great. Let not his morals be vilified, because they are correct without austerity, and exemplary without ostentation, because they present even to common observers the innocence of a Hermit, and the simplicity of a Patriarch, and because a philosophick eye will at once discover in them the deep fixed root of virtuous principle, and the solid trunk of virtuous habit.

Arch bishop Usher being requested by a Mr. Button to write an Epitaph on his father, sent him the following:—

"Oh, thou art dead and earth! Oh, stars and poles! That you should be but buttoned up!"

POPULAR TALES.

GUIDO AND BIANCA.

An Italian Story—abridged from the "Posthumous Papers of a Person about Town."

I am the daughter of noble parents, whom I will not name,—for they should rest undisgraced in their tombs,—who left me sole heir of a large estate in the most fertile fields of Italy. I had fair and stately halls, vassals for service in court or field, ladies for attendance, and every other thing needful or unneedful with which human pride can be pampered, and honour or humour desire or deserve. Mistress of these enviable possessions, I had many princely suitors, who met with such honourable entertainment as their many pleasant qualities merited. But there was one never seen among those flattering suitors, who was a thriving wooer with my heart, though he had never worshipped at its shrine, and might have had that woman's toy as a gift which he was either too humble or too proud to ask.

This was the noble gentleman called Guido de Medicis, the owner of the poor estate touching upon the wider skirts of mine. He was of an ancient race of poets, painters, sculptors, legislators, and members of all the intellect of Italy; that proud land, where the hand of humble genius is more nobility than the entire body of merely honourable birth. But he, of whom I write, is now cold in a grave only vaster than his great capacity,—the earth embracing the sea; and could these miserable and shameful tears, which fall at the recollection of the wrong which I have done him, outwater that sea, they would not enough mourn him who is the drowned hope and pride of my dear father-land: vainly therefore do I weep a sin which tears may never wash away, nor any life or death atone for, to heaven and my country.

[A eloquent and impassioned description of Guido follows this.]

From some inquiries which I had made among his domesticks, I learned that his heart (which I had thought possible to be mine) was irrevocably given to the fair Bianca, daughter of Baptista Buonaventi, an old merchant of Florence; and that, in a few days, he was to set out for Syracuse to claim her hand, in fulfilment of a solemn compact, made when passing his novitiate in that city. This intelligence came like death upon my heart; and, for many days, I held myself averse from the gay company and the old courtesses of my house.

My noble friends saw my spirit to be sick, and strove to come at its disease; but I had already formed my resolution, rather than confess my weakness, to die of undiscovered grief, and, since my malady was hopeless, that it should be also voiceless. I preserved that strict silence which is alone the security of secrecy. But, nevertheless, I wept my sorrow in the loneliness and darkness of the sleepless night; and this I did, till the paleness of my cheek was now so constant, instead of its wonted ruddiness, that it was scarcely noticed, either by the pitying kindly, or the prying curious.

[Guido leaves his house for Florence; and the Italian lady, unable to support his absence, follows him in secret, and becomes introduced to Guido's intended bride.]

Bianca Buonaventi was indeed a woman worthy of a sculptor's love; for all those beauties which art has imitated from nature were mingled in her. In her form were blended all that I had till then thought the idealities of Grecian grace and Roman majesty; in motion she was stately as the swan; and swam the air rather than walked the earth. Her step was an inauditable music; her voice sweeter than the recollected music of a dream. Her mind was a book of pure and wise thoughts, written surely by some hand divine. Her countenance such as angels wear—and they were made fair that man might love heaven, where all is beautiful. Love shone in her eyes, but with so holy and placid a fire,—two sister stars burning in the winter beam not a chaster light; wherever they turned all eyes were illuminated, and whatever she looked upon reflected back the beauty she turned upon it. Indeed all those fair and admirable qualities which make women worthy of that paragon of earthly creatures—man—she was perfection. That Guido should love the gentle girl was no longer wonderful; for I even loved him the more that he did love her, so endearing a power hath beauty in its purity.

[They were to be married on the morrow; and the Italian lady, subduing her passions to a sister's love, attended the solemn ceremony, and agreed to accompany them from Florence to the sea-coast, where they intended to take shipping for Syracuse, the residence of Bianca's family and are overtaken by a storm.]

The frail vessel, which had lain on the waters like a log, strained under their strong stirring, and creaked as if its ribs were severing. High wave followed high wave, as if they were indeed not waves, but mountains sliding off the face of the earth in the sea of space—when rolling some way over the common level of the waters, they fell with a crushing noise into the bed of the sea. At length all the fury of the tempest seemed gathered, and again the lightning glanced along the deck, and mingled with the washing waves; so that it was not easy to say whether the water was not lightning, or the lightning the water, for they appeared one. The crazy vessel now dipped down, and now heaved to this side, and now to the other, like a toy in the hands of the mighty tempest. The master gave command; seeing that the sea broke with every rush over the ship, that those who feared the peril should go below; but not one of the trembling throng stirred from where they held by the ship,—for all saw the worst, and none thought it possible to escape from it. Bianca clung, in horror to her husband, who strove to comfort her, and bid her take heart. The old man covered his grey head with the foldings of his cloak; and, as he sat motionless and wordless, seemed the very resignation of despair.

It was true that she had endured but little hurt, and with the recoiling rush of the waves, was thrown afloat again, but ere the master could leap to the helm, to put her further out, a strong sea came driving before the wind, which now blew as it would part the poles, and again flung her, as if she were no mightier than a sea-shell, upon the sharp rocks. She broke at the blow like parted bread, the stern half of her bulk tumbling over into the sea, while the head of the vessel lay reeling on the rock. Then the shriek of dismay and death went up from men that were never more to call on heaven; for many of the crew were crowded about the helm, and, when it parted, went down with her, never again to rise with life. The venerable Baptista, Guido, his fair wife, and my wretched self, still clung to the chains at the bow; but not long held we there, for a strong wave came mounting at our backs, and in a moment we were hurled with the halved vessels down from the reef into the gaping abyssmal depth he had left in the sea. Again the fragment mounted to the surface, and we had all held to each other and to the ropes which were coiled round our bodies, save the feeble Bianca, who had sunk out of the grasp of her husband, but being entangled in the coil of the ropes, was not swept into the sea. We might hear another wave coming with a rushing roar towards us, as it had determined we should be its prey; when Guido, seeing, with the calmness of courage, that, if we awaited it, our escape was hopeless, cried out, "Father, take thou the care of the Lady Erminia, as I will of thy daughter, and let us at once leap beyond the reef into the sea, and struggle for the land."

And now shrink not as from the serpent-fiend, to hear me tell the story of that crime which has cursed me here, and which may hereafter. After these words, he again cried out, "Bianca, my beloved, where art thou?" The fatal love which had fed upon me like a flame upon a living sacrifice, even in this awful hour burnt sensibly in my hateful heart; and, prompted by that miserable passion, and the love of him and of life, some fiend answered surely with my tongue, "Here!" and he caught at me as a desperate drowner doth at a floating weed, and leaping into the sea, cried to the old man, "Follow me, father, follow me!" But he heard him not; for I saw that he was dead, and had fallen on his swooned child, who as we leaped into the sea, shrieked out, and auditorily informed me that she still lived, though my struggling soul would fain have quitted its conscience with the thought that she was dead, and so have palliated to itself, if it failed afterwards to Guido and to heaven, its damnable deceit. Guido heard not her cry, or if he did, took it, in the stunning turbulence of the tempest's roar, for mine. For a long time he buffeted the waves with a giant's strength, at a courage that could not be weakened; and still, he beat the waves aside, or breasted them like living rock, he cried, "Be of good cheer, my Bianca, I shall save thee yet!" And when I heard him call on her name, my heart smote so fearful within me, that, though I was sure of death, I had disclosed that I was Erminia, I thrice had nearly confessed the dreadful truth; but my love of life, and cruel love of him, stifled my voice. Twice I saw, in the glaring flash of lightning, that he gazed upon me, to see if I had life; for the fear of disclosure, and the peril of the waters, made me voiceless and strengthless, and I lay almost lifeless in his clasping arm, as he struck through the waves with the other. He looked on me again, but the waters had washed my long hair, over my face, so that he knew me not; and still he clasped me to him tenderly, and beat his burdened way through the sea. Long time thus he contended resolutely with death, when just as his strength was spent, and he had bade me commit my soul to heaven, he descried lights not far before us, and faintly told me still to hope, for we were near land. This nerved him anew, and he plied his way lustily, till we at length touched the rocky shore, where summoning a desperate man's might he clambered up the low, craggy cliffs, and feeling the firm earth under him, dropped to the ground from utter exhaustion. For some time I knew not what occurred, for safety then seemed more dearful to me than the dangers I had passed through and I swooned. When I recovered, I found Guido endeavouring to bring life back, by cherishing me in his bosom. And ever and anon he would call for help, as strongly as he might, to the distant fisherman's cottage's where he had first discerned the light which led him to the shore.

At length we descried a light approaching the spot where we lay, still on the ground, and could hear the loud halloo of the comers; and, after some time, guided by his continual cry, a fisherman came up with a torch. As it neared us I shrank from it like a foul and guilty thing, that loves darkness rather than day, but in vain; for Guido's anxious eye looked at last on my face as the light fell on it, when, uttering a dreadful shriek of dismay and despair, he dropped me from his arms, and, starting from the ground, like one made instantly mad by some sudden stroke upon the brain, he rushed, staggering and strengthless, but wildly, to the cliff. I clung to him heavily, to prevent him from again leaping into the sea; but I dared not speak to him, save by feeble, inarticulate cries. He glanced at me a look which withered me, and shaking me like a serpent to the earth with a terrible cry, flung himself from the cliff into the sea. I beheld him beating his way back to the wreck, as the lightning momentarily flashed from the firmament; and, at length, I saw him grasp at some white burden on the waters, and again turn for the shore; but suddenly his right arm ceased to strike out; and, though I kept my breaking eyes fixed on the same spot, when the next lightning flashed, I saw that he had sunk; when, crying to God in my despair I fell on my face, and was insensible to all about me.

MISCELLANY.

THE PROFESSIONS.

By the late William Crafts, of Charleston, S. C.

Care is very unequally distributed in this world. Some people skate over life with beautiful rapidity, and find no pause in pleasure. The path of others is irksome, rough, rugged, and precipitous. Now, although it is a part of our creed, that every man may be happy who chooses to be so, yet are there certainly greater facilities of happiness in some tracks, than in others—some thing more genial in the moral climate, to the growth of joy.

It is well, however, that this is not generally understood; otherwise we would behold a monopoly of pursuit, and all mankind, instead of being physicians, lawyers, &c would inevitably be—clergymen.

The clergy have the easiest time of any people.

on this earth—perhaps it is because they deserve it. A clergyman enjoys a prescriptive respect and esteem, being ranked by common consent, as high as a lady, and above a man. He has the charge of souls, which are not tangible, and have no rough edges, nor corners, nor acute angles, to annoy and afflict sensibility. The comforts of this world are accorded to him with cheerfulness. The merchant presents him a quarter cask of Madeira—the planter a barrel of rice—the ladies send him sweetmeats, and all the baby clothes of his children are made in advance, by the courteous labour of his youthful parishioners. A few hours' toil produces his weekly discourse, which he delivers to hearers who believe all that he says, and never think of denying it if they do not. He is associated with happiness by those whom he marries, with wisdom by those whom he instructs, with hope by those whom he consoles, and with blessings by them all. Now can there be a more envied situation, a more smooth and unembarrassed journey than this? Compared with the poor unfortunate lawyer, the clergyman travels on a railway, and the lawyer in a crazy wagon, struggling through mud and water, over a road abounding with ditches.

The lawyer incurs a prescriptive distrust. His gown is associated in the mind, not with the idea of purity and innocence, but of cunning and concealment. His client regrets that he has occasion to employ him, and struggles to get rid of him as early as possible. He is not like a clergyman, who, acting by himself, can not well differ from himself—nor like physicians who meet only to consult and to agree—but like a gladiator, or rather like a gamecock, trained for perpetual war, and brought out of obscurity, only for a public contest. Much as he may love music, he must be always in discord—much as he may covet peace, he must never cease disputing. If there be only one side, he must make two out of it; and whether it be the right or the wrong, he must contend it is the right. He may be perfectly conscious of the superiority of another, but that won't do. He must oppose him in open court, and if he lose victory stands an excellent chance of losing his livelihood. People will take a clergyman or a physician, on trust; but with regard to a lawyer, they are as fastidious as Othello, in requiring evidence.

So much for the general and pervading embarrassments of a lawyer's professional life. But, if unfortunately, he has a great deal of business—and courts will sit at the same time, requiring him in all, then is there an additional distress, arising from the impossibility of being in more than one place at any one time. Then it is harassing, indeed, to hear him called in the city court, and in the admiralty, and in the equity, and in the common law, and peradventure at chambers. "Mungo here, Mungo there, and Mungo everywhere."

There is another additional misery, which is too true to make a joke of. If, by any misfortune, people think that you are disinterested and humane, they imagine themselves entitled on all occasions to your gratuitous labour, and to the wear and tear of your mind and affections. Thus comfortable is the Profession of the Law.

PRESENTIMENTS OF DEATH.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

To say that those bright, rapid flashes of what appears prophetic intelligence, named presentiment, are produced by a latent taint of superstition, is to elude the question. They have been confessed by men of the sternest intellect—by the skeptic and the christian, the hero and the poet—by Bacon and Johnson—by persons of the most dissimilar character—by the most energetic of modern men, and by the highest genius of modern times. Napoleon's faith in his high destiny, his peculiar star, though a vague, appears to have been a permanent and even an influential belief.

Many visible presentiments rest upon authority so good as to be not a little troublesome to those who would explain them all implicitly on natural principles. The well known story related of Dr. Donne by his affectionate biographer, Isaac Walton, very easily admits of a natural explanation. In France, Donne, at midnight, saw the vision of his wife, then in England, pass across his apartment, carrying in her arms a dead infant. But Donne had recently left his wife, under circumstances peculiarly distressing, and in spite of her earnest entreaties and gloomy forebodings of evil from his absence; and her superstitious and womanly fears increased his natural apprehensions for her safety: he foresaw a very probable event. But, embarking on a fine morning with a gay bridal party—all around him joy and hope—whence arose the feeling, the presentiment soon fatally accomplished, which made a pious clergyman, the father of the patriotick Andrew Marvel, throw back his walking stick to the land, exclaiming, as the boat left the shore, "Ho! for heaven!"

Stories of supernatural intelligence of the death of friends at a distance are familiar to the recollection of every person, both from reading and conversation; and that the solemn presentiment of the most awful event of life is not only frequently entertained, but very accurately verified, must have been observed by every attendant of the dying, who, as they approach the confines of the invisible world, will often, with inexplicable exactness, fix the day and hour of final dissolution. This presentiment of the hour of death is most generally experienced by those who, best prepared for their great change, are calmly resigned to the event of death or life, and seldom by those whose agitated and feverish minds might be presumed to realize their own diseased and imaginary fears. Where shall we seek for an explanation of this supernatural impression, or of this preternatural acuteness of expiring sense, if we refuse that of the poet:—

"I hear a voice you can not hear,
Which says I must not stay;
I see a hand you can not see,
Which beckons me away."

The story of the requiem of Mozart is singular, as shewing the power of a gloomy presentiment in realizing itself in an enervated mind and debilitated frame. But there are numerous instances of heroes and soldiers, men of the greatest moral and physical courage, who have fought bravely in many fields, entering on their last battle with the fixed presentiment of the death which they certainly encountered. Brave men have entertained this foreboding feeling for their friends and comrades, and have seen it strangely realized. Our own Nelson, who, to an active and energetic mind, united a warm and enthusiastic temperament, whose soul was ever feelingly alive to every impulse, had not only the avowed presentiment of death as strong as that of victory, on the twenty-first of October, the battle-day of Trafalgar, but after having kept the same station watching the French fleet for many months, and very closely for weeks and days, he entertained the firm persuasion that this very day, the anniversary of a festival in his family for a victory obtained over the French, was to be the day of action. The combined fleet of France and Spain, which had played off and on for nearly two years, moved at last from Cadiz, and formed in order of battle; and, on the day he foresaw, Nelson fought, conquered, and fell, as his prophetic feelings had predicted. It is worthy of notice, though out of place, as a proof of the universality of this foreboding feeling, that on this brave man's taking leave of his wife for the last time previous to his forming that infatuated attachment, which embittered his remaining life and sullied his publick fame, Lady Nelson experienced that strong impulsive feeling of impending misfortune which led her to anticipate his death, but which was interpreted to her mind by an event yet more painful—the alienation of his affections, and the destruction of their domestic peace. The circumstance is noticed by Nelson's biographer, Mr. Southey.

A remarkable instance of presentiment is given in the "Life of Wolsey," by his favourite and faithful attendant, Cavendish. The unfortunate prelate, when seized with his last fatal illness on his journey to London, predicted, or prophesied, his own death at eight o'clock of a particular day. The chime struck as he breathed his last—and his attendants, remembering his prediction, gazed on each other. The "Memoirs of Bayard," written by the Loyal Servant, record a very striking prediction of the death of this illustrious knight at the battle of Ravenna—remarkably fulfilled; and Sully relates an instance of presentiment of death experienced by the "fair Gabrielle," the beloved mistress of Henry IV., which appears to have even affected the cool, sensible, and faithful minister whom her power over the king had so often vexed. The king, who was not willing to incur the censure of keeping this lady with him during the Easter holidays, entreated her to leave him to spend them at Fontainebleau, and to return herself to Paris. Madame de Beaufort received this order with tears; it was still worse when they came to part: Henry, on his side, more passionately fond than ever of this lady, who had already brought him two sons, and a daughter, named Henrietta, did himself equal violence. He conducted her half way to Paris; and although they proposed only an absence of a few days, yet they dreaded the moment of parting, as if it had been for a much longer time. Those who are inclined to give faith to presages will lay some stress upon this relation. The two lovers renewed their parting endearments, and in every thing they said to each other at that moment, some people have pretended to find proof of those presages of an inevitable fate.

Madame de Beaufort spoke to the king as if for the last time; she recommended to him her children, her house of Monceaux, and her domesticks; the king listened to her, but instead of comforting her, gave way to a sympathizing grief. Again they took leave of each other, and a secret emotion again drew them to each other's arms. Henry would not so easily have torn himself from her, if the Marshal d'Ornano, Roquelaure, and Frontenac, had not taken him away by force. At length they prevailed upon him to return to Fontainebleau; and the last words he said were to recommend his mistress to La Varenne, with orders to provide every thing she wanted, and to conduct her safely to the house of Zamet, to whom he had chosen to confide the care of a person so dear to him."

Her presentiment was realized, for she died a few days after she had parted from the king.

The omens and forebodings that preceded the murder of Henry IV. himself, are quite too marvellous to be of much weight. The well known story of the warnings given by those beautiful little dogs whom this popular monarch—who seemed endowed by nature with the rare quality of attaching every living thing that came near him—used to fondle and play with, is one of those relations which imagination loves to entertain in despite of reason and probability. But the grave narrative of Marshal Bassompierre is entitled to more attention. It proves that Henry, who was far superior to the vulgar superstitions that influenced many of his courtiers, possessed, with other high mental qualities, much of the quick intuitive perception inseparable from acute and energetic minds. The state of this monarch's mind places the doctrine of presentiment in its true and rational light. On the May-pole planted in the court of the Louvre falling down from no apparent cause, a few days before his assassination, a gloomy conversation arose among the courtiers about this disastrous omen.

"You are fools," said Henry, who overheard them, "to amuse yourselves with prognosticks. Learn from me never for the future to care about omens and predictions, which are vain and frivolous. For the last thirty years all the astrologers and quacks have predicted every year that I should be killed. In the year when I do actually die, all the presages that occurred in the course of it will be remarked and put into histories; and those who predicted my death will be thought great and wonderful persons, while nothing will be said of omens of preceding years."

It was in this manner Henry regarded prediction, even while he had a strong presentiment of his own murder, and of the manner of its accomplishment. About the time of his death, he was on the eve of a journey into Germany.

"I don't know how it is, Bassompierre," he said, "but I can not persuade myself I am going into Germany."

"Several times," continues Bassompierre, "he said to me, and to others also, 'I think I shall die soon;' and the day before his death, after the coronation of the queen, when he seemed in very high spirits, this was repeated to Bassompierre and the Duc de Guise.

"My God! sire," said one of the courtiers, will you never cease to afflict us by saying you will soon die! These are not good words to utter."

"Yet, though this great and wise king had no superstition, and laughed at omens and divinations," continues the marshal, "he not only, by a particular sort of inspiration, foresaw his death, but even the manner of it, and the place where he should be killed. He had always the apprehension of being killed in his carriage by some melancholy madman. Those who rode with him will testify, as I can, to have heard him say, that there was no place more dangerous than that, to be attacked and wounded, and that the only men he had to beware of were gloomy madmen; for no wise man would undertake such an action."

It would scarcely be a fair instance of presentiment to mention that Swift, a man of the most unbending and masculine understanding, through his whole life foreboded the gloomy and furious madness in which he ended his days. To a mind so acute, bodily complaints, and the obvious tendencies of a violent temper, might have made this appear no improbable event; but it is more remarkable that the dean of St. Patrick's, of a character so decided and thorough-going, should have kept the letter announcing the sudden death of his friend Gay in England, in his pocket, unopened, for some days, from the presentiment that it contained intelligence of some heavy misfortune.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1828.

Such of our city subscribers as will change their place of residence the first of May, will please to inform the carrier, or leave information at our office.

We are again under obligations to a New-York friend for the London Morning Herald, Courier, and Sunday Times, the Liverpool Courier, and the Portsmouth Telegraph, as late as to the first of March.

We have also received a file of Galvani's (Paris) Messenger, from the 15th to 26th of February inclusive.

THE LEGISLATURE. Tuesday last being the day previously agreed on, both houses of legislature adjourned, to meet again on the ninth day of September next, at which extra session, their attention will be wholly occupied on the revision of the statutes. It is now the privilege of the people to inquire what they have effected during this session; and whether they have fully answered the expectations of their constituents.

Besides the revision of the laws, a subject which must necessarily have occupied a large portion of the present session, three hundred and forty-three acts have gone through their hands, and become a part of our laws. Those of a local and limited nature; it is not necessary for us to canvass; those more public, and having a more universal bearing upon the common interests of the state, have in general received that candid and pacific attention, which does honour to the representatives of a free people.

That diversities of opinion will exist is neither new nor strange; yet, when any thing is done by our legislative authority, it soon passes the test; and if proved by the unerring judgement of the people to be irrelevant or hostile to their true interests, it is so easily undone, that no danger is to be apprehended from the adoption of such measures as are not palpably and broadly absurd. Measures both dangerous and tyrannical always have been, and always will be proposed to the deliberations of our representatives; and such, we believe have been proposed during the session just closed; but it is gratifying to reflect that these propositions have been treated with their merited neglect.

The revision of the laws, under the present system, is a subject of some pride to our country. In this respect we believe we are taking the lead among civilized nations. It is a little remarkable that, in many governments under whose influence geology, chymistry, astronomy, and indeed all the sciences are advancing with rapid strides towards perfection, legislation, the most important of all, should move with the lazy gait of the snail, or rather like a person under the influence of the nightmare. It was many centuries before the united jurisprudence of Greece and Rome could arrive at the simplicity which was compiled in the Justinian code. In Britain, since the reduction of the Saxon laws to the form given them by Alfred,—the feudal system; the code of Theodosius; the pandects, institutes, constitutions and supplement of Justinian; and the laws of Edward I.,—new laws have been enacted, old ones repealed, and many other alterations and illustrations have been introduced, till the laws appear to be a source of constant perplexity and litigation, rather than an instrument of redress. Many outrages upon the first principles of the law of Nature, [vide Blackstone, vol. I. p. 38 and 40.] are, and have, time immemorial, been embodied with the British laws; and there are yet jurists who would be far more willing to live on, under their uncertain operation, than dare the experiment of a remedy. In the reign of Athelstan, and subsequently, to that of Henry I., larceny above one shilling was punishable with death. [vide 1 Hale's P. C. 12. and 3 Coke's Inst. 58.] This law is yet unrepealed. [Comment. B. IV. c. 17.] In the reign of Edward IV., a man who kept a house with the sign of the crown, was executed, for saying in a jesting mood, he would make his son heir to the crown! [vide Rapi.] In the sixteenth century, boys of eight years of age might be hanged for capital crimes; [Emelyn on Hale's P. C. 25.] and within the last century, the judges have unanimously agreed that boys of ten years, under certain proofs, might be liable to the same punishment. [vide Foster, 72.] In the reign of Edward VI. any man who had married a widow, or a second wife, after his former one was dead, was not allowed the benefit of clergy. [1 Edw. VI. c. 12. Enacted 4 Edw. I. Stat. 3. c. 5.] In the reign of Elizabeth, any man might kill another, who was attainted of a premunire; [5 Eliz. 2. 1.] no less than thirteen persons were executed, a few years before the restoration of Charles II. for being reputed gypsies; and even within the last century, it was felony to remain a month among that race of people. [1 Hale's P. C. 671, and 23 Geo. III.—enacted 5 Eliz.] Women might be executed for bigamy, or even for a simple larceny, as late as the reign of William and Mary. [3 and 4 Wm. and Mary, c. 9.] Stealing sheep is a capital offence at the present day, though the court may commute the punishment to transportation; but many have been executed for it within the last fifty years. Well may the philanthropist exclaim, that while almost every article of trade has increased in value, the life of man has become gradually and continually cheaper!

In civil jurisprudence, the British legislature has been no less slow in arriving to its yet too apparently inadequate views of justice, equity, and common sense. Not till the reign of Henry VIII. could a man devise his lands by will. All went to the heir; and even now, a real estate is not answerable for debts contracted even for the purchase of land. An elegant English writer observes,—“we are certainly a moral nation; a scientific nation; a nation pre-eminently gifted in almost every respect;—but in respect to the art of simplifying laws, we are mere children yet.”

To return from this digression, we repeat that the approximation to perfection aimed at, and so industriously pursued by our own state, is really and honestly an excuse for the indulgence of our national pride. Considering the magnitude of the undertaking, the labours of the legislature and the revisers have been such as to ensure the confidence of our citizens, and to render not only the period at which the system received its origin, an era in our annals of legislation; but also to associate their own names with the most permanent of all human monuments,—the cause of philanthropy.

COLOMBIA. By the packet brig Medina, arrived at New-York on Tuesday last, from Carthagena, we have advices from that port to the 27th March. Never was a man more the subject of alternate obloquy and applause than BOLIVAR. We had hoped for the peace of Colombia, that long ere this his character would have been so well known, as to strike either praise or censure dumb at a blow. We are confident that we have not, for ourselves at least, mistaken his true character. Long accustomed to hear him spoken of in the most virulent spirit of reproach, and accounted a traitor,—a second Iturbide,—we have given up all such impressions as were ready to obscure our ever favourable opinion of his truth and republicanism. This opinion has been from time to time strengthened, by the fact that he has the confidence of the Colombians, and we may venture to affirm that had he no more real patriotism in his measures than has been imputed to him by some, his native country would long ere this have shaken him off like a viper, which was ready to effect her utter destruction. It is enough to say that Colombia is wretchedly divided in her political councils. There appears to be no unanimity with her citizens. But we have the fullest assurance that the hearts of the majority,—and a great majority too, both in point of number and worth, are with him in bonds of the firmest confidence. We were led to these remarks, by perusing the advices brought by the Medina; and, if he be not true to his country, he has this merit at least, of a vigilance not to be surpassed even by Napoleon.

On the fourth of March, Carthagena was thrown into the utmost consternation, by a movement of General Padilla and, in all probability the citizens knew not whether to look on it in the light of a motion to quell an insurrection, or the insurrection itself. Padilla began by secretly arming about two thousand citizens of Carthagena, for purposes unknown to the principal inhabitants, or the city authorities. During the night following, about five hundred troops, stationed in the city, left it, with their officers, for the residence of general Montillo, about ten miles from the city. On the fifth, information was received that Montillo held a secret order from Bolivar, to take command of this detachment whenever it should be necessary for the public good. Padilla refused to obey his summons, and, by arming all the inhabitants, exerted himself to put the city in a state of defence. Several gunboats with a detachment of troops, were despatched to take possession of the fortress that commands the harbour; but the commander, acknowledging Montillo's authority in preference to Padilla's, refused to surrender. Padilla, finding that the harbour was already in possession of Montillo, and an army at the very gates of the city, made a precipitate flight from a situation which was likely to be too hot for him. It wants nothing but a unanimous and unbiassed devotion to their own laws, to make the citizens of Colombia free and happy, and Bolivar a patriot in the eyes of the world.

Some of our own citizens, hoping to throw something into the scale of the presidential question, have cast a very different light on these and other events lately transpired in Colombia. These are motives which every honest man must and will condemn. If Bolivar is worthy, his fame is the property of the world,—and especially of all free governments like ours; but to traduce him, for the sake of cherishing jealous sentiments in the minds of our own citizens, argues neither honesty, faith, nor common sense in the organs of any party who do it. We wish to be understood that we have not, neither shall, become the partizan of either candidate; but we care not how well founded in justice or wisdom any party may be, such measures will never avail it a jot. On the contrary, they can, and surely will, bring nothing upon the cause that employs them but contempt and ruin.

THE GREEKS. Public sympathy has again awakened in behalf of this oppressed and famishing people, and it is with no ordinary feelings of pride that we see so many ready, at this late day, to atone for years of cruel neglect. Contributions are daily pouring into the funds for their relief, from every quarter. Churches have cast in, not their mite, but their thousands. The avails of theatres, and other places of fashionable amusements have swelled the tide of contribution. Clothing and other more immediate articles of support have been made, collected, and forwarded to the respective committees. At the head of this good work, we find the “last best gift to man,” the “angel of the world,”—woman. Whatever she advocates with the generous warmth peculiar to her, must flourish. It is her hand that has filled the treasures of all the religious benevolent societies which have been for years in such strong and unceasing operation. In short, if woman but knew it, she holds the very fortunes of the world in her hand. Whatever they advocate, they seem to lead the other sex by a charm. It would be but a word from them to revolutionize the world. We hope however they will never turn anti-masonic!

EDITORIAL DIARY.

Under this head we purpose to continue a series of remarks, appropriate to every day of the month; not merely chronological, but occasionally, as our leisure may allow, branching out into other subjects naturally associated with one and seasons. We begin our date with the day following our last publication; but intend in our next, to carry it forward to the day of publication following inclusive; so that our patrons may read our remarks on the day for which they are written.

April 20. On this day the sun enters the sign Taurus. In the calendar of the church it is observed as the nativity of Saint Agnes of Monte Pulciano, Saint Servanus, and Saint James of Illyricum.

April 21. Saint Anselm's day;—also Saint Anastasius, Saint Beuno, Saint Eneon, and Saint Malrubius. On this day it is supposed Remus, one of the founders of Rome, was slain by his brother Romulus, for having spoken contemptuously of the slender walls they were erecting. This day is also remarkable for the death of Alexander the Great, who after having subjected all the known world, finished his career in a drunken fit, at the age of thirty-two years.

April 22. The number of saints in honour of which this day is kept is also numerous. Sutor, Caius, Azades, Epipodius, Alexander, Theodorus, Opportuna, Leonides, Rufus, and several others.

April 23. The anniversary of Saint George, tutelar saint of England; also Saint Gerard, and Ivor. It is somewhat remarkable that on this day in the year 1616, Cervantes, the inimitable author of Don Quixote, died in Spain; and the same day, Shakespeare, the unrivalled British poet, died, in England. What makes this coincidence still more striking is the fact that Shakespeare died the very day on which he completed his fifty-second year. Saint George's day, says Hone, was selected at a very early period, for the establishment of horse-races.

April 24. Saint Fidelis, and several other inferior saints, are honoured in the church by the observance of this day.

April 25. Saint Mark the Evangelist, Saint Anianus, &c. Saint Mark's day was anciently kept as a fast throughout Christendom, and no flesh eaten on it. The celebrated custom of watching in the porch of the church, on Saint Mark's eve, is yet kept up in some countries, and with very little abatement of its primitive superstition. The third year, for this is to be done thrice, they are supposed to see the ghosts of all those who are to die the next year, pass by into the church. Several other ceremonies of the same nature are performed on this same night. Chronology has also some interesting facts associated with this day. In the year 1595, Tasso, the Italian poet, died at Rome. His great fame was chiefly founded on his celebrated epick, "Jerusalem delivered;" but many other beautiful pieces were the product of his mind. His muse was the offspring of love, having imbibed a hopeless passion for the princess Eleonora, sister to the duke of Ferrara, her image runs through his whole works, and haunts his imagination till his death.—William Cowper, the well known English poet died in 1800 on the same day of the month. Though not placed in the first rank of English poets, the poems of Cowper are certainly of a character to support the great credit that has already been attached to them. He was of a very timid and diffident disposition; and so easily was his mind overwrought by any real or imaginary cause of discouragement that he several times attempted his own destruction. The day is memorable in American history for the battle near Camden, South-Carolina, 1781, between the British, under Lord Rawdon, and the Americans, under general Greene. In this action the talents for command were very apparent in the two generals; and though general Greene was obliged to leave the ground, the British army was not able to follow up the success.

April 26. Saints Cletus, Marcellinus, &c. Lord Somers, chancellor of England, died in 1716. He was one of the most firm vindicators of public liberty, of that day.

April 27. Saint Anthimus, &c. In the year 1777, Danbury in Connecticut, was destroyed, and in the battle which accompanied it general Wooster was killed. The same day, 1785, Prince Leopold of Brunswick was drowned in the Oder, in an attempt to succour the inhabitants of a village which was inundated. In 1794, James Bruce, the celebrated traveller into Upper Egypt, died by a fall down the stairs of his own house. His character as a credible narrator of his travels, though much abused in his life, has been completely established by the testimony of succeeding travellers. In 1813, York, Upper Canada, was captured by the American troops under general Dearborn, after a sharp conflict, in which General Pike lost his life.

April 28. Saints Vitalis, Didymus, Theodora, and Patricius. In 1772, the counts Struensee and Brandt, the prime minister and favourite of the king of Denmark, were executed opposite the eastern gate of Copenhagen.—Their alleged crime was an intrigue with the much abused princess Carolina Matilda, queen of Denmark, and sister to George III.

April 29. Saints Peter, Robert, Hugh, and Fiachna.—The Rev. Doctor Ash, the English lexicographer, died at Pershore, England, 1779. The British sloop of war Epervier was captured by the American sloop of war Peacock, capt. Warrington, April 29, 1814.

April 30. Saints Katharine, Maximus, Erkenwald, &c. The battle of Fontenoy, between the allied armies of England, Holland and Austria, and the French, was fought, 1745, in which the allies were defeated and Louis XV. obtained the mastery of the Netherlands. An anecdote of this battle, though often told before, is really worth an insertion here. Never was a dance commenced with more formal politeness, than was this battle. The van guards of each army were within point blank musket shot, when Lord Charles Hay, captain of the English guards, advanced from the ranks with his hat off, and count D'Auteroche, lieutenant of the French guards, advanced uncovered to meet him. Lord Hay bowed,—“Gentlemen of the French guards,” said he, “fire!” The count bowed in return,—“No, my lord,” he answered, “we never fire first.” They again bowed, and each resumed his place in the ranks.—The conflict commenced, and notwithstanding these testimonies of “high consideration,” there was a carnage of twelve thousand on a side. Congress met for the first time under the present constitution at New-York, and Washington was inaugurated first president, April 30, 1789. In 1803, Louisiana was purchased of the French, and became a part of the territory of the United States.

TABLE TALK.

A foreigner was lately boasting, on board a steam boat, that he had travelled seven thousand miles by that mode of conveyance. An American gentleman present observed that he had travelled above 500,000! Incredible as this may seem, it was none the less true. The individual was capt. Jenkins, who has been engaged in a steam boat on the Hudson, sixteen years, travelling more than thirty thousand miles a year.—The story of mousing oysters need not be told again, since the state of Georgia boasts of these bivalvulars, of a still superior sagacity and power. Rackoons, or as they are more familiarly denominated Coons, in that state, are sometimes caught by the nose, toes, or tail, and secured till drowned by the rising of the tide.—One Sunday morning last winter, a dog was seen running through some of the streets of the city of New-York enveloped in flames. Some inhuman wretch had wet the animal with spirits of turpentine, and put fire to it. The dog ran into a stable, where a youth caught him and dipped him in the gutter, while others put out the fire it had communicated to the stable.—We understand, says a late London paper, that at York fair not long since, there was an unusual shyness in purchasing young colts and horses, from the idea that steam carriages will ere long be in general use for travelling.—A very extraordinary piece of penmanship was lately exhibiting at the Philadelphia Athenæum. It is a sheet of vellum a yard square, containing the books of Ruth, Esther, Job, the song of Solomon, Lamentations, and Psalms, written in the Hebrew character, and so disposed as to form a series of beautiful figures, representing all the sacred instruments and furniture of the temple at Jerusalem—the altar, the mercy-seat, the cherubim, the candlestick, the tables of the law, the columns and the flowers upon their capitals, &c. The work is beautifully executed, and was the exclusive labour of three full years, by a young lady.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Contents of the March number of Flint's Western Monthly Review:—History of the Mississippi Valley; Miseries of Authorship; Lines on passing the Grave of my Sister; The Orleans Hymn. Reviews:—American Antiquities; Sketches of Louisville; M'Kenney's Sketches; Atterley's Voyage to the Moon; Lowell's Sermons; Caldwell's Discourse. Notices; To Patrons. As the number for May will commence a new volume, it may be the fittest time for such as wish to become patrons of that truly entertaining work; perhaps the best source to be found of the general literary and scientific history of the west.

The Boston Evening Bulletin is about to be enlarged, so as to accommodate advertising patrons, and give a reasonable space for Jenks to deposit the hebdomadal overflowings of his always-dry but never-wasted fountain of wit. Boston is peculiarly blessed with excellent literary papers.

MORGAN. The following communication which tends in some measure to corroborate the story published in our last from the New-York Evening Post, appears in the Baltimore American.

Gentlemen:—Having seen an article in your paper of this morning, taken from the New-York Evening Post, regarding a person named Morgan, discovered in Asia, I have taken the liberty, thinking it might be interesting to many in this country, of stating that I knew this person. I was in Smyrna when he arrived in that port, and the description given in the Post, is certainly that of the same man. I saw him for the last time in September 1827, begging his bread in the streets of Smyrna. He related his story thus: that he had dreamed of America that he must go out to Turkey, and become a Mahometan; in consequence of which he took passage in the brig Herald, of Duxbury, captain Waterman, and sailed from Boston, paying $100 for his passage. The captain told me that he scarcely conversed with him on the passage, and appeared a little deranged; but he knew nothing of his intention of becoming Turk, nor did he mention it to any person till after he was made a Mahometan. J. P.

Thurlow Weed, of notorious memory in the Morgan management, yesterday passed through this city, having the “lost witness,” Elisha Adams, in charge. He is brought from Vermont on an order from acting governor Pitcher to governor Butler. What new plans are devising by the proprietors of the Morgan stock, remains to be determined.

POSTSCRIPT.

FOREIGN. By the steam boats arrived this morning, New York, papers of last evening have been received, containing important intelligence from Europe. The packet ship William Thompson, Maxwell, arrived at New-York yesterday, bringing London papers to the 10th, and Liverpool to the 17th of March. They announce that the emperor Nicholas had issued orders for his army to cross the Pruth. This amounts, in our opinion, to a virtual declaration of war. A cabinet council was held on the 15th, in consequence of the arrival of a Russian and French messenger at London. This goes to corroborate the statements made above. We may expect intelligence of the highest importance by the next arrival.

Remember me?—remember me?—
 'Tis well—I ask it not—
 And least of all such boon from thee—
 I'd rather be forgot!

Remember me?—remember me?—
 I scorn thy sympathy—
 I would not ask a smile—a thought
 From faithless one like thee.

Remember me?—remember me?—
 My memory still shall live,
 While thine shall in oblivion be,
 And all that thou canst give.

Remember me?—remember me?—
 Thou 'st cancelled every debt
 That e'er I owed the like of thee—
 Thy love I'll ne'er forget.

Remember me?—remember me?—
 I ask but this—thy hate!
 It ne'er again can injure me;
 'Tis now, alas! too late.

Remember me?—remember me?—
 Thou shalt not quite forget;
 But fare thee well—I curse thee not,
 Though I may reach thee yet.

FAREWELL!

FAREWELL!—I ask no smile of thee—
 No tear—but when the round of mirth
 Shall banish thoughts of present worth,
 Then give—oh give one thought to me.

When malice, urged by envy's thorn,
 Shall pour his slanders on my head,
 Say as thou hast already said,—
 He fears not—merits not their scorn.

And when our last farewell is said,
 Though mine be but a mute farewell,
 Yet shall my thoughts forever dwell
 With thee, till memory's power be dead.

LEILA.

BY LORD BYRON.

Upon a taken bastion where they lay
 Thousands of slaughtered men, a yet warm group
 Of murdered women, who had found their way
 To this vain refuge, made the good heart droop
 And shudder;—while, as beautiful as May,
 A female child of ten years tried to stoop
 And hide her little palpitating breast
 Amidst the bodies lalled in bloody rest.

Two villainous Cossacs pursued the child
 With flashing eyes and weapons; matched with them
 The rudest brute that roams Siberia's wild
 Has feelings pure and polished as a gem,—
 The bear is civilized, the wolf is mild:
 And whom for this at last must we condemn?
 Their natures? or their sovereigns,—who employ
 All arts to teach their subjects to destroy?

Their sabres glittered o'er her little head,
 Whence her fair hair rose twining with affright;
 Her hidden face was plunged amidst the dead:
 When Juan caught a glimpse of this sad sight
 I shall not say exactly what he said,
 Because it might not solace ears polite;
 But what he did, was to lay on their backs,—
 The readiest way of reasoning with Cossacs.

And she was chill as they, and on her face
 A slender streak of blood announced how near
 Her fate had been to that of all her race;

For the same blow which laid her mother here,
 Had scarred her brow, and left its crimson trace
 As the last link with all she had held dear;
 But else unurt, she opened her large eyes,
 And gazed on Juan with a wild surprise.

In fact, the only Christian she could bear
 Was Juan; whom she seemed to have selected
 In place of what her home and friends once were.
 He naturally loved what he protected:
 And thus they formed a rather curious pair,—
 A guardian green in years, a ward connected
 In neither clime, time, blood, with her defender,—
 And yet this want of ties made theirs more tender.

TO THE CLOUDS.

Ye, whose dark foldings are the throne
 And palace of the monarch—Storm,—
 Ye, whose refulgent draperies shone
 Above, ere earth or wave had form,—
 And spreading like a sea of gold
 O'er chaos, beauty threw and grace
 On graceless things,—and proudly told
 Of Him who gave ye shape and place!

Hail! hail! I greet ye with a smile;
 For ye to me speak words of power,
 And bear my thoughts from visions vile
 Back to creation's natal hour.
 Ye seem the monuments of things
 And ages passed with time away;
 To you my sighing spirit clings,—
 Memorials of the ancient day!

The deep and muttering thunder breathes—
 Your voices murmur in mine ear;
 The awful lightning, flashing, wreathes
 Your brows in dazzling smiles severe;
 The rain drops from your bosoms burst
 In torrents o'er earth's spreading plain—
 Ye seem to weep, that sin hath cursed
 And doomed the fallen race of men.

What if your changing shadows take
 New fashionings from midnight's shroud!
 What if the lights of morning break
 Without a trace of evening's cloud!
 Ye do not speak the less of Him
 And of the world's primeval birth,
 Than if ye moveless stood—ye dim
 And threatening curtains of the earth!

Doth not the bright and scented flower
 Decay and die in winters gloom!
 Doth not returning summer's hour
 Revive and wake its fragrant bloom!
 And from the natal hour of light
 Have ye not learned to waste and fly
 Before the conquering sun beams bright!
 And clasp ye not again the sky!

Memorials of His power, who sees
 Earth, air, and ocean, time and space—
 Who gilds with leafy crowns the trees,
 And tears the mountain from its base—
 Who bids fair summer deck the earth,
 When winter's form its beauty shrouds,
 And wakes the sparrow's song of mirth:—
 His subjects hail! illumined clouds!

TO H.

O were I a star, love, thy heart speaking eye
 Ne'er should raise its mild glance to a desolate sky:
 Through tempest and gloom thou shouldst see me afar,
 Shining tenderly down.... I would still be a star.

When the spring flowers had faded, O were I a flower,
 Thy foot should not tread through an odourless bower.
 I would still be a violet for thee blooming on,
 When violets were dead, and the summer was gone.

Yet change is on earth, and our spirits decay
 In climes where through all the year, bright roses stay,
 And the saddest of blightings oft fall on our hearts
 Ere the violets fade, or the summer departs.

Then, were I the sprite of the beautiful spring,
 The chill of his autumn time never should fling
 O'er the life of young hearts, or o'er feeling's rich flowers,
 And nought should be lost, save the lapsing of hours.

Or if I the light-breathing summer wind were,
 When the deep thrill of musick is poured on the air,
 I would catch the full swell of each exquisite note,
 And still over thee with its melody float.

O! were I a thought, or a word, that could make
 One joy in thy heart, that joy would I wake.
 I would live in the voice thou didst love most to hear,
 And dwell on the lips to thy bosom most dear. LXXX.

"FILL—FILL."

Fill—fill—for the bright young hours
 Are sitting away to the land of flowers;—
 And they come not thence with their laughing eyes,—
 Shall we not hallow each one as it flies?
 Oh, they'll bear away on their downy wings
 Each sparkling drop that the wine cup flings,
 While their last smile, lingering round us still,
 Shall silently whisper—"fill—fill."

Fill—fill!—there's a chain of power
 Around us thrown at this midnight hour:—
 Break it not—lest some severed link
 Deep in the faithful heart may sink.
 Hark—hark!—through the misty hail,
 I hear the notes of the spirit call,
 Making each drop of the heart's blood thrill,
 With its echoing watch word—"fill—fill!" JULY.

On yon pale moon, whose pensive eye
 Lights up the depths of air,
 I gaze—and as the clouds flit by,
 View their swift shadows there;
 Eve's lovely crescent, moving free,
 Wakes in my heart the thoughts of thee,
 It is so passing fair;—
 Like the swift shadow is my fate,
 Lone, pathless, wide, and desolate!

O'er the blue heavens they pass full soon,
 But still with fadeless ray,
 Young, clear, and beautiful, the moon
 Beams on, nor knows decay.
 Oh thus—oh thus—when this deep shade
 Like those in yon far heavens shall fade,—
 Like them shall pass away—
 Each look of thine, undimmed by tears,
 Shall brighten through the coming years. VIVIAN.

SONG.

BY THOMAS MOORE.

Fear not that, while around thee
 Life's varied blessings pour,
 One smile of hers would wound thee,
 Whose smile thou seekst no more.
 No,—dead and cold forever
 Let our past love remain;
 Once gone, its spirit never
 Shall haunt thy rest again.

Fear not that, while around thee
 Life's varied blessings pour,
 One sigh of hers shall wound thee,
 Whose smile now charms no more.

May the new ties that bind thee
 Far sweeter, happier prove,
 Nor e'er of me remind thee,
 But by their truth and love.
 Think how, asleep or waking,
 Thy image haunts me yet;
 But how this heart is breaking,
 For thy own peace forget.
 Fear not, &c.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered before Western Light Lodge, No. 105, at Union Village, Broome county, on the anniversary of St. John the Evangelist, December 27, 5827.

BY BR. SAMUEL M. HUNT.

(Concluded.)

What character in community is more to be despised than he who violates the trust reposed in him by a confidential friend? The treacherous man has ever been considered as the most corrupt and dangerous in society. This being acknowledged, which cannot be denied, why then should masons be despised for performing their duty to their brethren in treasuring up a secret which can in no way be an injury to community.

Again, it is urged that masons are plotting against the laws of our country, by endeavouring to arrogate the whole power to themselves, that they may rule with despotick influence. But in what way do they establish this as a fact? Do not the very rules of masonry require us to conform strictly to the laws of the country in which we reside, and never to countenance disloyalty or rebellion? and our bye laws, which we are strictly to observe, do not allow any thing of a political nature to be introduced within the walls of the lodge. Consequently no controversies take place within that produce discord and contention so often without the lodge. This being the established constitution of our lodges, with which every person may by reading satisfy himself, how can people be so illiberal towards us as to say we are seeking to destroy the laws of our country, and raise ourselves to power upon their ruins. Is there the least foundation in reason for forming such an opinion? Let us look to the history of our country for a precedent of this nature. When America was reduced to the necessity of taking up arms to defend her natural rights, a WASHINGTON was found who was adequate to the important design; who, by the philanthropy of his heart and prudence of his head, lead forth her untutored troops into the field of battle, and finally vanquished the enemies of his country. The glorious achievement being performed, quite unlike the aspiring potentates of the earth, behold him returning the sword to its scabbard, and presenting it at the feet of those who gave it. Did this in Washington, who was a mason, seem ambitious? Would this indicate that he was aspiring after power, either for himself or his masonick brethren.

The immortal WARREN, whose memory will long be revered by every wise and good man; was it to patronize a vile usurpation or conspiracy against the laws of the country that he proclaimed "the voice of your fathers' blood cries to you from the ground,—my sons, scorn to be slaves!"

I might cite you to a LAFAYETTE, and many other revolutionary heroes who were masons, and took a part in the common cause of liberty, if these would convince you that usurpation of power was never their motive, in taking up arms against the enemies of freedom. But I trust that enough has already been said to convince such as I have the honour of addressing upon this occasion.

Thus, brethren and friends, having shown the practice of nations from ancient times of observing periodical celebrations, and the benefit resulting from them, and hence explaining the object of our present meeting, and having attempted to show that the real principles of masonry are the same now that they anciently were, although bad men are occasionally admitted to the privileges of the order; through our imperfection of judgement; and having noticed the unhappy excitement of the present day; and having pointed out the course pursued by wicked men in destroying harmony among christian brethren—their object being not unlike the tyrants of the Jacobin club, aiming at the destruction of christianity;—and finally, having answered some of the objections that have frequently been urged against masonry, by attempting to show the falsity and absurdity of those assertions, I now proceed briefly to point out its practical utility in community.

Masonry is a science confined to no particular country, but diffused over the whole habitable globe. Wherever the arts flourish there it flourishes also. While different orders and tenets exist among mankind, dividing and subdividing society into almost innumerable sects,—while sectional jealousies prevail, and man in his rude state

"Doth not feel for man; the natural ties
Of brotherhood, are severed as the flax
That falls asunder at the touch of fire;—
Lands intersected by a narrow frith
Abhor each other;—mountains interposed
Make enemies of nations!"

a cultivation of the true principles of masonry will cause its votaries to live in the bonds of charity with all mankind. The universal principles of the art unite men of the most opposite tenets, of the most distant countries and of the most contradictory opinions. So that in every nation, a mason finds a friend, and in every climate, a home. An inculcation of the principles of masonry leads to the practice of charity. The sick, the distressed, the sad and the sorrowful, have always a claim to our charity. No true mason will ever pass by the stranger in distress; but like the good Samaritan, he pours in the oil and wine of comfort and consolation. But especially the disconsolate widow, who mourns the loss of the companion of her better days, here finds a present helper in distress, a friend to advise and protect. And not only the widow, but the orphan children of a poor though worthy brother, may have reason to rejoice that their father was a mason; for they will find friends who will not wait to be entreated.

I would not however suggest the idea that friendship and charity only exist among masons; for every rational member of community is under moral obligations to exercise charity towards his fellow creatures. I would only assert that masons feel a double responsibility devolving upon them; their natural duty as citizens, and their augmented obligations as members of the fraternity. Mankind are not susceptible of attaining to perfection here, therefore typical figures and emblems, by striking the eye, may more immediately operate as incentive to their duty, and hence excite benevolent actions which otherwise might have remained latent and unemployed.

The benefits of creating funds for charitable purposes must appear obvious. It is therefore required of those who are admitted to the benefits of our institution, to manifest their liberality by paying a certain sum when initiated, which serves to increase the common stock, and extend its ability. For accepting this amount, we have been called a speculating society. How often has it been observed by men in affluent circumstances, that were it not that masons required a fee, they would cheerfully become members of the institution? But ry fee, would be of no benefit were he admitted; but those uninfluenced by mercenary motives, who are prompted to solicit the privileges of masonry, by a sincere wish of being serviceable to their fellow creatures. This then being the true object of those who become members, none will ever be disappointed. While the true principles of the institution are observed, its utility will be extended and every honest unprejudiced man must wish for its prosperity.

Having thus briefly explained the grand design of our institution, for the truth of which I appeal to every true mason's conscience, I now submit it to the candid judgement of this respectable assembly. You no doubt have formerly had an opinion of your own, and probably have heard many arguments adduced against the institution, and some from honest men; but perhaps more that have originated from the tongue of calumny. You now have heard a few arguments in favour of the institution that are justly due to the publick on this occasion.

A few remarks will now occupy for a moment the attention of the members of the fraternity—

Brethren, the anniversary of the birth day of St. John, our ancient brother, ought to excite within our breasts sensations of pleasure, when reviewing his exemplary character. The virtuous principles which he inculcated are highly worthy our imitation. Happy is the man who strictly adheres to the true designs of our ancient institution; for if we keep in view its object, and live up to our profession, the world with all its rage and prejudice cannot affect us. Shall persecution induce us to remit our zeal in a cause which we know to be good, and violate the dictates of reason and conscience, and proclaim to the world that virtue is detrimental and worthless, merely to gratify the feelings of those who are comparatively involved in Egyptian darkness? The world has ever produced individuals who have opposed the tenets of our order; yet perhaps there never was a time when publick prejudice was so much augmented as at the present day. Our institution is charged with creating discord and disturbance among mankind. Parents are said to be opposed to children, and children to parents. But is this an indication that the principle is corrupt? The same argument might be brought against the benign principles of christianity. But these embittered feelings are not occasioned by an adoption of their tenets; but for a want of those benevolent sentiments which masonry and christianity inculcate.

While the voice of many in community is raised against our institution, it behoves us to act prudently, and let our conduct be such that good citizens cannot fail to approbate. The best of institutions have ever met with opposition. Even christianity itself has in no period escaped the tongue of the calumniator. But should we deduce a reason, from its having many enemies, that the system is bad, our hypothesis would lead us into the greatest error imaginable; for the Saviour said unto his disciples—"Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely," &c. If religion has been opposed to the world and men have attempted to wrest its principles, and shamefully abuse its professors, may we not anticipate a proportionate opposition to our system of morality? Have we then any cause to repine or be discouraged, when reflecting upon the envious feelings which many impute against our institution.

never ought to have been admitted to the benefits of our order, and we are now charged as being responsible for all imprudent conduct. Their conduct is the only criterion by which our enemies judge of the whole fraternity. Let us then make due allowances for human weakness and human nature, exercising charity towards those who even have no charity for us. With the candid and unbiassed man, arguments that lead to an explanation of facts may be of service, but to the wilfully prejudiced mind, reason will have no more influence than with the maniac, or remonstrance with the destroying tempest. Let our primary object be, as masons, to live strictly to the tenets of the order; for we know that our consciences bear witness that the institution is good. Let us then square our actions by the square of virtue, which is equivalent to the golden rule. "Do ye unto others as ye would have others do unto you."

Not only should we discharge our duty faithfully to others, but we should remember that we have a duty which we owe ourselves. The person who gives way to all the irregular appetites and passions to which mortals are subject, in attempting to satisfy the mind by epicurean pleasures, impairs every rational enjoyment, destroys his health, and finally renders himself a nuisance in society. Hence we deserv the importance of suppressing every baneful passion, which may be preying upon us by slow and imperceptible degrees which might eventually prove our destruction. How unhappy, my brethren, must that man be, and alas, how much to be pitied, who by giving way to his passions, indulges himself in intemperance and frequent habits of intoxication! How pernicious to society! How prejudicial its effects upon the rising generation! How dreadful to himself! How alarming to his family! Weakened by frequent recourse to the deadly poison, the mind sinks into acts of meanness which the man in his better days would have despised. How much it is to be regretted that such men are ever admitted members of our institution, or when they cannot be reclaimed, that they are not immediately excluded from our privileges. Better were it for such a man never to have known the light, than after he had known it, to turn from the solemn duties incumbent upon him.

Not only should we learn to avoid evil, but we should learn to do well. This day naturally presents many things for our consideration, from its nearness to the birth day of our Saviour, and from its proximity to the close of the year. The contemplative man reviews the scenes that have passed, and the inquiry is suggested, whether the year has passed to the satisfaction of his conscience. If it can be answered in the affirmative, much consolation will be produced to the benevolent mind. If we have failed in any part, let us renew our endeavours, so we may not fail of accomplishing our duty the approaching year. We claim the title of moral men. We profess to belong to the fraternity of masons. Let us then, my brethren, if we respect the honour of the institution and love the principles of the order, adhere strictly to the sentiments which it inculcates. Let us respect the four cardinal virtues, temperance, fortitude, prudence, and justice; limiting our desires by the compass of reason, taking the bible as the rule of our practice, which will teach us to live in the bonds of charity with all mankind, and die in hope of bliss beyond the grave. Then, having the true test, we shall gain admittance into that spiritual lodge above, that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

WASHINGTON COUNTY.

At a regular communication of De La Fayette Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, duly assembled in the hall of Col. Caleb Brown, in Hartford, in the county of Washington, on the 26th of February, 1823, it was

Resolved unanimously, that whereas, since our last assembling together in the capacity of masons, it has pleased the All-wise Disposer of events, in the sovereign display of his divine providence, to remove by death our late General Grand Master, and Governour of our state, DE WITT CLINTON, we therefore cordially unite with our brethren and fellow citizens generally, in deeply lamenting his premature removal from the scene of his great usefulness, and his career of earthly glory, by which we are deprived of one of the most eminent patrons of our order, science of her most favoured votary, and the state of New-York, of her most distinguished son.

Resolved, that in reviewing his past life we recognize the bold, enterprising and enlightened statesman, the firm patriot, the zealous christian, and all the characteristics of a mind pervaded with that truly masonic principle, universal benevolence to man.

JAMES W. PORTER, H. P.
JAMES B. SMITH, Sec'y.

CONNECTICUT.

A circular has been issued by order of the M. E. G. H. P. of the Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons of the state of Connecticut, requiring the officers and members of the Grand Chapter to appear at the annual convocation in May next, with the usual masonic badge of mourning, in token of respect to the memory of the late M. E. DE WITT CLINTON, G. G. H. P. of the G. Grand Chapter of the United States.

KENTUCKY.

At a meeting of the Lexington Royal Arch Chapter, No. 1, in Lexington, Kentucky, on Thursday evening February 28, 1823 it was Resolved unanimously, that the members of this Chapter, wear the usual badge of mourning for sixty days, as a tribute of respect to the memory of DE WITT CLINTON, late General Grand H. P. of the General Grand R. A. Chapter of the U. S. A.

T. C. OREAR, Sec'y.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

REMARKS ON SUDDEN DEATH.

Contained in a letter to the Editors of the New-York Medical and Physical Journal. By Dr. Xavier Tessier, of Quebec.

Cases of sudden death have lately become so frequent, that I was led, sometime since, to turn my attention to this subject, which appeared to me to have been left far behind the rapid improvements made in all the various departments of medical science. I therefore inserted an article to that effect, in the Quebec Medical Journal, Vol. I. in which I offered my opinions, in the hope to draw the attention of the profession to what I considered somewhat neglected, and requested further inquiries. But, after the lapse of two years, I can not discover that it has been more attended to than before; which I would rather ascribe to the circulation of that Journal being almost limited to Canada, than to the circumstances of its being written in French, the language of my country, and one which, from its scientific usefulness, has become an essential part of a liberal education on this continent, and among all the enlightened nations of Europe.

It is not a little remarkable, that out of the myriads of volumes and pamphlets, with which every minute department of medicine abounds, not one treatise should have ever been attempted, or perhaps thought of, on a subject replete with such interesting consequences, and in which the comforts and happiness of mankind are so deeply involved. Its importance to the science of medical jurisprudence seems also to have been greatly overlooked; owing probably, more to the obscurity and difficulty of the subject; than to a want of conviction of its usefulness, abstractedly considered, in a variety of legal cases.

Immense labours are daily bestowed in researches on the means of soothing the ordinary infirmities incident to our nature; but no attention appears to be given towards averting one, which is the most dreadful of all calamities. I do not pretend to say, that the causes which bring on a sudden death are totally unknown to the profession; but, as they are to be referred to diseases, which, although known to exist in the human body, are, however, so obscure and delusive as to escape the notice of the generality of medical men, their existence is seldom suspected, without the appearance of that train of symptoms by which they are expected to manifest themselves.

Even some of the diseases to which I am about to allude, have not yet been considered a more frequent cause of sudden death, than all others, from which they appear only to differ by their rapid and speedy, but gradual termination. Hence, when a person dies suddenly, without the apparent existence of some previous disorder of a nature adequate to that effect, the physician is at a loss how to account for that event, before he has examined and discovered it by a careful dissection. But, without referring to the prejudices which so often frustrate our expectations of a post-mortem examination, it is of the utmost importance to ascertain the existence of that cause in the living subject; and the means of averting its dreadful consequence will then immediately present themselves, even to an ordinary skilful and intelligent practitioner. For, it may perhaps be said with propriety, in the present state of our science, that a disease once well ascertained and understood, is already half cured. I may also assert here, that my inquiries on this subject have led me to the pleasing conviction, that medicine possesses in a great measure the means of checking their sudden termination, although their entire removal may yet long baffle all our attempts.

I have been induced to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the recent event which has deprived this state of its Chief Magistrate, in order to submit my ideas to the test of further observations. For, whilst all classes unite to deplore the death of Governour Clinton as a great public loss, our profession, not only as a constituent part of the republic of letters, of which that individual was so distinguished a member, but more particularly as guardians of the lives of our fellow creatures, feel another interest in the nature of that event, unconnected with any of the political feelings which, as a Canadian citizen, I cannot share in a common degree with his fellow-citizens. As I intend, however, to treat this subject more at length in the French Journal which I am about to publish here, as a new series of the Quebec Medical Journal, I will, for the present, confine myself to recapitulate my ideas on the causes of sudden death, contained in the article referred to, and the course of inquiry which I have adopted in order to arrive at the desired conclusion.

It is now universally allowed, I believe, since the writings of Bichat, that death is the immediate consequence of the cessation of the functions of one of the following organs: the lungs, the brain, and the heart; whilst no other can produce the same result but by means of one of them, and consequently to the whole, through their natural dependence on each other. We know of no disease of the lungs which can bring on a sudden dissolution, without a previous manifestation of symptoms by which it is always strongly marked, and which can ever assume an alarming character without passing through various stages. It is, of course, needless to say that none of my remarks are to be extended to any case of death by violence, poison, or other external causes.

The only condition of the brain which may cause a speedy death, is an accumulation of fluid, bloody or watery, in any part within the skull, occasioning a compression of the brain. This sort of accident constituting apoplexy, and a consequent palsy, particularly in old people, has never been known to produce instantaneous death, which may, indeed, take place in a very few hours, but not without being preceded by the peculiar characteristic symptoms of apoplexy. Such was lately the case with Mr. Emmet. We even know that it is sometimes in our power to rescue the patient from the fatal effects of that compression, by removing or relieving it. I may therefore conclude that the heart alone is the seat of those affections which occasion a sudden death.

This singular hollow muscle has frequently been noticed as the seat of several diseases almost altogether unknown to the ancients; and, strange as it may appear, not much better understood by physicians at the present day, than at the time of Morgagni. Buonaparte's private physician, Baron Corvisart, is the first and yet the only writer who has ever been able to trace the nature of the various disorders with which the heart is liable to be affected, and his description of their character is such, that they ought to rank in our nosological tablets. I am not aware that any disease of the heart has since been observed, which he has not accurately described. The most common of them is called an aneurism of the heart, or a dilatation of its parietes, accompanied with an increase or a diminution of their thickness. This affection generally runs through its course by degrees, and will seldom escape the attentive observer. But, as it is a circumstance almost peculiar to all the diseases of the heart, that the appetite is not impaired, nor the vigour of either body or mind sensibly diminished, nor the functions of the bowels or other organs at all deranged, except that of respiration, which is more or less disturbed according to the nature and extent of the complaint, it not unfrequently happens that the physician will mistake the case for asthma, particularly if the corpulence of the patient be such as to leave some reasonable doubt of at least the possibility of a mechanical impediment to respiration. Hence the disease will arrive at its height, and the patient be carried off suddenly, before the real nature of his disorder is at all suspected.

It is a remarkable fact, and one which we ought constantly to bear in mind, in relation to diseases of the heart, that a complaint, sometimes occasioning but little uneasiness, should be found adequate to a cause of death: that, whilst we are so involuntarily led to calculate the degree of danger according to the severity of the symptoms, we should have to witness that danger in others to be, as it were, in an inverse ratio. Here, there seems to be but one step between a slight indisposition and an inevitable death. How important is it then to be acquainted with the nature of these complaints, and above all, with their dangerous consequences.

But an aneurism is not the only disease of the heart which can bring on such fatal results, and I am disposed to think it is perhaps the least common cause; for there are others, but particularly those degenerescences of the whole viscus, those excrescences or ossified processes so often found in its substance, in its cavity, or about some of its orifices, existing independently of any constitutional affection or vitiated habit, but, on the contrary, attendant on the most healthy subject; and which are therefore more likely to escape the notice of the practitioner.

The existence of those affections will be detected by a careful attention to the state of the circulation, particularly to the pulsation of the heart, and of the arteries at the wrist and at the axilla. I will not enter into the detail of those symptoms; they are, or ought to be well known to every practitioner, and easily deduced from the physiology and mechanism of the circulation of the blood; but I would particularly recommend the able description given of them by Corvisart, which will be found of great service to those who may feel disposed to devote their attention to this subject. I may perhaps also observe here, that my own observation does not allow me to place much confidence in the sound of the chest by percussion, which, according to that writer, is in most of those complaints, what he calls an son mat, so forcibly expressed in the following words, tanquam percussio femoris.

One particular circumstance is to be attended to with respect to their treatment, which is, that as their progress, if not their origin itself, is the natural and unavoidable consequence of the performance of the functions of the heart itself, even in the state of health, the least possible deviation from the strict regimen necessary to be pursued, will frequently be found sufficient to counteract the most powerful means which medicine possesses of checking, if not of curing the disease. For example, in an aneurism of the heart, which is by far the most common of them all, those distressing palpitations which occur by fits, are to be considered as the natural efforts of that organ to overcome the resistance offered by the mass of blood, which has then become disproportionate to its dilatational capacity in the active aneurism, or its physical and contractile power in the passive. Perfect rest of both body and mind, but particularly of the latter, being of the first consequence in these cases, the least degree of excitement, by accelerating the circulation, will bring on those palpitations whereby the disease is increased; and the mischief occasioned by one of those fits is perhaps greater than the relief which can be obtained from the best treatment for several weeks.

Those fits are to be met with in almost all diseases of the heart, and it is generally in one of them that the patient is suddenly carried off. This fact is strikingly exemplified in the case of the illustrious deceased to whom I have before alluded, when, to use the words of his family physician, he suddenly appeared "distressed for breath." I would venture to say that, previous to this struggle for breath, the heart had already ceased beating in consequence of which the lungs were making efforts to relieve themselves of the blood accumulating in them from the want of its natural outlet through the heart. This fact may be observed in ordinary occurrences in life; for, when in consequence of mental excitement, the blood, leaving the surface of the body, is accumulated in the interior organs, a deep inspiration, a sigh, is the means which nature immediately resorts to, in order to afford a free circulation to the blood, by thus increasing the capacity of the vessels. In fits of anger, joy, or terror, if the mass of blood accumulated in the heart is such as to offer a mechanical resistance which it can not overcome by its contractile power, its motion ceases, and after a few fruitless inspirations, the person drops down dead. Such is the case with those who die in a fit of anger, joy, terror, or grief. Bodily pain has even been known to produce the same result; hence the propriety in persons undergoing painful operations of relieving themselves by their groaning, sighs, crying out, and giving free utterance to their sufferings.

I must confess that our means of affording relief in the diseases I have mentioned, are yet very limited; but, it is possible that, by a more careful attention than has heretofore been given to the subject, we may improve them, or perhaps discover others more effectual. The most powerful which we know of at this day are blood-letting and diet carried to a great extent, but they are evidently inadequate to a cure without some more direct means. Diseases of the heart, however, are more commonly met with in elderly people, and we know that frequent bleedings will dispose them to dropsical affections, without curing the former affections; but, if we can, by that means, avert their abrupt termination, it certainly is the least pledge we can produce to suffering humanity of the utility of our profession, when that deplorable benefit is to be purchased at the expense of a protracted but not less incurable disease.

THE GATHERER.

POLITICAL CREEDS.

From the National Gazette.

THE OPPOSITION MAN. I believe that Adams the father was a monarchist and a tyrant—that Adams the son has inherited his principles and dispositions; that he made a corrupt bargain with Clay and the Federalists; that he aims to place a crown upon his head, and render the government hereditary; that he is a secret member of the Holy Alliance; that he means to give all the public offices to Federalists; that he is wholly employed in selfish intrigues—that he and Clay made away with Morgan, the anti-mason; that he is a misanthrope, and knows nothing of mankind; that he spends the contingent funds in bribes and largesses; that he purposely sacrificed the West India trade; that he patronizes speculation and intrigue in every department of government; that the energy of Jackson is necessary to prevent the putrefaction or overthrow of all our institutions—that the accomplishments and qualifications of a statesman, so called, are wholly superfluous for the office of president; that Jackson is a man of wonderful natural abilities, excellent temper, and evangelical piety, and that his intuition will answer every purpose of administration; that military services are the true recommendation for the chief magistracy; that Randolph is one of the most erudite, patriotic, argumentative orators, and consistent, unprejudiced politicians, that ever appeared; that the reconciliation of colonel Benton with general Jackson is absolutely disinterested and pure, while the union of Clay with Adams is infernal, &c.

THE ADMINISTRATION MAN. I believe that general Jackson is utterly illiterate and uninformed, and that he can neither spell, read, nor write; that he is as ferocious and blood-thirsty as a tiger; that he has slaughtered the Indians in mere wantonness of barbarity—that his Indian campaigns required very little talent or skill—that his defence of New Orleans was, after all, an easy, insignificant affair; that he imprisoned judges, hectorated governors and legislatures, and trampled on the laws, merely from an arrogant, despotick, and jealous nature; that he caused six, ten, or twenty innocent militia men to be shot, without the least necessity or reluctance; that he executed in the same manner "the injured Ambrister and Arbuthnot," two harmless British traders; that he hung the Indian prophet, and massacred the Seminoles, out of sheer hatred to the poor red skins; that he marched to Pensacola in order to speculate in lands; that he has killed several antagonists in duels, in cold blood; that he carried off another man's wife and married her, knowing that she was not divorced; that if he should become president, he will establish a military despotism; that he has wilfully propagated falsehoods concerning the secretary of state; that he is vulgar and brutal in his manners, and impious in his spirit and language; that he and all his party are enemies of the Tariff, or American System, &c.

CHORUS OF CREEDS. We believe, respectively that all the candidates, leaders, speakers and writers on our side, are the ablest, purest, discreetest, best;—that all on the other side are villainous and execrable;—that every thing which our party say, is true; and whatever they do, good; that the salvation of the country depends on our success, &c.

UNSHIPPING A DOG'S RUDDER.

A veteran tar, who had served under the late Lord Vincent many years in the capacity of boatswain, on getting past exertion, was appointed by the latter, in grateful memory of his former conduct, a kind of subgardener, at his marine villa. Jack had not long been in possession of his new post, when he perceived every morning, on walking over the gardens, that several of the beds were pawed about, and the borders destroyed indicating by their marks the stealthy visits of some canine wanderer. Jack immediately communicated the news to his Lordship, who concurred with him in his opinion as to its cause, and advised him to go to the garden a few hours earlier some morning, and give the intruder a warm welcome. Jack accordingly did so—hiding himself in a shrubbery, he soon espied a long lean dog, between a pointer and a mastiff, spring upon the garden wall, and jumping into the grounds, begin running about, and exploring with a degree of activity and keenness, the depth of a strawberry bed. Jack watched for his opportunity, and at the moment the dog had burrowed his head out of sight in the earth, the tar stole behind him with a spade, and at a blow struck off the end of his tail: the dog sprang over the garden wall again yelping. Some time after, when his Lordship came into the garden, Jack accosted him, "All right, your honour, we were boarded by a dog sure enough, of a long sharp sailing build, rather white about the bows, and dark in the midships." "And what did you do to him Jack?" "I prevented his finding his way here any more." "You did not kill him, Jack?" "Oh no, please your honour, I laid by upon the look-out there in the shrubbery and when I seed him drowse his bows into the strawberry bed, I dropped softly astern, and with this here tool unshipped his rudder, you see, that's all."

MASTER M'GOING'S MAXIMS.

We learn more from the misfortunes of others, than from our own experience. When we see others sliding from a precipice, we shrink back ourselves. When the bark that wafts our companions upsets, we steer our own for port.

Hope and courage, are the main pillars in the temple of man's destiny—uniting beauty with strength, ornament with utility, and elegance with grandeur.

POPULAR TALES.

THE WOOD KING.

BY MISS EMMA ROBERTS.

Already the pile of heaped-up fagots reached above the low roof of his hut; but Carl Scheffler still continued lopping off branches, and binding fresh bundles together, almost unconscious that the sun had set, and that the labours of the day being over, the neighbouring peasants were hastening to the skittle-ground to pass away an hour in sport. The woodcutter's hut was perched upon an eminence a little out of the publick path; but he heard the merry songs of his comrades as they proceeded gayly to the place of rendezvous, at the Golden Stag in the village below. Many of his intimate acquaintance paused as they approached the corner of the road nearest to his hut, and the wild wood rang with their loud halloes; but the call, which in other times had been echoed by the woodman's glad voice, was now unanswered; he busied himself with his work; his brow darkened as the joyous sounds came over his ear; he threw aside his hatchet, resumed it again, and again casting it from him, exclaimed, "Why, let them go, I will not carry this chafed and wounded spirit to their revels; my hand is not steady enough for a bowling-match; and since Linda will doubtless choose a richer partner, I have no heart for the dance."

It was easy to perceive that Carl Scheffler was smarting under a recent disappointment: he had borne up bravely against the misfortunes which, from a state of comparative affluence, had reduced him to depend upon his own arm for subsistence, fondly trusting that ere long his prospects would amend; and that, at the return of the Count of Holberg to his ancestral dominions, he should obtain a forester's place, and be enabled to claim the hand of Linda Von Kleist, to whom, in happier times, he had been betrothed. But these dreams had vanished; the count's bailiff having seen Linda, the flower of the hamlet, became his rival, and consequently his enemy: he had bestowed the office promised to Carl upon another; and Linda's father ungratefully withdrawing the consent given when the lover's affairs were in a more flourishing condition, had forbidden him the house. Buoyed up with the hope that Linda would remain faithful, and by her unabated attachment console him under the pressure of his calamities, Carl did not at first give way to despair; but Linda was too obedient, or perchance too indifferent, to disobey her father's commands. He sought her at the accustomed spot—she came not, sent not: he hovered round her residence, and if chance favoured him with a glimpse of his beloved, it was only to add to his misery, for she withdrew hastily from his sight. A rumour of the intended marriage of his perjured mistress reached his ears, and, struck to the soul; he endeavoured, by manual labour, to exhaust his strength and banish the recollection of his misery. He toiled all day in feverish desperation; and now that there was no more to be done, sat down to ponder over his altered prospects. The bailiff possessed the ear of his master, and it was useless to hope that the count would repair the injustice committed by so trusted a servant. The situation which above all others he had coveted, which would have given him the free range of the forest, the joyful hunter's life which suited his daring spirit, delighting in the perils of the chase, and, above all, a home for Linda, was lost, and for ever; henceforward he must relinquish all expectation of regaining the station which the misfortunes that had brought his parents to the grave had deprived him of; and be content to earn a sordid meal by bending his back to burthens befitting the brute creation alone; to hew wood, and to bear it to the neighbouring towns; to delve the ground at the bidding of a master, and to perform the offices of a menial hireling. "At least not here," cried the wretched young man, "not in the face of all my former friends; there is a refuge left where I may hide my sorrows and my wrongs. Fair earth, and thou fair sky, I gaze upon you for the last time; buried from the face of day in the centre of the deepest mine, I'll spend the remnant of my life unpitied and unknown." Determined to execute this resolution on the instant, Carl hastily collected such parts of his slender property as were portable; and having completed his arrangements, prepared to cross the Brocken, and shaped his course towards the Rammelsburg. The last rich gleam of crimson had faded from the sky; but there was light enough in the summer night to guide him on his way. A few bright and beautiful stars gemmed the wide concave of heaven; the air was soft and balmy, scarcely agitating the leaves of the forest trees, the fragrance-weeping limes gave out their richest scent, and the gentle gush of fountains, and the tricklings of the mountain springs, came in music on the ear; and had the traveller been more at ease, the calm and tranquil scene must have diffused its soothing influence over his heart.—Carl, disregarding every thing save his own melancholy destiny, strode along almost choked by bitter thought, and so little heedful of the road, that he soon became involved in thickets whose paths were unknown to him; he looked up to the heavens, and shaping his course by one of the stars, was somewhat surprised to find himself still involved in the impenetrable mazes of the wood. Compelled to give more attention than heretofore to his route, he once or twice thought that he distinguished a human figure moving through the darkness of the forest. At first, not disposed to fall in with a companion, he remained silent, lest the person, whoever he might be, should choose to enter into conversation with him; then not quite certain whether he was right in his conjecture—for upon casting a second glance upon the object which attracted him, he more than once discovered it to be some stunted trunk or fantastick tree—he became anxious to ascertain whether he was in reality alone, or if some other midnight wanderer trod the waste, and he looked narrowly around; all was still, silent, and solitary; and fancying that he had been deceived by the fitting shadows of the night, he was again relapsing into his former reverie, when he became aware of the presence of a man dressed in the garb of a forester, and having his cap wreathed with a garland of green leaves, who stood close at his side. Carl's tongue moved to utter a salutation, but the words stuck in his throat, an indescribable sensation of horror thrilled through his frame; tales of the demons of the Hartz rushed upon his memory—but he recovered instantly from the sudden shock. The desperate state of his fortune gave him courage, and, looking up, he was surprised at the consternation which the stranger had occasioned: he was a person of ordinary appearance, who, accosting him frankly, exclaimed, "Ho, comrade, thou art, I see, bent on the same errand as myself; but wherefore dost thou seek the treasures of the Nibelungen without the protecting wreath?"—"The treasures of the Nibelungen?" returned Carl; "I have indeed heard of such a thing, and that it was hidden in the bosom of the Hartz by a princess of the olden time; but I never was mad enough to think of so wild a chase as a search after riches, which has baffled the wisest of our ancestors, must surely prove." "Belike then," replied the forester, "thou art well to do in the world, and therefore needest not to replenish thy wallets with gold,—travelling perchance to take possession of some rich inheritance." "No, by St. Roelas," cried the woodcutter, "thou hast guessed wide of the mark. I am going to hide my poverty in the mine of Rammelsburg."—"The mine of Rammelsburg!" echoed the stranger, and laughed scornfully, so that the deep woods rang with the sound; and Carl feeling his old sensations return as the fiendish merriment resounded through the wilderness, again gazed stedfastly in his companion's face, but he read nothing there to justify his suspicions; the fiery eye lost its lustre; the lip its curl, and, gazing benignantly upon the forlorn wood-cutter, he continued his speech, saying, "Then prithee take the advice of one who knows these forests, and all that they contain. Here are materials in abundance for our garland; advance forward, and fear not the issue;"—and, gathering leaves from the boughs of trees of a species unknown to his new acquaintance, he twined them into a wreath, and placed the sylvan diadem on Carl's head. The instant that he felt the light pressure on his temples, all his fears vanished; and he followed his guide, conversing pleasantly through wide avenues and over broad glades of fresh turf, which seemed to be laid out like a royal chase, till they came to a wall of rock resembling the Hahnen Klippers, and entering through an arch, a grey moss-covered tower arose in the distance. The ponderous doors were wide open; and Carl advancing, found himself in a large hall well lighted, and showing abundance of treasure scattered abroad in all directions. He was conscious that he had lost his companion, but he seemed no longer to require his instruction; and casting down his own worthless burthen, he laden himself with the riches that courted his touch. The adventurer was soon supplied with a sufficient quantity of gold and jewels to satisfy his most unbounded wishes; and turning from the spot with a light heart, he sped merrily along. The country round about seemed strange to him; but on repassing the rocky ledge, a brisk wind suddenly springing up blew off his cap. The morning air was cold, and Carl, hastening to regain his head-gear, discovered that the wreath had disappeared; and, as if awakening from a dream, he found himself surrounded by familiar objects; he felt, however, the weight of the load upon his back, and though panting with the fatigue it occasioned, made the best of his way home. On approaching the hut, a low murmur struck on his ear. He paused; listened attentively; and distinguishing a female voice, he rushed forward, and in the next moment clasped Linda in his arms. She had fled from the persecutions of the bailiff to seek shelter in Carl's straw-roofed hut; and the now happy lovers, as they surveyed the treasures which had been snatched from the Nibelungen, agreed that they owed their good fortune to Riebezahel the Wood King, who sometimes taking pity upon the frail and feeble denizens of earth, pointed out to their wondering eyes the inexhaustible riches of which he was the acknowledged guardian.

MISCELLANY.

CONFESSION OF THE EXECUTIONER OF CHARLES I.

From Ellis's Historical Inquiries.

There have been great disputes about the person who beheaded Charles I. Mr. Ellis says, "it seems most probable that the person who actually beheaded the king was the common executioner." And then adds the following valuable and interesting note, which seems to us to settle the question.

"Among the tracts relating to the civil war, which were given to the British Museum by his late majesty King George III. in 1762, there are three upon this subject. One is entitled, 'The Confession of Richard Brandon the Hangman (upon his death-bed,) concerning his beheading his late Majesty. Printed in the year of the hangman's downfall, 1649.' The second is entitled, 'The last Will and Testament of Richard Brandon,' printed in the same year. The third is, 'A Dialogue or Dispute between the late Hangman (the same person,) and Death,' in verse, without date. All three are in quarto."

The following are the most important paragraphs of the first tract:

"The confession of the hangman concerning his beheading his late majesty the king of Great Britain (upon his death-bed) who was buried on Thursday last in Whitechapel church-yard, with the manner thereof:—

"Upon Wednesday last (being the 20th of this instant, June 1649,) Richard Brandon, the late executioner and hangman, who beheaded his late majesty, king of Great Britain, departed this life; but during the time of his sickness his conscience was much troubled, and exceedingly perplexed in mind, yet little shew of repentance for remission of his sins, and by past transgressions, which had so much power and influence upon him, that he seemed to live in them, and they in him. And on Sunday last, a young man of his acquaintance going to visit him, fell into discourse, asked him how he did, and whether he was not troubled in conscience for cutting off the king's head. He replied, 'yes, by reason that (upon the time of his tryall, and at the denouncing of sentence against him,) he had taken a vow and protestation, wishing God to punish him body and soul, if ever he appeared op the scaffold to do the act, or lift up his hand against him.

"He likewise confessed that he had thirty pounds for his pains, all paid him in half-crowns, within an hour after the blow was given; and that he had an orange stuck full of cloves, and a handkercher out of the king's pocket, so soon as he was carried off from the scaffold, for which orange he was profered twenty shillings by a gentleman in Whitehall, but refused the same, and afterwards sold it for ten shillings in Rosemary-lane. About six of the clock at night, he returned home to his wife living in Rosemary-lane, and gave her the money, saying, that it was the dearest money that ever he earned in his life, for it would cost him his life; which prophetic words were soon made manifest, for it appeared, that ever since he hath been in a most sad condition, and upon the Almighty's first scourging of him with the rod of sickness, and the friendly admonition of divers friends for the calling of him to repentance, yet he persisted on in his vicious vices, and would not hearken thereunto, but lay raging and swearing, and still pointing at one thing or another, which he conceived to be still visible before him."

"About three days before he dy'd, he lay speechless, uttering many a sigh and heavy groan, and so in a most desperate manner departed from his bed of sorrow. For the buriall whereof great store of wines were sent in by the sheriff of the city of London, and a great multitude of people stood waiting to see his corpse carried to the church-yard, some crying out, 'Hang him, rogue!' 'Bury him in the dunghill,' others pressing upon him, saying, they would quarter him for executing of the king: insomuch that the churchwardens and masters of the parish were fain to come for the suppressing of them, and (with great difficulty) he was at last carryed to White Chappell church-yard, having (as it is said) a bunch of rosemary at each end of the coffin, on the top thereof, with a rope tyed crosse from one end to the other."

"And a merry conceited cook living at the sign of the Crown, having a black fan (worth the value of thirty shillings,) took a resolution to rent the same in pieces, and to every feather tied a piece of pack-thread dyed in black ink, and gave them to divers persons who (in derision) for a while wore them in their hats."

"Thus have I given thee an exact account and perfect relation of the life and death of Richard Brandon, to the end that the world may be convinced of those calumnious speeches and erroneous suggestions which are dayly spit from the mouth of envy against divers persons of great worth and eminency, by casting an odium upon them for the executing of the king; it being now made manifest that the aforesaid executioner was the only man who gave the fatal blow, and his man that wayted upon him, was a ragman (of the name of Ralph Jones) living in Rosemary-lane."

IMAGINARY INVALIDS.

From Hood's Sayings and Doings. New Series.

"Chamomile tea, Mrs. Crosby, if you please," said Mr. Crosby; "I have had five pints of water-gruel since bed-time. I cannot bear any more."

"Just as you choose, my angel," said Mrs. Crosby; "Caroline, dear, run before, and shut the windows in the breakfast parlour. Your papa is going down."

Caroline flew to obey her mother's mandate.

"I'll take a little ether," said Mr. Crosby, "before I go out, for I have had a few slight touches of flying gout during the night, Mrs. Crosby."

"Indeed, my life," said the lady. "I can assure you I have not suffered a little myself; an attack of my old peripneumony did not meliorate the pains of my lumbago. Nor am I quite easy about my erysipelas."

"Come, dearest," said the invalid husband, "lend me your arm—ring for Richards to put the pillows in my chair—bring down the book, and let us see what's to be done next."

And in this order of march, proceeded Mr. and Mrs. Crosby to the breakfast parlour, which had been previously hermetically sealed, by the assiduity of Caroline.

It was July, the tea-urn steamed upon the table, the room had a southern aspect, and the sun shone full into it—Mr. Crosby had just taken ether and his lady had just been rubbed with Steers' opodel-dock. Caroline proceeded to do duty at the breakfast table.

"Oh," said Mr. Crosby, as he sat down—"what a sudden pain at the back of my head."

"Gracious me!" cried Mrs. Crosby, "at the back of your head, my life—a leading symptom of apoplectic tendency."

"And my feet are cold, hot as the weather is," continued Mr. Crosby.

"When the extremities are chilled, Caroline," muttered Mrs. Crosby, to her daughter-in-law, "the book says, death is approaching."

"Yes," said Caroline half smiling, "towards the end of a long and wearing disorder, but not surely in papa's state of health."

"Health, child," exclaimed Mr. Crosby, "why neither that suffering angel, nor myself, have had half an hour's health since—since—"

"Since," interrupted Caroline, "you have devoted yourselves to the study of Dr. Buchan: indeed, my dear father, that book of fate should not be opened by the world at large."

"'Tis an admirable book, child," said Mrs. Crosby; "and although it is the fashion to laugh at it now, it has saved us hundreds of guineas, which we else should have paid to the physicians."

"And has cost you thousands, which you have paid to the apothecaries," said Caroline. "Only hear what cousin William says about it."

"Who quotes me?" exclaimed cousin William, opening the door.

"I," said Caroline, and her bright eyes sparkled, as her young and elegant cousin made his appearance; "upon the old subject of that odious book."

"What," said the young guardsman, "making fresh war upon the Buchaneers."

"William," said Mr. Crosby, "you may call us what you please; but the discovery of our disorders in time, tends to the salvation of the constitution."

"Truly so, my dear uncle," said Captain Morley, "provided you do discover them; but since disorders generally begin with fever, the incipient symptoms of all must naturally more or less resemble each other: and thus fancy, which like conscience, 'doth make cowards of us all,' ekes out the rest of the prognosticks, and we think ourselves suffering under a combination of ills, by which, in fact, we are not in the slightest degree assailed."

"Look at Caroline's cheek, William," said Mrs. Crosby, "what do you think of the flush which you see upon it at this moment?"

"Think," said Morley, "that it rivals the virgin rose."

"Oh, William," said Caroline.

"There," exclaimed her mother, "see she flushes still more."

"Health, pure health, by the gods," exclaimed the Captain, "heightened by native modesty."

"Health," says Mrs. Crosby: "how can you talk such nonsense, William; why the child's pulse are at seventy—health—hectic—are you hot, Caroline?"

"Very hot, indeed, mama," said the lovely tea maker.

"No wonder, aunt," said Morley: the glass is at ninety-two in the corner of the room farthest removed from the influence of the tea-urn."

"Poor child," said Crosby, who was reading Buchan, and drinking Dr. Solander's British Infusion, "poor Cary—yes—so it is—my angel is right."

"Oh, my dear father," interrupted Caroline, "do not make yourself uneasy about me, I assure you I am in perfect health; but you make me laugh with your too anxious fears, so that I can hardly eat my breakfast."

"Difficulty of swallowing," sighed Mrs. Crosby, "is a most awful symptom."

And so, if I chose, I might indulge my reader with fifty such scenes—fifty such dialogues, which occurred at meal times, the only periods at which the family met; and so it was, that owing to their addiction to Dr. Buchan this once happy couple moped and physicked their lives away in a dull house in the dullest part of Cambridgeshire, unenlivened by visitors, whose habits and amusements might, they apprehended, interfere with the regimen and medicine absolutely necessary, as they thought, to their existence; secluded from society and its innocent gaieties, by the fear either of catching colds, or fevers, or surfeits, or over-feeding, or over-exercising themselves; nor amongst the other agremens of their seclusion should it be forgotten, that the physick closet was situated at the head of the great staircase, and flavoured the whole internal atmosphere, which never had an opportunity of escaping, except indeed through the windows of Caroline's boudoir, the only apertures ever open for its egress after the family were up for the day.

THE TRIAL OF THE SPIRITS.

Extract from Archbishop Tillotson's sermon on the trial of the Spirits.

Suppose I came a stranger into England, and landing at Dover took a guide there to conduct me in my way to York, which I knew before by the map to be North of Dover: having committed myself to him, if he lead me for two or three days together out of any plain road, and many times over hedge and ditch, I can not but think it strange, that in a civil and well inhabited country there should be no high way from one part of it to another: yet thus far, I submit to him, though not without regret and impatience. But then, if after this, for two or three days more he lead me directly South, and with my face full upon the sun at noon day, and at last bring me back again to Dover Pier, and still bids me follow him; then certainly no modesty does oblige a man not to dispute with his guide, and to tell him surely, that can be no way, because it is sea. Now, though he set never so bold a face upon the matter, and tell me with all the gravity and authority in the world, that it is not the sea, but dry land under the species and appearance of water, and that whatever my eyes tell me, having once committed myself to his guidance, I must not trust my own senses in the case, it being one of the most dangerous sorts of infidelity to believe my own eyes rather than his faithful and infallible guide: all this moves me not; but I begin to expostulate roundly with him, and to let him understand that if I must not believe what I see, he is like to be of no further use to me, because I shall not be able at this rate to know whether I have a guide, and whether I follow him or not. In short, I tell him plainly, that when I took him for my guide, I did not take him to tell me the difference between North and South, between a hedge and a highway, between sea and dry land; all this I knew before, as well as he, or any man else could tell me; but I took him to conduct and direct me the nearest way to York. And therefore after all his impertinent talk, after all his motives of credibility to persuade me to believe him, and all his confident sayings, which he gravely calls demonstrations, I stand stiffly upon the shore, and leave my learned and reverend guide to take his own course, and to dispose of himself as he pleaseth; but firmly resolve not to follow him. And is any man to be blamed that breaks with his guide upon these terms?

And this truly is the case, when a man commits himself to the guidance of any person or church: if by virtue of this authority they will needs persuade me out of my senses, and not to believe what I see, but what they say; that virtue is vice, and vice virtue if they declare them to be so; and that, because they say they are infallible, I am to receive all their dictates for oracles, though never so evidently false and absurd in the judgement of all mankind: in this case there is no way to be rid of these unreasonable people, but to desire them, since one kindness deserves another, and all contradictions are alike easy to be believed, that they would be pleased to believe that infidelity is faith, and that, when I absolutely renounce their authority, I do yield a perfect submission and obedience to it.

Upon the whole matter, all the revelation of God, as well as the laws of men, go upon this supposition, that men are not stark fools; but that they will consider their interests, and have regard to the great concernment of their eternal salvation. And this is as much to secure men from mistakes in matters of belief, as God hath afforded to keep men from sin in matters of practice. He hath made no effectual, infallible provision that men should not sin; and yet it would puzzle any man to give a good reason, why God should take more care to secure men against errors in belief than against sin and wickedness in their lives.

EDITORIAL DIARY.

MAY.

Was that her footstep on the hill—
Her voice upon the gale?—

MOORE.

We need not repeat the thousand poetical uses made of this month, for poets have fairly worn out every image, and tortured every figure, to come up to what nature sings, with her thousand voices, to welcome the happy season. It is no wonder that fable has poured out her richest treasures, an offering to so much beautiful reality. Among the most remote of the ancients we find this season the perpetual theme of the lover's song. Whether this month is really more propitious to the empire of the tender passion than any other season, we do not pretend to know enough in such matters to decide. It has however every thing in it calculated to elevate the youthful and romantic mind. The month was deemed by the Romans as under the protection of Apollo; and it being the month wherein they made several expiations, they prohibited marrying in May. The month was known among our ancestors, the Saxons, by the name of Trimilki, from the fact that in this month they began to milk their cows thrice every day.

May 1. Saint Philip and Saint James, apostles.—Saints Asaph, Marcon, and Sigismund. MAY DAY. The beautiful associations with this season seem to die away, or lose themselves in the common place items of history. We who live in this grave age, when ten thousand levities are gaining ground, and as many really salutary gravities becoming extinct, know very little of the glorious festivity which was so religiously observed by our worthy ancestors in England, at the return of May-Day. Their hearts responded merrily to the cheerfulness of the season. "At the dawn of the day," says Hone, "the lads and lasses left their towns and villages, and repaired to the woodlands, by sound of musick, they gathered the May, or blossoming branches, of the trees, and bound them with wreaths of flowers; then returning to their homes by surprise, they decorated their lattices and doors with the sweet-smelling spoil of their joyous journey, and spent the remaining hours in sports and pastimes." The ancient English poets have made the day especially their own; they are its annalists. We find a poetical description of the festive rights of May-Day in almost every one of them. To them we must refer our readers for a copious description of their celebrations. "I value," says Washington Irving, "every custom that tends to infuse poetical feeling into the people, and to sweeten and soften the rudeness of rustic manners, without destroying their simplicity. Indeed it is to the decline of this happy simplicity, that the decline of this custom may be traced; and the rural dance on the green, and the homely May-Day pageant, have gradually disappeared, in proportion as the peasantry have become expensive and artificial in their pleasures, and too knowing for simple enjoyment. Some attempts indeed have been made of late years, by men of both sense and learning, to rally back the popular feeling to these standards of primitive simplicity; but the time has gone by; the feeling has become chilled by habits of gain and traffick; the country apes the manners and amusements of the town; and little is heard of May-Day at present, except from the lamentations of authors who sigh after it from among the brick walls of the city."

In our own rural annals, we have no notice taken of this holy-day. Our cities however observe it, and that not altogether with the same hilarity as formerly. Every body who has rented a tenement in a city, and been accustomed to change situations annually, looks forward to this day, not with a heart thrilling for the anticipated fruition of festive joy, but with anxious bodings over anticipated destruction of furniture, and disarrangement of household ware.—His mind teems with images of broken-crockery, shattered cabinet work, mislaid linen, and scattered goods.

In other christian countries it has been, and is still held as a sort of holy-day; but our limits will not suffer us to particularize the ceremonies used by any.

The first of May is memorable for the battle of Lutzen, which was fought between the French and allies, in 1813. It was a severe and bloody contest, the loss on each side being about 15,000, and both parties claiming the victory. The allies were however obliged to retreat, and cross the Elbe the next day. May first, 1807, the West India slave trade was proscribed by an act of parliament.

May 2. Saint Athanasius. This celebrated doctor of the church was patriarch of Alexandria; he died in 378. He is celebrated for his opposition to the Arians, who were then very numerous, and for having his name attached to the creed bearing his name. Some however say that this creed was not compiled until the fifth century. One thing however is certain, that the doctrines it teaches, were strongly defended by Saint Athanasius. May 2, 1519, Leonardo de Vinci, the celebrated painter, died at Fontainebleau. [See the first volume of the American Masonick Record, page 100, article "The Last Supper."] In 1805, Ferdinand VII., the present weak monarch of Spain, plucked up courage enough to declare war against Buonaparte, the second of May, after the latter had returned from Elba. This deserves to be noticed among the memorabilia, of this date. The prince of Coburg was married to the daughter of the present king of England in 1816.

May 3. The Invention of the Cross, a festival in the church, in honour of the discovery of the cross of Christ, on Mount Calvary by Saint Helena; also Saint Alexander, the pope. May 3, 1779, general Ash, with 1500 Americans, were surprised by general Prescott, and 150 of his men killed, and 100 made prisoners, in Georgia. In 1806, several British ships of War, the Leander, Driver, &c. were interdicted the harbours of the United States, by proclamation of the president. The next year, however, the Driver entered the harbour of Charleston, South Carolina, in contempt of the interdiction.—1813, Havre de Grace, in Maryland, was burned by the British, under admiral Cockburn.

May 4. Saint Monica, mother of Saint Augustine; also Saint Goddard.—1471, Edward IV. gained a victory over the adherents of the house of Lancaster, at Tewksbury.—1677, Doctor Barrow, the celebrated mathematician, died, aged 47. He was a wit as well as a philosopher, and a match in a particular instance to the redoubtable Rochester. Meeting together at court, Rochester, with his usual levity said, "doctor, I am yours to your shoe tie." Barrow bowed obsequiously, with, "my lord, I am yours to the ground." Rochester returned this by, "I am yours to the centre;" Barrow rejoined,—"I am yours to the antipodes;" Rochester, not to be foiled by a musty old piece of divinity, as he termed him, exclaimed, "doctor, I am yours to the lowest pit of hell;" whereupon Barrow turned very gravely on his heel, and said,—"and there, my lord, I choose to leave you."—1780, Charleston, South-Carolina, surrendered to the British forces under Sir Henry Clinton.—1814, Louis XVIII. entered the French capital, and resumed the throne of the Bourbons.

May 5. Saints Pius V., Hilary, Angelus, Mauront, &c.—1782, Sir Guy Carleton arrived at New-York, with power to treat of peace with the United States.—1808, Charles IV. resigned the crown of Spain to Buonaparte and retired to the interior of France.—1811, the French were defeated by Wellington, in the battle of Fuentes de Honores.—1813, the British and Indians attacked Fort Meigs, and were defeated with great loss.—1821, NAPOLEON BONAPARTE died at Saint Helena, in the sixth year of his confinement. In this short sentence is embodied one of the deepest lessons; words are worse than vain to express it. Its teachings are such as to draw all comment that can be made, from every thinking mind, spontaneously.

May 6. Saint John ante Portam Latinam; Saint John Damascen; Saint Eadbert.—1813, Frederick Town and

George Town, two considerable villages in Maryland, were burned by the British under admiral Cockburn. Just one year after, in 1814, Fort Oswego, in this state was captured, after having maintained a gallant defence for two days, with only 300 armed men under colonel Mitchell, against 1800 British.

May 7. Saint Stanislaus, Saint Benedict II., Saint John of Beverley.

May 8. The Apparition of Saint Michael, the Archangel; Saint Peter of Tarentaise; Saint Victor; Saint Odrian; Saint Gabrian, &c. In 1801, there was a remarkable frost and snow of several inches on the eighth day of May.—1778, Sir Henry Clinton arrived at Philadelphia, and superseded Sir William Howe.

May 9. Saint Gregory Nanzianzen; Saint Hermas; Saint Nicholas. In Hone's Every-Day Book, we find under the head of the month of May, the following interesting article. "A New-York paper of the ninth of May, 1817, announces, that in Montgomery county, Mr. Jesse Johnson, being eighteen or nineteen years of age, and four feet one inch high, and weighing about seventy five pounds, was married to Miss Nancy Fowler, about twenty-six or twenty seven years of age, and weighing about two hundred and fifty pounds." Mr. Jesse Johnson, and his delicate little bride never dreamed of being so much noted in foreign climes.—1780, Pensacola and the whole province of West Florida surrendered to the arms of the king of Spain.—1812, Buonaparte set out from Paris to take command of the army against Russia.

QUESTIONS. It has been asked with some surprise, how Thurlow Weed happened to be entrusted with the order for Elisha Adams? It is a matter of wonder truly. But we see many such wonders lately. If the accounts are true, what need was there of commissioning any man to go in quest of Adams;—as he expressed a willingness to come back whenever wanted? How came the same person to be consulted respecting the appointment of a certain man to an office of high trust? How happened it that the acting governor of the state should propose to the legislature the appointment of a person to investigate the Morgan affair, while a secret mission was then in pursuit of his alleged murderers? Was that secret mission the result of any thorough investigation? If not, why should the state be put to the expense of several thousand dollars, to bring a man all the way from Arkansas, only on suspicion? Or was the investigator to be appointed in order to make all necessary inquiries about what Thurlow Weed (and he speaks advisedly too,) knew every item, months and months ago? Does not this remind one of the passage in the old song:

He deserves to be hanged without judge or jury,
And afterwards tried, for in France that's the law."

To conclude, what is to become of the investigation, if Weed's statement that the murderers have left the country, and other facts which he enumerated be true?

To the above questions we would be very much gratified to see some candid and clear answers; not that we have any objection to the course pursued by our executive. It only appears somewhat inconsistent in its parts. We hope we don't intrude. Only ask for information.

After the above had been penned, the report of Mr. Garlinghouse and his assistant came into our hands, as published in the Argus of Thursday morning. Joseph Garlinghouse and Phineas P. Bates, it will be already understood, were commissioned by the late governor, in December last, with secret letters directed to the governors of several states and territories, to the south, requesting the surrender of William King, charged with the murder, and Burrage Smith and John Whitney, charged with the abduction of William Morgan. They, accompanied by Jabez M. Mead, of Canandaigua, proceeded south to St. Louis, expecting to find Smith and Whitney; but disappointed, they went on to Little Rock, in the territory of Arkansas, where they obtained the necessary papers of governor Izard, and proceeded on to Cantonment Towson, where it was understood that King was residing. To captain R. B. Hyde, commanding officer of the cantonment, Mr. Garlinghouse applied for the necessary assistance to arrest King, and was refused. Captain Hyde did not however refuse to send a lieutenant, to direct them to King's store; but on their arrival King had disappeared. Mr. Garlinghouse attaches much blame to captain Hyde, and produces the certificate of Clark Landers, to prove that Hyde gave notice to King of his intended arrest, through the means of lieutenant Colquhoun, one of the officers of the cantonment. How far Landers' statement goes to prove the report of Messrs. Garlinghouse and Bates, may be seen by the following extracts; the two former from the report,—the latter from Landers' certificate.

"The undersigned cannot here forbear from repeating their conviction, that the information communicated to said King by said Colquhoun was derived from said Hyde, as to him alone had been intrusted the knowledge of their mission; which belief is strengthened by the statement of said Clark Landers, a man of respectable character, which statement is hereto annexed."

The first interview with captain Hyde, however, is very differently described by the two following extracts.

"Immediately upon entering said fort, the said Garlinghouse privately and alone, presented to captain R. B. Hyde, commanding officer at said cantonment, the order from the governor of the said territory—a letter from the adjutant-general, under the direction of the secretary at war, dated the 16th of November, 1827—and a letter from colonel Arbuckle, the commanding officer at Cantonment Gibson, to the commanding officer at said Cantonment Towson, dated 3d February 1828—of which letters copies are hereto attached. After the said Hyde had examined the papers, the said Garlinghouse requested him to assist in or afford assistance for the arrest of said William King, then the sutler for said station, and residing at said cantonment. With this request the said Hyde refused to comply, and would not consent either to assist in said arrest personally, or to afford assistance by others, and he also stated that in case the said King should be arrested, he would not furnish the guard necessary for the removal of said King."

Extract from the certificate of Clark Landers, dated at Cantonment Towson, Feb. 15th, 1828.

"This may certify to all whom it may concern, that I went with Mr. Joseph Garlinghouse, on the 14th day of February, 1828, to Cantonment Towson, and saw him deliver to captain R. B. Hyde the papers for the arrest of William King, and heard him request the captain to make the arrest and to furnish a guard to prevent rescue on his way out of the territory. The captain refused to make the arrest, and also refused the guard requested, and said all he would do was to send an officer with Mr. Garlinghouse to colonel King's store."

We do not pretend to excuse the conduct of captain Hyde, by disobeying the high authorities of Mr. Garlinghouse's papers; but we have some doubts whether he was not supported in his decision by the laws. We do not think it exactly upon sound legal principles, to deliver an American soldier up to the civil authority, to be conveyed in irons upwards of two thousand miles, only on suspicion of murder. The more exceptionable way in our opinion, would be for the proper authority to issue an order to the commandant of the cantonment, to put the suspected person under arrest; and to keep him thus, until he can be delivered over to the civil authority in a manner more worthy the privileges of a soldier. Such, we think will, in the event, be the decision given on this case. As it was, an innocent man would not be willing to be jolted over two thousand miles of rough road, with shackles and chains on his limbs, and a guilty one it must be expected, would have made himself scarce as soon as possible. There is nothing very wonderful in the whole of it; though it will doubtless be made a part of the future presidential slang, like many things of about the same weight.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Contents of the April number of Mrs. Hale's Ladies' Magazine.—Novels and Novel Reading; Sketches of American Character—No. 4, the Soldier of the Revolution; Letters from a Mother; Margery Bethel; Female Piety; the Grave of Moran; the Moon. Critical Notices.—Charlotte's Daughter; Beauties of the Waverley Novels; the Legendary. Original Poetry.—The Record on the Tree; Memory; Night; Life; To Ellen; the Full Blown Rose; Lines on a seal. The contents of this work are wholly original, and the present number indicates that the reputation of the work will be well sustained.

The Legendary, a new quarterly periodical, edited by N. P. Willis, is in press. Among the contributors to the first volume we learn that the authors of Hope Leslie, and Hobomok, Mrs. Sigourney, the Rev. J. Pierpont, G.

Mellen, and other names are to be found. The Legendary will be published in duodecimo volumes of about 300 pages each; a volume to be issued once in about three months, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per volume,—bound in boards, with cloth backs.

We have before us the first number of the new series of the New-York Medical and Physical Journal. The article on sudden deaths, in this day's Record, is extracted from it. We shall notice the work more largely in our next.

The Literary Parterre, and Ladies' Magazine, is a very neatly printed hebdomadal pamphlet published at Cincinnati, Ohio, and edited by Mrs. J. L. Dumont, formerly of Vevay, Indiana. The ladies are already entering largely into the business of editorship. We are glad to see it. We trust their influence will not be in vain, since they have the power of giving respectability to whatever useful pursuit they may engage in.

The Crystal, and Ladies' Magazine, a new monthly publication at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, has come to hand. It is a very pleasant and neatly executed pamphlet, and, as its name indicates, intended for the amusement of the ladies.

The Emerald, and Baltimore Literary Gazette, has been commenced at Baltimore, by Benjamin Edes.

The Chronicle of the Times is the title of another weekly paper lately established in New-York.

The Vermont American, is the title of a new weekly paper, established in Middlebury Vermont, by Ovid Miner. It supports the present administration of the general government.

The Duchess Intelligencer, has been commenced at Poughkeepsie, by C. F. Ames, late of the Columbia Republican. Old Duchess has her share of newspaper business we think. Four in such a county must be either a proof of the liberality of the patronage, or the capability of the printer "to live on air."

THE GREEKS. Albany has cast in her mite, and female influence has laid down a precedent, which may be successfully referred to hereafter. The number of garments completed, and sent to New-York is two thousand one hundred and sixty-six; blankets, one hundred and one; five pieces of factory, 24 doz. tape; 5 lbs. thread; 1000 needles, and other articles, such as shoes hose, &c., besides a considerable sum in cash. The articles of clothing, blankets, &c., are valued at $1500. At Rochester, the Ladies' Greek Committee acknowledge the receipt of one thousand and twenty-six garments made by the ladies of that village.

FOREIGN. The packet ship Hamilton, lately arrived at New-York, from Liverpool, brings London papers to the 24th and Liverpool to the 26th of March inclusive. The British cabinet had been officially notified that the Russian troops were about to cross the Pruth. Hostilities have again commenced between Russia and Persia, the latter having refused to ratify the late treaty. From Portugal it is ascertained that Don Miguel has completely thrown off the mask, and dissolved the legislative authority. Portugal is now reduced to its ancient arbitrary form of government. The Chambers were dissolved in order to prevent them from debating on the state of the nation. The British minister at Lisbon remonstrated sharply with the regent, and took his departure. The old queen is said to be at the bottom of the affair.

TABLE TALK.

The living of Kew and Petersham, says the Macclesfield Herald of December 29, will be given away in the course of the next month, as the recent visit of Mr. Colton was too "laconic" to secure its continuance to him; he having only slept one night on his living, instead of residing three months, as required by law.—The following dialogue happened lately between a justice of the peace and a poor Irish laborer:—Q. Pray where did you come from? A. From Drogheda, your worship. Q. And pray how do you live? A. Musha very poorly, long life to your honour. Q. I don't mean that;—how do you get your bread? A. Arrah, then, by my sowkins. I sometimes get it at the baker's, but oftener at the chandler's shop. Q. You mistake me,—I mean how do you do? A. Pretty well, I thank you, my lord; I hope your worship's much in the same way. Q. I see I'm not likely to get a direct answer; I think you are a proper person to serve his majesty. Were you ever at sea? A. Och! and do you think I went all the way from Drogheda to Liverpool in a post chaise:—A Pie Tante. A worthy vender of pies in the streets of Brighton, England, was seen a few days ago, seated on his wheel-barrow, at the top of one of the principal streets, reading a novel.—Sound Cocoa Nuts. Mr. E. Riley, of New-York, has made and sent to England two beautiful flutes from the wood of the cocoa tree.—The Devil! A lady meeting a very ugly featured man in the street, took him by the hand, and led him to a statuary's shop, and presenting him to the statuary, said,—"just like this," and departed. The astonished gentleman asked the meaning of this, and was informed by the statuary, that he had been employed by the lady to make a figure of the devil, and she had produced the gentleman for a model.

Such of our patrons who can furnish us any chronological and historical facts which might be of some interest to our Editorial Diary, will confer a favour by communicating them to us. Anecdotes of the settlement, and secular history of their respective towns or counties, and especially of our city, will be interesting; also anecdotes of the revolution and other general subjects, which can be associated with a definite date.

MR. DWYER'S READINGS, &c.—The friends of Mr. Dwyer and the public are respectfully informed, that he will give the following Readings and Recitations on Tuesday Evening, May 6, at the Mayor's Court Room, in the Capitol:

Reading—Adam and Eve's morning hymn to the Deity.—Milton.
Recitation—Hohenlinden.—Campbell.
Reading—Nathan's reproof to David.—2d Sam'l. 12th Ch.

Recitation—Lochiel's warning.—Campbell.
Reading—Description of Germanicus burying the bones of the three legions put to the sword by Arminius.—Tacitus.
Recitation—The quarrel between Marnion and Douglas.—Sir Walter Scott.

Tickets, at 50 cents each, to be had at Webster's and Skinner's, and Oliver Steele's Bookstores.—One ticket will admit a lady and gentleman. The readings, &c. to commence at half past 7 o'clock.

BOOK-BINDING.—Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market sts. Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR carries on the above business in all its branches; viz. Plain, Extra, and Super-Extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best materials and workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1-2 cents a volume. Dec. 22 471f

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public, that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North-Market and Steuben-streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots, mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1828. JOHN F. PORTER.

BRUSH, TRUNK, AND BAND-BOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 470, South Market-street—Three doors south of the Museum, Albany, keeps constantly on hand and for sale the above named articles at low prices. MILITARY STANDARD, Sign. Masonick and Fancy Painting.—JOHN LEMAN, at 392, North Market-street, Albany, has at considerable expense, collected an entirely new set of fancy grounds and letters, of various shades and patterns, by which, in addition to his determination to devote his best exertions to please, he is now enabled to execute any order in the above line, in the most elegant style, and on short notice. For evidence of his ability in the Military department, reference is had to Gen. S. Van Rensselaer. March 22— 81f

POETRY.

TO CALANTHE.

O, for some voiceless token,
Where words dare not be spoken,
And silence is unbroken
By whisper or by sigh!
If pitying love decreed it
Where bursting bosoms need it,
How gladly would I read it,
Calanthe, in thine eye!

Oh, eloquence of gazing!
Which, at the lash's raising,
Reveals two fountains blazing
Unutterable speech,—
While from the bosom rushes
Ten thousand glowing flushes,
To clothe the cheek with blushes,
The pencil dare not teach.

Mine eyes are ever turning
To meet some kindred burning,—
But cold and bitter spurning
Is all it meets from thee;
Yet if one pity reach thee,
And nature's language teach thee,
Let fall, oh, I beseech thee,
One speaking look on me!

TO MISS —.

Thou bidst me wake the harp for thee,
For thee to string the sylvan lyre,—
But, lady, that may never be—
My touch would sever every wire.

My thoughts once rose on fancy's wing,
And oft of love and joy did dream,
And bliss beyond imagining;—
Yet oh! it was a dream of gloom.

And lady,—though the dream be passed,
The fairy dream of youthful love—
This heart in friendship's mould was cast,
And ever true each pulse shall move.

And, lady, while this heart shall beat
To love or early friendship true,
Your memory there shall hold its seat—
There still shall beat a pulse for you

SONG.

O mother, tell the laird o't,
Or sairly R will grieve me, O,
That I'm to wake the ewes the night
An' Annie's to gang wi' me, O.
I'll wake my ewes my night about,
But ne'er wi' me so saucy, O;
Nor sit my lane the lee-lagg night
Wi' sic a scornfu' lassie, O.
I'll no wake, I'll no wake,
I'll no wake wi' Annie, O,
Nor sit my lane o'er night wi' ane
Sae thraward an' uncannie, O.

Dear son, be wise an' warie,
But never be womanly, O;
I've heard you tell another tale
O' young an' charming Annie, O.
The ewes ye wake are fair enough,
Upon the brae sae bonny, O;
But the laird himsel' wad gie them a'
To wake the night wi' Annie, O.
He'll no wake, &c.

I tauld ye ear', I tauld ye late,
That lassie wad trepan ye, O,
In ilka word ye boud to say,
When left your lane wi' Annie, O

Tak' my advice this night for aince,
Or beauty's tongue will ban ye, O;
An' say your feel auld mother's steel,
Ayont the mair wi' Annie, O.
He'll no wake, &c.

The night it was a summer night,
An' O the glen was laely, O,
For just as sterner's gowden ee
Peeped o'er the hill serenely, O.
The twa are in the flowery heath,
Ayont the moor sae flowy, O,
An' but as plaid atween them baith,
An' wassa that right dowy, O!
He maun wake, &c.

Neist morning at his mother's knee,
He blessed her love unfeignedly, O,
An' aye the tear fell frae his ee,
An' aye he clasped her kindly, O,
Of a' my griefs I've got amends,
Up in yon glen sae grassy, O,
A woman only woman kens;
Your skill has won my lassie, O.
I'll aye wake, I'll aye wake,
I'll aye wake wi' Annie, O,
I'll ne'er again keep wake wi' ane
Sae sweet, sae kind, an' cannie, O.

LAPLANDISH SONG.

TRANSLATED BY BOWRING.

Kulnasatz niroosam mugaoe joosau das jordoe skaolo.

Agile reindeer! make thy road
Over field and over hill;
Welcome waits upon thee still,
Near my maiden's sweet abode;
There abundant mosses grow
Underneath the beds of snow.

Speedy is the winter day,
And the wintry path is long;
Speed thee swiftly as my song;
Reindeer! let us haste away:
Here nor herds nor hounds I see,
Here the forest prowlers be.

Lo! an eagle soars on high—
Would I were that eagle now!
See you cloud that rides the sky—
Would I were upon its brow,
Watching all the world, and thee,
In thy hour of gayety.

Love, like thee, my living treasure!
Though it seem so meek and mild
Like a reindeer strong and wild,
Drags me in its sledge at pleasure—
Drags me with as rude a shock,
As the catapact o'er a rock.

Maiden! all my thoughts by day,
Near thee, o'er thee, round thee light;
Maiden! all my dreams by night—
Thousands thoughts and dreamings—Nay!
Nay!—I have no thought but one—
'Tis the thought of thee alone.

Wouldst thou leave me—wouldst thou fly?
Wouldst thou with thy reindeer go
To the deep dells, where the snow
Rears its drifted pillars high,
Midst the rocks and midst the woods,
In their gloomy solitudes?

Agile reindeer! make thy road
Over dale and over hill;
Welcome waits upon thee still
Near my maiden's sweet abode;
There abundant mosses grow
Underneath the beds of snow.

TANTALUS.

BY DR. BEDE.

I've read of a man of old,
Whose name was Tantalus,—
Who, for being a little too free and bold,
Was doom'd to be punished thus:—
And never was son or daughter

Of man so heavily curd—
To stand chin-deep in water,
Yet choke with eternal thirst.

Some say 'twas because he dared
To make free with a virgin's fame;
Or having right richly and daintily fared,
The silly fool told the name.
But we of the Hose know better—
We've nailed him up to the wall—
We've studied his fate to the letter,
And thus account for it all:

Our lives on it, this is the fact—
We've hit the wheel on the hub—
The dry souled rogue was caught in the act
Of forming a temperate club!
But Bacchus, the jolly old thumper,
Looked out from ois cob-web cell,
And resolved to give him a bumper
Of the liquor he loved so well.

So he caught the rogue by the hair
Of his head—and soured him in—
And bade him guggle and struggle there,
Till he'd wash away his sin.
But the kind hearted god relenting—
He's the only god of love—
When he saw him with tears repenting,
Left his head and his ears above.

And there to this day he remains,
As dry as a cedar post!
Just up to the chin in a million of pains,
And the liquor he loved the most.
Hence, sons of the Hose, take warning,
Remember this rule and obey:
That—"water should only be drunk in the morning,
And then—in a moderate way."

From the same.

THE WASTED FLOWER.

The storms of heaven have borne thee down;
Thy stem is broke—thy leaves are strown
In wild disorder o'er the plain,
Whence thou shalt never lift again
Thy head to catch the evening dew,
Or charm the lonely wanderer's view.

Yet, wasted flower! thy sweet perfume
Partakes not of thy fearful doom;
It lingers still around the spot
Where erst thy form the sunshine caught;
And pours its incense on the air,
When thou art desolate and bare.

Thou art a type, thou lonely flower!
Of virtue's death-surviving power—
Fit emblem of the fragrance shed
Around the truly virtuous dead—
The hallowed memory of the good,
Which from the grave's cold solitude,
Gives to the thought of parted worth,
A charm unknown to things of earth.

THE GREEN LINNET.

BY WORDSWORTH.

Upon your tuft of hazel trees,
That twinkle to the gusty breeze,
Behold him perched in ecstasies,
Yet seeming still to hover,
There! where the flutter of his wings
Upon his back and body flings
Shadows and sunny glimmerings
That cover him all over.

While thus before my eyes he gleams
A brother of the leaves he seems;
When in a moment forth he teems
His little song in gushes:
As if it pleased him to disdain
And mock the form when he did feign,
While he was dancing with the train
Of leaves among the bushes.

MASONRY AND RELIGION.

A Sermon preached before the Grand Lodge of Maryland, at the dedication of Ashler Lodge, No. 86, held at the Savage Factory, Anne Arundel county, Maryland, on the 4th day of July, 1827.

BY THE REV. C. WILLIAMS, A. M.

Grand Chaplain to the Grand Lodge and Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State of Maryland.

Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. Matthew, v. 16.

Light is a metaphor frequently made use of in scripture to signify knowledge, especially spiritual and divine knowledge: and those who teach and instruct others are said to be lights. Our Saviour is frequently denominated "the light of the world," and "the true light;" and he tells his disciples, who were to instruct the world that they "are the light of the world." The doctrine of our Saviour is likewise called a light by the apostle St. Paul in his epistle to the Corinthians, "the light of the glorious gospel of Christ." [2 Cor. iv. 4.] It is with respect to his doctrine that our Saviour in the words of the text directs his disciples to let their light shine before men. Having enumerated the beatitudes, as they are called, or those holy dispositions produced by divine grace, and which will, when duly cultivated and improved, ensure their possessors rest and peace in the life to come, he tells his disciples, in the 3d verse preceding the text, "ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost its savour wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men;"* that is "ye are appointed by that pure and holy doctrine, which you are to preach, and by the savour of your good conversation, to purge the world from that corruption in which it lies, and represent them to God as 'a sacrifice of a sweet smelling savour, holy and acceptable to God;' but if you yourselves should lose the savour of your good conversation, and become putrefied members in my body, you would be wholly useless to these good ends; and therefore can expect nothing but to be rejected by me, and cast off as unsavoury salt is cast into the dunghill."† Again, in the 2d verse preceding the text, our Saviour emphatically tells his disciples, "ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid." The import of this metaphor is this: "I have appointed you to manifest to the world my doctrine, which will discover to them what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, and so direct their feet into the way that leadeth to eternal life, and will enable them to walk as children of the light; and if you do not hide this light from them, but cause it to shine forth both in your doctrine and christian conversation, the light of it is so clear and radiant, that it cannot be hid from them." Our blessed Lord then sums up the whole of the exhortation to his disciples in the words of our text, which being understood in connexion with the preceding verses just explained, may be thus paraphrased.

* As Christ had not yet put his church in form, or commissioned his disciples to any particular offices in it, we cannot therefore suppose these words any more than those of the text, are to be applied only to the apostles, but rather to the whole body of believers, unto whom he was then preaching; but as these metaphorical expressions seem to point directly to the ministry of the apostles, when they should be in commission, we may reasonably conclude, that Christ had chiefly a regard to his apostles in those expressions, since he can hardly be supposed, with any propriety of speech, to call the whole body of his disciples "the salt of the earth," and "the light of the world," equally with his chosen apostles.

So therefore "let" this "your light shine before men, that they may," from your conversation, as well as from your doctrine, "see your good works, and" then they will see cause to "glorify your Father which is in heaven." Let the truth of that grace and faith which you have now received, and with which you are enlightened, not be obscured by the works of darkness, or by the interference of worldly affections; but let it be so clear, so manifest, so perspicuous and apparent in your lives and conversation unto all men, "that they may see your good works:" that is, that all may see clearly how far you excel others in the performance of all your duties both to God and man.

The words of the text and their metaphorical meaning thus explained; we shall proceed to the consideration of some particulars which may be expected to be noticed by us on the present interesting and solemn occasion; and endeavour, from the words of our text, to enforce those duties which, as a collective body as well as individuals, we are by the nature of our order bound to manifest to the world, both in our public and private deportment. And with this object in view, we propose to consider,

FIRST. The nature, end, and design, of that order of which we are members. And then,

SECONDLY. Shall point out the additional obligations we are under to let our light so shine before men, in that meridian splendour, as shall be sufficient to stop the gainsayings of the ignorant and malicious, when they shall behold our good works, and cause them to give glory to the great Father of Light, for having upheld to the present day, an institution calculated to do so much good in the world. And

FIRST. Of the nature, end, and design of the order. Upon this subject it would hardly have appeared necessary to dilate, but that the ignorance of some, and the malice and prejudice of others not connected with the institution, would seem to suggest, that the present occasion was a very fit one, to endeavour to disprove those injurious aspersions so wantonly and ignorantly vented at us, by those who, not devoid of candour in other respects, join inconsiderately in the cry against masonry, without reflecting on its claims, at least to respect, if not to praise and veneration.

It will not at this time be expected from us that we should enter into any discussion relative either to the antiquity or the origin of our order; the necessary contracted limits of our discourse would not admit of it; for that single subject, even to take but a very brief view of it, would occupy a portion of time far beyond what is usually permitted to be spent in discussions like the present; we shall content ourselves, therefore, with observing, that the masonick fraternity have abundant satisfactory testimony accessible to every unprejudiced and inquiring mind, sufficient to convince the most disingenuous, that masonry has existed for a period of upwards of three thousand years; that its grand object at its first institution, was the inculcating the doctrine of the worship of the one true God, in opposition to the then prevailing vulgar polytheism, and the practice of the most exalted moral virtue; as also the encouragement and dissemination among mankind of the knowledge of the liberal arts and sciences.*

* Each of the Pagan gods, says Bishop Warburton, besides the public and open, had a secret worship paid them; into which none were admitted but those who had been selected by preparatory ceremonies called initiation. This secret worship was called the mysteries. The first and original mysteries of which we have any account, were those of Isis and Osiris in Egypt; from whence they were derived to the Greeks,

The great end and design of masonry is to make men virtuous and happy, by the inculcation of moral precepts, enforced by the most engaging considerations that can be presented to the human mind. The medium of instruction used by our ancient brethren, and still preserved pure and unimpaired, was by visible symbols, in which precepts of morality were curiously enfolded, and veiled from common observation. The same system of instruction was practised by the Jews, under the Patriarchal as well as under the Mosaic dispensation. The prophecies were frequently delivered symbolically. Thus the holy land is termed God's vineyard, by Isaiah and other prophets. The hiding of Jeremiah's girdle implied the destruction of idolaters, [Jeremiah, xiii.] as the breaking of a bottle did that of Jerusalem in general. [Jeremiah xix.] Ezekiel portrayed the filthiness of the Jews by the scum of a boiling pot; [Ezekiel, xxiv.] and the union of Judah and Israel by joining together two sticks. [Ezekiel, xxxvii.] The series of prophecies uttered by Daniel, comprehending every material transaction which should take place in the world to the end of time, are all delivered in the same manner; and the Founder of Christianity explained to his disciples the mysteries shadowed beneath his symbols, but he spake unto the rest of the world in parables, which, without embracing his faith, they were unable to understand. [Mark, iv. 11.]

To fill the mind with images which may present themselves in every transaction of life, which, if evil, may call loudly upon the conscience to shun the danger, is surely a medium not to be despised, particularly when recommended by such high and unequivocal sanctions. When engaged in sinful practices, if any object appear in which is wrapped up a familiar precept, indicating the punishment of sin, how insignificant soever that object may appear to an eye unenlightened by the rays which burn around it; if it rouse the sinner to a sense of his duty, and cause him to abandon his evil pursuits, it has performed a service over which angels shall rejoice, though fastidious mortals may ridicule such a medium, and pronounce it trifling and absurd. The uninitiated may urge the absurdity of squares and compasses, mallets and chisels, because being mere instruments of labour, they do not present immediately to the mind any visible tendency to the cultivation of moral virtue. But were the useful lessons they contain openly displayed and fully comprehended, masonry would no longer be an object of ridicule or aspersions, but would occupy the first rank among those human sciences which confessedly promote the benefit of mankind. From the chequered groundwork of a mason's lodge to its splendid and celestial covering, it contains no point, part, or secret which does not convey a fund of valuable information. The mason under the presidency of various gods, such as the institutor thought most suitable to his purpose. In process of time these mysteries were disseminated through the northern and western nations.

The learned prelate then observes, that the nature and end of all these mysteries were the same, viz: to teach the doctrine of a future state. He represents the design of them in general to have been, to engage men to a holy and virtuous practice, to give them just notions of religion, and to detect the errors of the vulgar polytheism. And he concludes his account of the mysteries with observing, that there were three things about which they were principally concerned: viz: 1. The rise and establishment of civil society. 2. The doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments. 3. The error of polytheism, or the principle of the unity. Which latter was the object of the greater mysteries, in which the whole delusion of paganism was disclosed, and the initiated were instructed, that Jupiter, Mercury, Venus, Mars, and the whole rabble of licentious deities, are only deified mortals; and that God alone was the creator of the universe, who pervaded all things by his virtue, and governed all by his providence; whereas in the lower mysteries, which were preparatory to the other, the general belief of a providence and a future state, and its consequent engagements to a virtuous life, were inculcated. Dr. Warburton's Div. Leg.

in his full clothing is a striking emblem of integrity and perfect a model of wisdom, strength, and beauty. The white apron, gloves, and wand, which are characteristic of his profession, have a direct reference to the innocence and purity with which he ought to be invested, by an adherence to the invaluable lessons which they contain. In all ages, and amongst all people, white robes have been assumed as characteristic of innocence and purity. Such were the robes worn by the priests of Egypt and Greece, the Druids of Gaul and Britain, the Bramins of India, the Gymnosophists of Persia, &c.; and in such garments, under the christian dispensation, were the catechumens habited after baptism, to express the purity they had obtained through the performance of that initiatory rite.

The universal extent of a lodge, referring to the unlimited obligation of Masonry, is well expressed by Zophar in his address to Job: "It is as high as heaven, deeper than hell; the measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea." [Job xi. 9, 10.] It stands due east and west, that its governours may behold the rising and the setting of the sun, with sentiments of devotion and gratitude to Him who appointed that luminary as a blessing to his creatures. Its peculiar situation is in the vale of Jehosaphat. The highest of hills or the lowest of valleys was, in ancient times, accounted most sacred. Thus tradition placed the peculiar residence of God on the summit of Mount Horeb; and Ezekiel declares that "on the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round shall be most holy." [Ezek. xliii. 12.]

The Bible, Square, and Compass, point out the sacred source of his faith, and the rectitude of his practice: for while the former, which is always open in the lodge, is considered the rule and standard of his faith and hope, the two latter have the same reference to his life and actions. The bible is the sacred compact between God and man; for in that holy book the divine will in essentials is so clearly revealed that he who runs may read; and the way of salvation is so explicitly pointed out, that the sojourner shall not err therein. The compass is appropriated to the Grand Master, as the supreme governour of the institution, because it is the most comprehensive and useful instrument in forming plans and designs, which belong exclusively to his province; for on the art and judgement with which he applies this instrument depend the general beauty and harmony of the whole. The square belongs to the brethren in general, because their obligations are founded upon, and they are consequently bound to square their actions by the principles of virtue and right reason. From these visible symbols masonry teaches, in its beautiful and expressive phraseology, to keep within compass, and act upon the square with all mankind, but more particularly with brethren.—And this is consistent with the teaching of christianity. St. Paul has interpreted this precept in his truly masonick address to the Galatians: "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." [Gal. vi. 12.]

The Jewels, both moveable and immovable, have a significant reference to what is most dear and valuable to man in this mortal state; exposed, as he is, to sorrow, sickness, pain, and adversity. The square is an instrument by which truth and perfection are attained in all manner of architecture; and consequently recommends morality and justice in all our commerce with mankind. The level is an emblem of equality, and demonstrates, that as we are descended from the same stock, partake of the same nature, and share the same hope, we ought strictly to render unto others the same measure of kindness and affection which, in similar circumstances, we should require of them. The plumb is an emblem of integrity, and admonishes to walk uprightly in our station; to hold the scale of justice in equal poise; to observe the happy medium between intemperance and rigid self-denial; and to make our passions and prejudices coincide with the straight line of duty. The tracing board refers to the correct plans and designs traced by the great Architect of the universe in the holy bible, which constitute the summit and perfection of a mason's faith and hope. We have also other emblematical jewels, to denote the mind of man in its progress from infancy to old age, from ignorance to knowledge. In the dawn of life, uncultivated nature feels its own inferiority, and is like a rough and shapeless stone newly taken from the quarry, which requires the skillful hand of patient industry to mould it into form. Manhood succeeds, and the ripening faculties, emulating perfection, press on with diligence and assiduity, to the great object of rational attainment. And when old age comes on, the placid mind, reflecting on a well spent life, devoted to acts of piety and virtue, looks forward to another and a better state of existence, where infinitely perfect, it will be filled with the fulness of God. This state of mind may be aptly compared to a well wrought and highly polished cubical stone, accurately exact in all its lines and angles; which, though minutely tried with the square and compass, will be pronounced good, perfect, and complete.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

THE UVULARIA GRANDIFLORA.

Read before the Albany Institute, February 23, 1828, by J. G. Tracy, esq. of Albany.

It has long been known that the Indians made use of a vegetable remedy for the bite of the rattlesnake; but there appears to have been much uncertainty respecting the plant which they resorted to for this purpose, and I believe that no description of it has yet been published by which it can be distinguished.

At the time the boundary-line Commissioners were engaged in the surveys made of the islands near the head of Lake Erie, in the month of August 1820, one of the men in their employ was bitten by a rattlesnake, and Hank Johnson, a hunter attending on the party, was applied to for assistance. This person is a white, whose parentage is unknown. When a child, during the revolutionary war, he was captured by the Seneca Indians in the western part of Pennsylvania, and has since that time remained among them, adopted by the nation, to whom his habits, dress, and appearance entirely conform, and he is now one of the chiefs of that part of the Senecas who reside on the Cattaraugus Creek. In the late war, he attached himself to the forces under the command of General Porter, on the Niagara frontier, and particularly distinguished himself at the battle of Chippewa, and at the sortie from Fort Erie, by his courage, strength, and fidelity: and in the former action, probably saved the life of Major Fraser, who being wounded, was carried by him on his back to a place of safety.

He immediately collected some plants, and gave to his patient a decoction of the roots and leaves; and after chewing, they were also bound upon the wound. No other remedy was administered, and the man recovered.

Soon after this a dog, belonging to one of the party, was bitten by a rattlesnake severely in the head and tongue. Hank was absent at the time, and before his return, some hours after, the animal was excessively swollen, and apparently near dying. The same remedy was then applied, by pouring a decoction of the plant down his throat, and binding the roots and leaves on the wounds, and the dog very rapidly recovered.

On hearing these circumstances related by General Porter, W. A. Bird, esq. and Major Fraser, and the plant minutely described by them, I had little doubt that it was the Uvularia grandiflora, and collected some specimens of that plant which those gentlemen examined, and all of them pronounced it to be the same plant which had been so successfully used under their observation. Its identity was afterwards still further established by a specimen which it was found General Porter had preserved at the time the cures were performed.

Those persons who are generally acquainted with the plants which are found in the northern states, will agree with me in opinion, that no person of ordinary observation could mistake the perfoliate uvularias for any other plant; and the height of this being described as two feet, determines it to be the U. grandiflora, which alone of the perfoliate uvularias reaches that height.

I therefore think that the concurring opinions of the gentlemen whom I have named, is conclusive proof that the plant I submitted to their examination must be the same with that which was made use of by Hank, and which is the a plant familiar to every botanist, and very generally diffused.

I am aware that the bite of a rattlesnake is not always fatal, even if the wound is entirely neglected, but there is every reason to believe that the usual remedy was resorted to on this occasion; and at a season of the year when the bite of a rattlesnake is known to be peculiarly dangerous, it is hardly possible that the man and dog could have both recovered without some powerful aid.

DESCRIPTION.—Uvularia, corolla inferior, 6-petalled, erect; claws of the petals each furnished with a nectiferous cavity. Filaments, very short, growing to the anthers; stigmata reflected, capsulo 3-angled, 3-celled, 3-valved, valves septiferous in the middle; seeds many, subglobose, arillate at the hilum.—Nuttall's Gen.

U. grandiflora, leaves perfoliate, oblong acute, petals smooth within; anthers somewhat obtuse; nectaries roundish.—Smith Ex. Bot.

U. perfoliata major.—Michaux Fl.

U. lanceolata.—Willd. Sp. pl.

Hab.—Shady hills, in fertile soil, among rocks: from Canada to Carolina.

It has a general resemblance to Solomon's seal: leaves alternate, smooth and perforated by the stem, which is forked near the top: bearing one, rarely two, drooping liliaceous yellow flowers early in May.

CALCULATION SIMPLIFIED.

The following account of a singular and important arithmetical invention, is copied from the Edinburgh Scotsman of February 27th:—

Professor Wallace has invented a very ingenious process, by which the product of any two numbers, however large, can be obtained and written down in a single line, without the usual labour of exhibiting the product of the multiplicand by each figure of the multiplier separately, and then adding to whole together. But what is still more remarkable, the operation could even be performed with accuracy by a person ignorant of the multiplication table. Without the help of a diagram, we could not explain the process in a satisfactory manner; but we may state generally, that the figures are arranged in a different mode from that commonly used, and that the products of the individual figures of the two numbers are obtained and summed by means of a very simple instrument. We saw two numbers of six figures each, multiplied together, and the product obtained with perfect correctness. On the same day a gentleman, eminent for his skill in calculation, brought the utility of the process to the proof, by trying it upon the following numbers, 2783640619, and 5046973056. The product 14049358691935833008, was obtained without one mistake, and in less time than was necessary to verify the result in the common way, though this was only the second trial made of the instrument. Men of science will easily appreciate the value of an invention like this. In the common transactions of business, where heavy calculations occur only incidentally and rarely, its aid may be dispensed with; but to the mathematician in many cases, and especially in the compiling of tables, it will evidently be of the greatest importance. First, it saves that species of labour which is in every case mere drudgery, and is extremely oppressive to a mind capable of better things; and secondly, by reducing a mental to a mechanical process, it ensures far greater accuracy, and enables the calculator to delegate a part of his duty to others with confidence, and to check the results with facility.

There are few inventions, however, the entire value of which is seen at first; and we have little doubts that experience will point out many new and important applications of the process in question; of which at present we have no idea.

MIGRATION OF BUTTERFLIES.

From the January (1838) number of the Paris Journal des Connaissances Usuelles et Pratiques.

We are surprised that birds should cross seas and travel immense distances in the air, without stopping to rest; and, indeed, it is difficult to understand how the muscular strength of those little animals can sustain an exertion so prolonged and incessant. But it is perhaps, still more astonishing, to find so feeble an insect as the butterfly transporting itself on its wings to the greatest distances. We ourselves have witnessed the fact. On a voyage which we made along the coast of Italy, there came, when we were about thirty miles from the gulph of Salerno, a butterfly (of the species Papilio Brassica Fab.) which perched upon the mast of our vessel, and, after remaining there five or six seconds, resumed its flight towards the shore.

It appears, from an account given by M. P. Hubert, in the Bibliothèque Universelle, of August, 1826, that some kinds of butterflies do, in effect, migrate like birds. It is not probable, however, that they continue equally long on the wing without repose. Many credible witnesses relate, that on the 10th of June, in the canton of Vaud, in Switzerland, they saw an immense flock of butterflies passing over a garden. They were all of that kind (Papilion belle dame), which feeds chiefly upon the thistle. The direction of their flight was from south to north; from which the presence of men, though very near them, did not make them deviate.

They occupied more than two hours in passing over the place. The column was ten or fifteen feet wide, and its extremities reached out of sight. The butterflies did not alight upon the flowers, nor linger about them; but kept on their course, near the ground, at a rapid and uniform rate. What is not less surprising, this same species of butterfly was seen in Piedmont towards the close of March in the same year. It is true that they tarried, here and there, in the countries over which they passed; but always advanced from south to north. It is likely that these insects, after living on the early flowers of the south, while they last, emigrate to colder regions, to find the same plants, less precocious, still in the blossom. The want of more abundant or agreeable food, or the desire of a climate more congenial to his nature, produces in the butterfly that instinct or inclination that leads it from one region to another.

THE GATHERER.

SUMMER AND WINTER.

At Guildhall, London, on Friday week, a Mr. David David appeared upon summons to answer the complaint of his wife, Mrs. Jane David, who gave the following succinct synopsis of her case. "Your Warship, this old chap is my husband, and, though he doesn't half maintain me, he larrups me once a week rig'lar."

Mr. David David laid down his hat to reply. "Your Honour," said he, "I'm an old soldier, and I'll tell you no lie. I do towel her sometimes, but not half so often as she deserves it. Look at me, your honour, and look at her, I'm eighty-two, and she's a stout young woman of thirty-one! and yet she never did a day's work since I had her—though my whole dependence is a small pension of fourteen shillings a week, from the Royal Hospital at Chelsea. I went abroad with General Howe, in the year seventy-six, and I served my country, in one corps or another, for forty-two years; but I never saw more hard service in all that time than I have undergone since I gave this woman the privilege of calling me husband—and that's only two years and a half ago!"

The Alderman reminded the old soldier that he had taken a wife "for better or for worse," and however, hard he might find the matrimonial service, it was his duty not to lynch from it until he should be regularly discharged; and, above all, it was very unsoldier like to strike a woman.

"Aye, it's fine talking, your honour," rejoined the ungallant veteran; "the fact is, her red rag wags so fast and so sharp, that mortal man can't bear it—it's a desperate sight sharper than ever General Buonaparte's sword was. Talk of not striking a woman, indeed! what's a body to do with them when they're always wagging that little red rag of their's so sharp and quick that it cuts a man up root and branch—heart and character, all to tatters twenty times a day!"

Mrs. David, however, declared that she never used her tongue without good cause, and said she would endeavour to use it more gently in future, if her husband would but do his duty by her, and keep his hands to himself.

Finally the old man agreed to try her once more, and do the best he could for her; adding—"There's one consolation for me yet—I hope to get into Chelsea College soon, and there, thank God, no woman is ever admitted!" [English paper.]

DR. BARCLAY.

The late Dr. Barclay was a wit and a scholar, as well as a very great physiologist. When a happy illustration, or even a point of pretty broad humour, occurred to his mind, he hesitated not to apply it to the subject in hand; and in this way, he frequently roused and rivetted attention, when more abstract reasoning might have failed of its aim. On one occasion he happened to dine with a large party, composed chiefly of medical men. As the wine cup circulated, the conversation accidentally took a professional turn, and from the excitement of the moment, or some other cause, two of the youngest individuals present were the most forward in delivering their opinions. Sir James McIntosh once told a political opponent, that so far from following his example of using hard words and soft arguments, he would pass, if possible, into the opposite extreme, and use soft words and hard arguments. But our unfledged M. D.'s disregarded the above salutary maxim, and made up in loudness what they wanted in learning. At length, one of them said something so emphatic—we mean as to manner—that a pointer dog started from his lair beneath the table and bow-wow-wowed so fiercely, that he fairly took the lead in the discussion. Dr. Barclay eyed the hairy dialectician, and thinking it high time to close the debate, gave the animal a hearty push with his foot, and exclaimed in broad Scotch—"Lie still, ye brute; for I am sure ye ken just as little about it as any o'them." We need hardly add, that this sally was followed by a hearty burst of laughter, in which even the disputants good-humouredly joined.

QUACKS.

We are not without plenty of ignorant and impudent pretenders at the present day; but the celebrated Mrs. Mapp, the bone-setter of Epsom, surpasses them all. She was the daughter of a man named Wallis, a bone-setter at Hindon, in Wiltshire, and sister to the celebrated "Polly Peachem," who married the Duke of Bolton. Upon some family quarrel, Sally Wallis left her professional parent, and wandered up and down the country in a miserable manner, calling herself "Crazy Sally," and pursuing, in her perambulations, a course that fairly justified the title. Arriving at last at Epsom, she succeeded in humbugging the worthy bumpkins of that place, so decidedly, that a subscription was set on foot to keep her among them; but her fame extending to the metropolis, the dupes of London, a numerous class then as well as now, thought it no trouble to go ten miles to see the conjurer, till at length, she was pleased to bless the afflicted of London with her presence, and once a week drove to the Grecian Coffee-house, in a coach and six with out-riders! and all the appearance of nobility. It was in one of these journeys, passing through Kent-street, in the Borough, that being taken for a certain woman of quality from the Electorate in Germany, a great mob followed, and bestowed on her many bitter reproaches, till madame, perceiving some mistake, looked out of the window, and accosted them in this gentle manner, "D—n your bloods, don't you know me? I am Mrs. Mapp, the bone-setter!" Upon which, they instantly changed their revilings into loud huzzas.

CAPPS, THE MAN OF THE GOLD MINE.

The owner of the land on which the most productive gold mine in North Carolina is situated, was, prior to the discovery of the mine, a poor man—one of the poorest among the poor cultivators of the poorest soil in Carolina. He had enough to do to provide the necessaries of life for himself and family; and he considered himself rich when he had enough to eat. The discovery of the gold mine, however, altered the state of things; before he was a rich poor man (for he was contented,) and afterwards he was a poor rich man. The mine suddenly filled the old man's pockets with gold; and as suddenly, extravagance and dissipation, with their formidable attendants, took possession of the house, and kicked Economy and sober Temperance out at the back door. The sequel may well be imagined—while others were pocketing his gold, he killed himself with liquor, and was buried in his gold mine. Nature seems to have formed her creatures with capacities proper for their allotted spheres, and if by chance any of them happen to stray into those for which they are not fitted, they are apt to act the monkey in a china shop. There are exceptions, it is true, and some seem capable, like the comet of ranging the universe, but they are comets in human nature. Probably no burthen would so certainly crush a man whose back is not fitted to bear it, as a bag of gold—the history of Capps, the man of the gold mine, above noticed, is an illustration of this remark. POPULAR SUPERSTITION.

It is popularly believed in Ireland, and possibly in other countries, that when a friend or a relative dies, a warning voice is heard, and the greater the space between the parties the more certain the sound. The following is a translation of an Irish song, which in the original, is sung to a singularly wild and melancholy air.

A low sound of song from the distance I hear,
In the silence of night, breathing sad on my ear!
Whence comes it? I know not—uneasily the note,
And unearthly the tones through the air as they float;
Yet it sounds like the lay that my mother once sung,
As o'er her first born in his cradle she hung.

Long parted from her, far away from her home,
With people that speak not her language, I roam;
Is it she that sends over the billowy sea
This low breathing murmur of sadness to me?
What gives it the power thus to shake me with dread?
Does it say, that sad voice, that my mother is dead?

PATHETICK ANECDOTE.

Among our recent readings, we have not found a more pathetick anecdote—and all parents will approve this assertion—than one related by the late Bishop Heber, the circumstances of which occurred during his journey through the upper provinces of his Indian diocese. One of his boatmen was in the habit of consecrating a certain hour of the day to the memory of a beloved son, who had died some years before. His mode of testifying those feelings common to all fathers, was singularly tender and affecting. His boy had been accustomed to feed the birds with rice, regularly at sunset: and the bereaved father uniformly appropriated at that hour, a certain portion of his allowance to the birds that hovered above him—saying, "it is not I, but my child, that feeds you."

MASTER M'GOING'S MAXIMS.

A man's gait is like the degrees of longitude—wide at the meridian of life, contracted at the poles.

Political honours are like the tattooing of the South Sea Islanders, inflicted without mercy, and worn without merit—producing agony and envy, and making their possessors at the same time wretched and ridiculous.

POPULAR TALES.

MARGERY BETHEL.

From Mrs. Hale's Ladies' Magazine.

Margery Bethel was an inhabitant of Danvers, Mass. It is not certain that she was a native of that town, nor is the year of her birth accurately known; but in 1719, she bore such evident marks of age, that she became distinguished by the appellation peculiar to unmarried females who have passed a certain period—she was called an old maid. Such antiquated belles were much more rare in the Colonies, than Independent America—a confirmation, if any were needed, of the estimation in which liberty is held, as well by the ladies, as the gentlemen, of our country. Surely no gentleman will be so uncivil as to suggest that it is from necessity alone, a lady retains her freedom! Certainly that could not, with truth, have been said of Margery Bethel. She had been a famous beauty;—had had several admirers, and, it was conjectured, was once engaged to be married. But her lover, as lovers have often done since the example of Phaon, proved a recreant. The disconsolate fair-one did not possess the genius or indulge the despair of the Lesbian maid: Margery neither rhymed nor raved, nor made any attempt to drown herself. She acted a much more common, and, indeed, more feminine part. She became sad, thin, and taciturn; and finally, as her beauty waned, she seemed to resign herself uncomplainingly, to neglect and celibacy. No one could conduct more inoffensively, and but for one circumstance, her life would have passed without notice, and this biographical sketch never have appeared. It is astonishing what trifling incidents often confer notoriety, and sometimes what is called immortality, on a person. A well spent, peaceful life, has no claim to such distinction. Something singular must be said, or suffered, or designed, or done, and it matters nothing whether that something be for good or for evil. He who burns a temple is as long and as well remembered as he who builds one. What, then, is the worth of fame? Nothing, when considered merely as the distinction of having one's name widely known and often repeated. Fame is only valuable, and to be coveted when it brings to the mind of the possessor while living, a consciousness of desert; and when he is dead, exhibits a pattern worthy to be imitated!

But to proceed with Margery Bethel. She grew old, and she faded, as every fair girl will do, (beauty is only a rose, a rainbow, a meteor—gone while we are gazing and praising,) till finally she was called ugly. The once fair Margery Bethel was called very ugly,—and that too by young maidens who did not possess half the loveliness she exhibited at eighteen. But add two score to eighteen, and what female can command attention by her beauty? Woman must possess some more lasting charm than is imparted by a "set of features, or complexion," or her reign will be brief as April sunshine—as May flowers.

But there is another evil to which women are subjected. It is to have cultivated minds, and yet be confined to a society that does not understand, and cannot appreciate their talents and intelligence. This frequently occurs. And women have so little power of varying their situation, of extending their acquaintance, that she who has taste and genius ought to think herself peculiarly fortunate if she is placed where her gifts do not subject her to envy and ill treatment; but if she enjoys a refined and congenial domestic circle, she should never breathe a wish for a wider sphere of display.

Had poor Margery Bethel possessed the wit and literature of Madame de Staël, or Miss Edgeworth, it would have added nothing to her popularity in the neighbourhood in which she resided. There nothing was appreciated but good housewifery, a good visit, and a good talker—and unluckily Margery did not like to talk, nor to visit; and as she lived alone, and never received company, no one knew much about her management. But the less they knew, the more they guessed; till finally, as she grew older and more reserved, they first called her odd—then cross—then strange—and then a witch!

It is now matter of astonishment that any rational and Christian being should ever have believed that people would sell themselves to their grand enemy on the condition of merely having power to worry their neighbours and ride through the air on a broomstick. Yet such was the firm faith of our ancestors, pious as they unquestionably were—and it seemed that, in those days, learning only made them more credulous. Cotton Mather is a melancholy proof that neither erudition, or piety, can free the human mind from prejudice and superstition. Undoubtedly nothing has so much contributed to enlighten men as the strivings for personal liberty, which have been made during the last fifty years, and the study of experimental philosophy.

But with this philosophy, the neighbours of old Margery, as she was then usually called, had nothing to do—theory was all they required, and by their hypothesis, it was very easy to prove Margery a witch. In the first place she resided in a poor old lonely house, and alone; and then she kept a large black cat, that she had been frequently seen to caress; and lastly, she had, by those who ventured to visit her dwelling, been several times heard to talk as they drew nigh her door, and yet when they entered, no one but herself was visible. These were dark and mysterious proceedings, and the more they were canvassed, the more wonderful and appalling they became.

Not an individual thought of vindicating poor Margery, by suggesting that her old lonely dwelling was the one in which her parents had resided, and which, at their decease, she inherited—that she was, of necessity, constrained to dwell alone, having no relative or friend on earth, to reside with her—that the heart must love something, and she had no living thing but her cat to love,—and lastly, that she must talk to herself or run the risk of losing the use of her tongue, as nobody seemed willing to hold much converse with the suspected witch. Probably these reasons never occurred to the good people of Danvers; if they did, they were never mentioned,—all seemed unanimously of opinion, that there were such strong circumstances as warranted the accusation of unhallowed crime committed, or to be committed, by old Margery Bethel. It was fortunate for her, that the darkest period of delusion had passed. The bitter regret for the scenes which had been enacted under the influence of the Rev. Matthew Paris, checked the effervescence of zeal to accuse and punish, and the people practised the more humane method of accusing in order to reclaim. The case of Margery made a great bustle. Her supposed compact with the spirit of evil, was regretted, or condemned, sighed over, or inveighed against, till it was finally the opinion of all, that something must be done. Either she must confess, and abandon her wicked ways, or be dealt with, and dismissed from the church, of which she was then a member. The minister, the two deacons, and two of the most influential and pious men belonging to the church, were chosen to visit her, at her dwelling, and propound certain questions; and from her answers, it was concluded, the full proof of her guilt, which no one doubted, would be obtained. It was near the close of a gloomy November day, that the formidable deputation proceeded towards the house of Margery. She was totally ignorant of the honour intended her, as it had been judged expedient to take her by surprise; as the most likely method of eliciting truth from one whose study was to deceive. Her house did, indeed, stand in a lonely place, and to reach it, you had to pass half a mile through a thick wood. The gentlemen had been delayed longer than they intended, settling preliminaries, and night was gathering as they entered the shaded path. The trees increased the darkness, and the wind, which had all day been very high, seemed to gather furious strength as it swept over the decaying forest, and scattered its leaves by thousands. It is not strange that those men should imagine the wind was uncommonly furious, and that darkness came on with unusual rapidity. They did think so; and when emerging from the wood, they came suddenly upon the house they sought, not one of the five but wished himself five miles off. But honour and conscience alike forbade their retreat. The abode of witchcraft was before them, and a whole community were eagerly awaiting their report. On, therefore, they proceeded; the minister, as in duty bound, some steps in advance. As he softly and silently drew near the door, he heard a sound within. He paused, then motioned the party to advance, and they all cautiously crept forward, and all distinctly heard the same noise. It was not like mortal conversation; it was a low, but continued, and monotonous sound, such as none of them ever recollected before to have heard. They all trembled. At length, as it did not cease, and as there was no window on the side they stood, through which to reconnoitre, the party was obliged to enter, in order to discover the cause of their alarm. The minister laid his hand on the latch—the boldest deacon stood near to support him. They opened the door with the swiftness of lightning, and stood before the astonished eyes of Margery. She showed surprise at their sudden appearance, but no dismay. Why should she! She was at the moment reading that consoling promise of the Saviour,—“Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted.”

The minister was a pious, and usually a very sensible man. Neither did he wish to increase his influence over his people, by encouraging their superstitious fears. The whole transactions of former years rushed at once upon his mind, and it seemed as if a sudden light was imparted. He became instantly sensible that the circumstances against Margery were the offsprings of imagination; he was convinced of her innocence, and before leaving her house he had the satisfaction of knowing the whole party were of his opinion—namely, that Margery Bethel was not only not a witch, but a very good and humble christian. It was sometime, however, before the prejudice against her entirely subsided; a prejudice that but for the spirited exertions of one rational, as well as religious man, would have brought her to ignominy, if not to her grave.

Such is the force of credulity, and the propensity to scandal.

MISCELLANY.

DELPINI, THE CLOWN OF COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

From Clubs in London.

Many anecdotes are told of this celebrated master of posture and grimace, but none exhibit his eccentricity and selfishness (a combination by the bye, generally found in the character of too many foreign artistes of the theatre and opera) in a more ludicrous point of view than the following, which was one evening related at Brookes's by Mr. Sheridan, when the Prince and Duke of York, who knew Delpini well, were present.

It should be premised, that several members of the Royal Family, and particularly the Prince of Wales, had pressed Sheridan to procure the insertion of Delpini's name in the books of the Theatrical Fund, in order to secure a provision for his old age. Mr. Sheridan did all in his power to promote the object in question; but one grand difficulty was started in the course of the negotiation, which even his influence could not well remove:—this was, that as Mr. Delpini was merely a clown, he could not be admitted; for, the laws of the society forbade relief to any but such as were accustomed to speak on the stage. A remedy, however, was at length suggested, viz: that a few words should be written in the forthcoming pantomime, for Delpini to repeat; and thus he was to rank among the Garricks and Kembles of the day.

The words in question were only three in number; and they were to be uttered by Delpini in the character of a magician, at the instant that Harlequin and Columbine were in the act of embracing: they were—“Pluck them asunder!”

Big with the expectation of his pension, but more so with the importance of his new character, Delpini repeated the above short sentence on every occasion, for several weeks, and with every possible variety of accent and intonation. There was not a performer in the theatre whom he did not apply to, to hear him rehearse his part; so that, at length, every one voted him a complete bore.

The gentleman whose applause he was most anxious of obtaining, was Mr. Kemble; and, whenever he met him behind the scenes, in the passages, or in the greenroom, he caught hold of him by the arm or by a button, and held him fast, until he had repeated the important words with a suitable gesture and action. One night, as Kemble was standing beside the wing, helmeted and buskined as Coriolanus, and with truncheon in hand, preparing to lead the Volsci forth to battle, Delpini made his appearance, and thus addressed the Roman hero:—

"Mistare Kemble, I am ver glad I av found you, sare: you sal see me rehearsal my part."

"Not now," answered Kemble, "it is impossible, Mr. Delpini; do you not see that I am just going on the stage?"

"But," persisted the grimacier, "I sal not detain you, sare, un moment: you sal see dat I pronounce mon caractere, proprenient; and vith the propre emphasis on de last vord."

"Well, well!" replied Kemble, pettishly; "begin, begin:—I must go on the stage directly."

"I sal not detain you, sare," returned Delpini, as he leaned on his right leg, and threw out his arm at an angle of forty-five degrees. Then, infusing into his countenance all the imitative rage which it was capable of expressing, he bellowed out, "Plock dem assondere!"

Poor Kemble, the muscles of whose face had been screwed up to the most hercick pitch, felt his risible chord so tickled by Delpini's ludicrous pronunciation and manner, that, at that instant receiving his cue of entrance, he was forced to turn his head aside from the audience, for nearly a minute, before he could address his troops without laughing.

At length, the awful, important, and ominous night arrived, when Mr. Delpini was to make his debut as a speaking actor. To those who are acquainted with the nature of what is, among theatrical people, termed stage fright, the writer need not state, that, however perfectly a young actor may be able to repeat his part by rote, in his own apartment, or at rehearsal; there is a something, when he comes before the audience, in all the blaze of dazzling light reflected upon his person, that strikes him with terror, binds up his tongue, deprives him of memory, scatters his senses, and roots him to the spot as if he were in a state of fascination: or, to speak in theatrical terms, "he is stuck fast."

Such was the case with poor Delpini: he had repeated his little part until he had almost forgotten it, for it had left no impression upon his mind; and his extreme anxiety destroyed even the little chance there was of his recollecting it in the time of need. He had spoken the words at least ten thousand times; he had repeated them sitting, standing, lying; he had rehearsed them to all sorts of persons, and on all occasions, both at home and abroad; he had given them every variety of form, accent, and emphasis, of which they were capable—but, when the hour of trial came he was found wanting.

The performers had crowded around, all anxious for his success, and all ready to prompt him; but, as Solomon says, "in the multitude of advisers the counsel faileth," so it turned out on the present occasion. Columbine had flown to her faithful lover, and locked him in her fast embrace: the magician's wand was raised aloft to command their separation; but—no words accompanied the action. Delpini was stuck fast. Voices from every side cried out, "Now, Delpini, now's your time!—fire away, my hearty!—speak, man!—why don't you speak!" But the magician was, himself, in a state of enchantment;—until the prompter's voice was heard above the rest, saying, "Pluck them asunder!" These words shot across his brain like a flash of lightning: he recovered from his trance, and repeating his action with the wand, he roared out "Massondere plock el!"

This ludicrous termination of his arduous labours made the theatre echo with laughter; both behind and before the curtain; and poor Delpini retired behind the scenes in a state of the most complete discomfiture. Being a little recovered, however, he said to several of the performers who came up to conole with him, their sides shaking with laughter, "Never mind; ladies and gentlemen: dese may laugh dat lose; I av win, and sat' laugh to myself.—I av gain de pension, by gar! and I care noting at all for nobody."

LOUIS XVI.

From Hazlitt's Life of Napoleon.

The behaviour of Louis XVI. on his trial was simple, manly, and affecting. He rested his defence chiefly upon a positive denial of any knowledge of the letters and documents that were brought as proofs against him. His advocates on this occasion, Malesherbes (who nobly volunteered this service on the refusal of Target,) Tronchet, and Deseze, did themselves great and lasting honour by their eloquence, intrepidity, and disinterested zeal. The Convention pronounced his condemnation by a majority of only twenty-six voices out of above seven hundred. The smallness of this majority was made a plea to set aside the sentence. "Decrees are passed by a simple majority," said a member of the Mountain. "True," it was replied, "but decrees may be recalled, whereas the life of a man can not be recalled. Some were for relieving themselves from the responsibility by an appeal to the nation, but this, it was thought, would betray a distrust of the cause; and might also breed a civil war. The sitting of the Convention which concluded the trial, lasted seventy-two hours. It might naturally be supposed that silence, restraint, and a sort of religious awe would have pervaded the scene; on the contrary, every thing bore the marks of gayety, dissipation, and the most grotesque confusion.

The farther end of the hall was converted into boxes, where ladies in a studied dishabille, swallowed ices, oranges, liqueurs, and received the salutations of the members, who went and came as on ordinary occasions. Here the door-keepers on the Mountain side opened and shut the boxes reserved for the mistresses of the Duke of Orleans-Egalite; and here, though every sign of approbation or disapprobation was strictly forbidden you heard the long and indignant "Ha, ha's!" of the mother dutchess, the patroness of the bands of female Jacobins, whenever her ears were not loudly greeted with the welcome sounds of death. The upper gallery reserved for the people, was during the whole trial constantly full of strangers and spectators of every description, drinking wine and brandy as in a tavern. Bets were made as to the issue of the trial in all the neighbouring coffee-houses. Ennui, impatience, disgust sat on every countenance. Each member seemed to ask whether his turn came next? A sick deputy, who was called, came forward, wrapped up in his night-cap and night-gown, and the Assembly, when they beheld this sort of phantom, laughed. The figures passing and repassing, and rendered more ghastly by the pallid lights, and that in a slow and sepulchral voice, only pronounced the word Death; the Duke of Orleans hooted, almost spit upon, when he voted for the condemnation of his relative; others calculating if they should have time to go to dinner before they gave their verdict, while the women were pricking cards with pins in order to count the votes; some of the deputies fallen asleep, and only waked up to give their sentence; Manuel, the secretary, trying to falsify a few votes in favour of the unfortunate king, and in danger of being murdered for his pains in the passages; all this had the appearance rather of a hideous dream than of the reality.

When Malesherbes went to carry the tidings to the king, he found him with his head reclined on the table, in a musing posture, and he observed to him at his entering, "I have been for these two hours trying to recollect what I have ever done to incur the ill will of my subjects." The very endeavour showed goodness of heart and a certain simplicity of character; but it would be long before one taught from his childhood to believe that he could do no wrong would find just ground of offence in his behaviour to his people. The execution of the sentence was fixed for the 21st of January, 1793. Louis mounted the fatal scaffold with firmness; after administering the last sacrament his confessor addressed him, "Son of St. Louis! ascend into heaven!" He, however, manifested some repugnance to submit to his fate, and would have addressed the spectators, staggering to one side of the platform for that purpose, when the drums beat; and he was suddenly seized by the executioners and underwent the sentence of his judges. It is said that the indecent haste and eagerness of these men to complete their task arose from orders having been issued to the soldiers, in case of any attempt at rescue, to fire at the scaffold, and that they were afraid of being themselves despatched if any alarm were given, or there were any symptoms of commotion among the crowd. One person tasted the blood, with a brutal exclamation, that it was "shockingly bitter;" the hair and pieces of the dress were sold by the attendants.

No strong emotion was evinced at the moment; the place was like a fair; but a few days after, Paris, and those who had voted for the death of the monarch, began to feel serious and uneasy at what they had done. Louis XVI. had occupied his time while in prison, where his confinement was strict, chiefly in consoling his wife and sister, and in instructing his son. He discovered neither impatience, regret, nor resentment. The truth is, that great and trying situations raise the mind above itself, and take out the sting of personal suffering, by the importance of the reflections and consequences they suggest. He read much, and often reverted to the English history, where he found many examples of fallen monarchs, and one among them condemned like himself by the people. He was attended during the whole time, and in his last moments, by his old servant Clery, who never left him. The names of those who are faithful in misfortune are sacred in the page of history! The queen followed her husband to the block, after an interval of almost a year. There were circumstances of a dastardly and cold blooded barbarity attending the accusation against her. But the revolutionary spirit had then attained its highest virulence and fury. She expressed her apprehension of being torn in pieces by the mob on her way to the scaffold, and was gravely assured by one of the gendarmes who accompanied her, that "she would reach it without meeting any harm!" It is an affecting incident, that just before she expired, she turned round her head to look back at the Tuilleries, and then laid her neck on the block.

THE TACITURN ACADEMY.

From the French.

There was at Amedan, in Persia, a celebrated academy, the first statute of which was worded in the following manner:—"The academicians must think much, write but little, and speak as little as possible." It was called the Taciturn Academy, and there was not a truly learned man in Persia who did not aspire to be one of its members. In his retirement, in a distant part of the country, Dr. Zeb, the author of a small but excellent volume, entitled "The Gag," learned that there was a place vacant in the Taciturn Academy. He set off immediately, arrived at Amedan, and, presenting himself at the gate of the hall where the academicians were assembled, he requested the door-keeper to deliver to the president the following billet—"Doctor Zeb humbly requests the vacant place." The door-keeper instantly executed his commission, but the doctor and his billet were too late; the vacant seat was already filled.

The academy was much afflicted by this unlucky event. It had, much against its will, been obliged to receive a young wit of the court, whose flippant and sparkling eloquence was the delight of all fashionable circles, and it now found itself under the painful necessity of excluding Doctor Zeb, who was the scourge of babblers; and who possessed a head so well organized, and so well furnished. The president, to whose lot it fell to communicate this disagreeable news to the applicant, could hardly agree to undertake the task, and knew not how to set about it. After having meditated for a while upon the subject, he ordered a large cup to be filled with water, and so nicely filled, that the addition of a single drop would make the fluid run over. He then gave the sign to introduce the candidate. Dr. Zeb entered with that modest and unaffected manner; which almost always indicates true merit. The president rose, and, without saying a word, he pointed with a sorrowful air to the cup, the cup which was so completely full. The doctor instantly comprehended that no academical seat was vacant; but, far from losing courage, he endeavoured to make it obvious that no harm would arise from their admitting a supernumerary.

ry academician. He saw a rose leaf lying at his feet, picked it up, and laid it so delicately on the surface of the water, that not a drop was spilled.

This ingenious reply called forth a general clapping of hands; the regulations of the academy were allowed to sleep upon this occasion; and Dr. Zeb was received by acclamation. The register of the academy, in which the newly elected members were to inscribe their names, was now put into his hand. He wrote his name in it; and that being done, he had only to pronounce, according to the usage in such cases, a sentence expressive of thanks. But, like a truly Taciturn Academician, Doctor Zeb returned thanks without uttering a word. In the margin he wrote the number one hundred, which was that of his new colleagues; then, putting a zero before the figures, he added below, "They are worth neither more nor less than they were," (0100.) The president replied to the modest doctor with equal politeness and presence of mind. He put a figure of one before the number, and wrote "They are worth ten times as much as they were," (1100.)

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1828.

Such of our city subscribers as have changed their place of residence, will please to inform the carrier, or leave information at our office.

Erratum. In our Editorial Diary of last week under May 3d. "General Prescott" was mentioned as the captor of General Ash and his men, through an error of the compositor, instead of "General Prescott."

EDITORIAL DIARY.

May 10. Saint Antoninus; Saint Gordian; Saint Isidore, and Saint Comgall. In 1775, the fortress of Ticonderoga was captured by the famous colonel Ethan Allen.—1779, the British made a descent upon Virginia, and captured 130 vessels, destroying vast quantities of property, at Portsmouth, Norfolk, and Suffolk.

May 11. Saint Mammertus; Saint Majolus, &c. Old May-day, 1590, king James first of Scotland, and his queen arrived in Scotland, it being then according to the style the first day of May.—1778, the great earl of Chatham died in the house of lords, aged seventy years.—1782, Richard Wilson, the eminent landscape painter, died neglected, and in want; another instance of the honour which the world deals out on departed worthies it abused and neglected while living.—1809, Sir Arthur Wellesley defeated the French at Oporto.—1812, the British prime minister, Mr. Perceval, was shot, in the lobby of the house of commons, by John Bellingham.

May 12. Saints Nereus, Achilleus, Flavia, Domitilla, Pancras, Epiphanius, Germanus, Patriarch of Constantinople, and Rictrades.—1797, a serious mutiny broke out in the British fleet at Sheerness, England. Parker, the chief leader in the mutiny was tried, condemned, and executed the last of June following.—1808, Ferdinand subscribed his resignation of the crown of Spain to Buonaparte.—1780, Charleston, South Carolina, surrendered to the British, and 2500 men were made prisoners.—1803, the convention between Lord Hawkesbury and Rufus King, for settling the boundary line between the British provinces and the United States, was sent back by the president, unratified.

May 13. Saint John the Silent; Saint Peter Regalati; Saint Servatus, &c.—1809, the French army, after the brilliant victories of Abensberg, Ratisbon, and Eckmuhl, entered the capital of Austria.—1814, Ferdinand VII. re-entered his capital, abolished the Cortes, and forthwith restored the old despotism of that kingdom.

May 14. Saints Boniface, Pachomius, Pontius, and Carthage.—1814, the British squadron was repulsed in an attack on a battery at or near the mouth of Otter creek, on Lake Champlain.

May 16. Saint John Nepomucen; Saint Simon Stock; Saint Ubaldes, &c.—1818, Messrs. Galatin and Bayard, sailed from Newcastle, Delaware, as commissioners to adjust the differences with Great Britain, under the mediation of Russia.

OUR CITY. The march of improvement, of which we have so many proofs from all parts of the country, is not wholly confined to new settlements and new countries. In our streets we have abundant proof that the rise which our country is taking is not local but universal. The constant din of business is not the solitary sign that improvement has made here one of its favoured haunts. Buildings of the most commodious and elegant structure, are starting up in every quarter. Manufactories of every useful kind, and every convenience for supplying the city with the comforts and luxuries of every clime, go hand in hand with the liberal and enterprising plans now in operation for the beauty and health of our streets. A new church is already commencing in Ferry-street. Our widest and best built streets are to be ornamented with shrubbery and yard railing; and to give all the most cheering appearance to the man who takes a pride in the prosperity of the community, the streets are in a constant uproar, by the perpetual passage of wagons, drays and stages. This noise is not very agreeable; it is true, to the lovers of tranquil and silent life; but to the business man, it "discourses most eloquent music." An elegant commodious steam-boat is already completed and in operation at the Greenbush ferry; a steam saw-mill has been built, and is in operation in the upper part of the city, near the basin; and a manufactory of steam engines has been some months in successful operation on the pier. Our time has not allowed us to explore the proofs of improvement, or it is probable many more might be added to the flattering signs of the continued growth and prosperity of Albany. The continued rise of rent, where so much building is going on, and many other appearances, induce us to believe that the next census will tell a tale, in no respect contradictory to the expectations of our inhabitants. We cannot fall much short of twenty thousand, in our population; we should think less strange, should the result overrun, than to see it fall short of that number.

FEMALE SEMINARIES. It is gratifying to all who have no disposition to let the female mind sink under the neglect of the other sex, to see among the rapid strides now making towards a universal diffusion of knowledge and refinement, so much doing and done for the edification of the female character. The opinion that the veriest rudiments of literature are sufficient for woman to learn, is only left with the vulgar; and begins to meet with the refutation which sound sense will bring, without argument.

Seminaries for the exclusive education of females, have sprung up, within a few years, beyond a parallel in the annals of literature. In these nurseries of talent, the rising generation have an interest that ought to be duly appreciated and deeply felt. The fortunes of ages to come hang upon the poise of their success. We will venture to say that the taste, the judgement, the opinions, and the moral worth of any generation have more or less germinated in the first precepts which have fallen from the lips of fond and pious mothers? We rarely see an instance of very early proficiency in any mental acquirement, but the mother has been the moving cause. And yet there are men, possessed of abundant means of raising the intellect of their daughters, whose parsimony and narrow minds, are more willing to destine their daughters to the degradation of slaves, than to prepare them for the rational and happy duties of mothers.

We have already had occasion to speak of the very flourishing Female Academy in this city, which we have every reason to pronounce as one of the brightest ornaments to our community. Much praise, and deservedly too, has been awarded to its able principal, Mr. Crittenton; and no little credit is due to his industrious and accomplished female assistants. Honourable mention of the institution has been made abroad, while among ourselves, those who profess most to feel the becoming pride in the advancement of our literary character, have said but little, and that little in so very formal a manner, that it is doubted whether there was not something more at the bottom of the compliment than a regard for the interests of the city.

These invaluable institutions are not confined to our cities alone, but may be met with in many of our pleasant and thriving villages, in almost every part of the state. We were led to our present remarks by observing in the Ontario Repository, a notice of the Ontario Female Seminary, located in the flourishing village of Canandaigua. How long this seminary has been in operation, we know not; but we learn that an additional building is to be erected, to accommodate the numerous applicants for admission into the school. All the branches of education, both solid and ornamental, usually taught in schools of the highest character, are attended to, and taught, by competent teachers. The board of trustees have selected as principal, Mr. J. A. Brayton, who for two years past has had the charge of a very flourishing school in the village of Rochester. The present vacation will terminate early in the month of June.

THE FESTIVAL. We already notice an intention among the brethren, in different parts, to celebrate the approaching anniversary of St. John the Baptist, and with the usual spirit. The duty of celebrating these holy-days of the order, however it may be expounded, comes home in a stronger manner to the mind of the faithful brother at this season, than perhaps for years. Now, when corrupt politicians, and dissipated or unworthy brethren have determined to make party tools of the predilections or prejudices of the uninitiated, it becomes the true mason to show to the world that the views of our order, and the influence it has on the mind, are far above the petty selfishness of office seekers, and their slavish tools. Let them show to the world that under the banner of masonry, all selfish feelings are silenced, and whatever parties may carry away the every day feelings of a brother, the badges of the order can have but one party beneath them;—the truly benevolent. We know that there is little need of appealing to the spirit of the fraternity elsewhere, unless we set a better example in the city. It is strange that so little enterprise should exist among a body so truly respectable; but such has been the case for many years, that both of our festival days have been wholly neglected, except by some individual brethren who have honoured it by attending the celebrations in the neighbouring cities and towns.

PUBLIC MEETING. A meeting of the citizens of Albany was held on Monday last, pursuant to public notice, to take measures for the erection of a monument to the memory of the late governor CLINTON, of which judge DUEA was chosen chairman, and PETER GANSEVOORT esq. secretary. After several resolutions approving of the project, and recommending it to the notice of the people, a form for subscription papers was adopted, and committees appointed of three persons in each ward of this city, to collect subscriptions for the purpose. The subscriptions are to be paid, ninety days after date, to William James and Gideon Hawley, and the moneys thus paid are to be deposited in the savings bank of this city, until the first day of February next; at which day, if in the opinion of the committee of seven persons named, or a majority of them, the sums raised shall be sufficient to defray the expenses of erecting a monument or statue, at the capitol in this city, a suitable monument or statue shall be erected, under the direction of the said committee of seven. But if the moneys thus raised be insufficient, or if an overplus remain, the same are to be paid to the guardians of the minor children of the late governor, to be invested in national stocks or bonds, the payment of which shall be safely and satisfactorily secured by mortgage on real estate.

We make no further remarks on this measure; the best comment being, in our opinion, a well filled subscription list, and a finished monument. We know our citizens are not insensible to the calls of honour or gratitude. Let them speak, while we listen to their comment.

LITERARY NOTICES.

NEW-YORK MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL JOURNAL. In our last we copied from this work a paper, by Doctor Tessier, of Quebec, on Sudden Deaths; and in to-day's Record, we present our readers another paper from the same work, on the Uvularia grandiflora, as a remedy for the bite of the Rattlesnake, by J. G. Tracy, esq. of this city. We also promised to speak more largely of the work, a promise which we have prepared ourselves but partially to fulfil. The number how before us is the first of a new series, and the twenty-fifth of the original publication. The Journal is published quarterly, under the direction of JEREM B. BECK, M. D., Professor of Materia Medica in the University of the State of New-York; Corresponding Member of the Medical Society of London. &c.; J. AUGUSTINE SMITH, M. D., Professor of Anatomy and Physiology in the University of the State of New-York; THORNBICK ROMEYN BECK, M. D., Professor of the Theory and Practice of Physick and Medical Jurisprudence in the University of the State of New-York; D. L. M. PEROTTO, M. D., one of the Physicians to the New-York City Dispensary; ALEXANDER H. STEVENS, M. D., Professor of Surgery in the University of the State of New-York; and JOSEPH M. SMITH, M. D., Professor of Theory and Practice in the same university. The talents of these men are not a useless recommendation to the notice of the medical profession, in favour of the merits of the work. The size of the work has been considerably augmented to meet the increase of original matter which these and other distinguished members of the profession have promised, and it is the intention of the conductors gradually to enlarge it still further, without however increasing the price of subscription. It is not only professionally but really an original American Journal. The terms are four dollars a year, payable on the delivery of the second number.

Proposals are issued in New-York for a Spanish paper, to be called "Mercurio de Nueva York," and issued every Saturday. As it will of course be read with interest by all who speak the Spanish language in this country, the proprietors promise to give particular intelligence relative to South American Affairs.

TABLE TALK.

Married all together. In Edgecombe county, North Carolina, Mr. Frederick Mayo, to Miss Manisia Ganer Metteta Anders Sylvester Malvina Llewellyn Sherrard!

Multifarious Security. The treasurer of the state of Mississippi being delinquent to the state some five or six thousand dollars, the state has seized his negroes to secure the debt.

The Banks of Rhine-o. Another tide of ebb has left the bank of Niagara dry, so dry that an injunction has been issued out of the court of Chancery against any further operations until its concerns are fairly canvassed.

In the window of a shop in a country town stands a jar labelled "the Tailor's delight." Drawn by this delightful inscription, a knight of the thimble eagerly inquired of what the contents consisted, and found it to be pickled cabbage.

I'd rather be a dog and bay the moon. In North Adams, Massachusetts, a case pending for the amount of a dog, was postponed on account of the absence of both parties. The queer editor of the Berkshire American says,—"Let every dog bark in his own cause provided he does not bark o' nights."

As you were, Sir. A ludicrous circumstance took place a few Sundays ago, at a chapel not fifty miles from Manchester, England. The leader of the singers, finding that the preacher was giving out a different hymn to that which had been previously agreed upon, in his zeal for the honour of the choir, cried out,—"Howd, stop, Mester,—wee've gotten no tune as 'll fit that—read another."

A Bashaw with six Tails. A person by the name of Benjamin Franklin, has been convicted in Genesee county of being a practical Turk, having married six wives; and he has likewise been condemned to ten years' confinement in the state prison, for passing counterfeit money, and attempting to burn jail. Major Noah suggests a more apt punishment—confine him one week with his six wives.

Not to be sneezed at. A lady, says an English paper, was lately seized with a violent fit of sneezing, in consequence of taking a handful of Macamba at once, by which she dislocated the vertebra of her neck. On dissection, four pounds of pure stuff were found skred away in the place where the brains ought to be.

Good Example. A man was lately sentenced by the Philadelphia police, to thirty days confinement, for stealing a newspaper, which had been placed on the door of a subscriber by the carrier.

Publick Taste. The following inviting bill of fare was posted up at the window of an evening paper in the Strand, in London. Latey:—"The paper of this evening will contain one crim. son by a clergyman, one elopement, two seductions, and one murder."—Foggy. In Paris, the last winter has been unusually foggy; a French wit observes, it is owing to the great influx of English visitors, who bring the fog in their clothes.

Wonders of Women. 1st, at fifteen, they wonder who they shall take; 2d, at twenty-five, they wonder whom they shall get; and 3d, at thirty-five, they wonder who will take them.

Highly important if true. The old Duchess of St. Albans is still the theme of puff and paragraph—every thing about her is a subject of interest to the London Press. The following momentous intelligence from the London Times, has unquestionably affected the domestick market. "We have reason now to be assured, notwithstanding the doubts of our Brighton friends, that the Duchess of St. Albans is in the family way, for we do know that Mr. Clark, the accoucheur, was sent for last week to visit her Grace at Brighton."

Very like a Whale. Some years ago a very large female whale was tackled by two Nantucket ship masters, on the off shore ground, in some part of the Pacific. The tow-iron breaking, the whale made its escape. Eleven months afterwards, the same whale, with the broken iron in its body, was captured by one of the captains here alluded to, at a distance of eighteen hundred miles from the place where first seen. Some years ago, in Woolwich Bay, coast of Africa, a young whale came alongside one of the boats belonging to a whaling ship—whereupon one of the men in the boat marked the initials of his name on its back, and then let it go. Several years after, the identical whale itself, bearing the seaman's initials, was taken on the Brazil banks, and produced sixty barrels of oil.

Cruel Caning. John Kane was tried at the New-York Sessions, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary for six months at hard labour, for unmercifully beating his horse. He is a gray headed man—sixty-three years old.

Savoury Sauce. We understand, says the Berkshire American, that the Reverend Mr. Savery has been sentenced to the state prison for the term of seven years.

Military Spirit. General Fawcett once asked an Irishman if he would fight for a foreign crown; "aye," replied the Emerald, "or for half a crown either."

Went off in a shower. Not long ago a gentleman near Libertytown, Maryland, was walking with an umbrella over his head, when a woman, with a child in her arms begged him to protect her from the rain a few minutes; pretending she had been travelling, and was exhausted, he also consented to carry the child a few paces, when she stopped to adjust some part of her dress, and gave him the slip, leaving the infant for the gentleman to provide for as he could.

New Species of an old Genus. In one of the towns in Erie county, we have been told, at a late town meeting, the anti-masons were so strong in numbers, and the offices so few in comparison to those who wanted them, that these brethren of the same principle divided,—one party becoming Kremlin-anti-masons, and the other anti-Kremlin-anti-masons. After a sharp contest, the anti-Kremlin-anti-masons succeeded in electing their candidate for supervisor!

Strange Visitor. A paper has been established in Chester, Delaware county, by the name of the Weekly Visitor, edited by Strange N. Palmer.

Don't lie your Thumb at u. Mr. Cole, of the Columbia Republican, says, that Albany folks are full of quizzes, and to his certain knowledge will lie most confoundedly. We fear he has experienced the truth of the statement too sensibly, in propria persona.

A little young Newspaper. A periodical has been recently commenced at Providence, entitled the Juvenile Gazette. Major Noah measured it, and found it about five inches long and three wide, and decidedly the smallest paper in the world. It is edited with ability, but without much labour, and published by O. Kindal, jr., Market-square—price twenty-five cents per annum, payable quarterly in advance.

MORE MYSTERY. Much ridicule and some abuse have been thrown out, in consequence of the report that Morgan is alive, and in Asia Minor. We copy the following from the Bunker-Hill Aurora, as we find it, not wishing to trouble our readers by a protracted series of remarks. The editor of the Aurora seems to doubt the story. Now the facts which he shows, and which he personally pronounces true, induce us to inquire, why he expresses these doubts, and at the same time gives his testimony to facts strong enough to do away all doubt from the minds of others? This feature of the affair, however, if masons are entitled to the same notice from the constituted authorities as their calumniators: is deserving of an investigation, to say the least in its favour.

MORGAN. Much doubt is expressed in regard to the story of Morgan having turned Mahometan and taken up his residence in Smyrna. We cannot say that we believe the story. We know however that a very large number of Morgan's book was printed in Spanish in Boston; we saw them boxed for the South American market, and have no doubt that they were duly received there. We have also very strong reasons for believing that Morgan himself was in Boston at that time. And we are now informed by a person whom we consider good authority, that the brig which carried Morgan's books to South America, went from there to Smyrna. How far these facts may tend to confirm the story from the New-York Evening Post, published in our last, we do not pretend to say. We assert nothing but what we know.

FOREIGN. The packet ship John Jay, having sailed from Liverpool the 8th of April, has arrived at New-York. The intelligence from Constantinople, Paris, and Saint Petersburg, is of the highest importance. From the former, the latest advices are to the third of March. The Divan, warmed perhaps by the general discontent, conceives new hopes from the change of ministry in England, and returns, at length, as after the battle of Navarino, to concessions. The Greek Patriarch received a hatti-scheriff of the Sultan, which offered to the Greek insurgents pardon, oblivion of the past, moderation of the taxes—in short, all the advantages offered by the Reis Effendi in the conference of the 23d of November, and besides a delay of three months, during which hostilities should be suspended. At the same time it is announced that orders have been sent to Ibrahim Pacha to observe this kind of armistice. To-day four commissioners have gone to Smyrna with this hatti-scheriff. There had been a general illumination at the Russian capital, in consequence of the news of peace with Prussia. A Paris paper of the 2d of April has the following article:—

"An engraving, called the 'Dream of Maria Louisa,' was publicly sold to-day in Paris. She is represented asleep, and her son at her feet. Napoleon holds out his hand to her, while an eagle places a crown on the head of her son. We do not know whether the ministry has permitted the publication of this engraving; but if it has not committed the fault of permitting it, will it commit that of now allowing it?"

This looks like liberal sentiment! If France wishes young Napoleon to be her future sovereign, her loyal ministerials can do nothing more sure to accelerate the event, than to show their qualms. Tyrants are always cowards; but wo to them if they show their cowardice. In the British Parliament, the bill repealing the Test and Corporation acts had passed the house of commons, and was ordered to a second reading in the house of lords.

JOHN H. HALL respectfully informs his friends and the publick that he has removed to No. 451, South Market street, three doors north of the museum, where he continues to execute engravings of Book, Fancy, and Toy Cuts and Ornaments; Card Ornaments and Border Vignettes, in all their variety; Engravings of Publick Buildings; New Inventions; Patent Machines; and Devices for different Mechanical Professions and Arts. Albany, May 5, 1823.

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the publick, that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North-Market and Steuben-streets, where he will accommodate the publick with any article in his line. Paints in pots, mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders.

March 9, 1823.

JOHN F. PORTER.

BRUSH, TRUNK, AND BAND-BOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 453, South Market-street—Three doors south of the Museum, Albany, keeps constantly on hand and for sale the above named articles at low prices. Those who wish to purchase will please call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hags' Bristles. Jan 12.

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine

STANZAS.

Dark clouds around me gather;
The dream of fame is o'er,—
Borne on distraction's billow,
I near the fatal shore,
Where every hope must vanish,
In silence and despair,
And dread oblivion spread his veil
Forever o'er me there!

The prospect darkens wildly;
I dream of wealth no more,—
Regret is in the backward view,
Despair in that before;
No golden dreams come o'er me
To lull my fitful rest,
And the cold hand of poverty
Lays heavy on my breast.

The storm still wilder rages,
And friendship's dream is past;
And ah! I fear my life will be
Nought but a blank at last!
Then why—why should I cherish
A wish to linger here,
Since every hope and feeling too,
Like autumn's leaf is sear?

Though fame and wealth elude me,
And treacherous friends forsake,
Still, still love kindly whispers
And bids my soul awake;
Awake! for one is near thee
Will never cease to love,
Whate'er thy lot may chance to be,
Where'er thou chance to rove.

Awake; and from its slumber
Bid thy free soul arise,
Far, far above the hurricanes
That sweep fate's murky skies
They are but summer tempests;
Then reckless will I sail,
And fortune's storms are welcome while
I scud before the gale.

And love shall be my beacon,
A light forever true;
A star, through life's wild voyages
To cheer the sailor's view;
Thou art that star, my Mary,
And be thy love sincere,
I'll meet with patience every blast
That can assail me here.

ALBERTUS.

PRAYER AT SEA.

Father Supreme!—to thee our prayers ascending,
Rise from the bosom of the heaving deep,
From the wide waste of troubled waters—blending
With the free winds that o'er the billows sweep,
Far and resolute—wilt thou not attending
List to the voice of those who watch and weep?

O'er the vexed world of waters still thou movest
In the dark rushing of the billowy main;
Yet oft with mercy's gentlest voice reprovest
The storm to calmness—and we see thee then
Archling the clouds with glory—for thou lovest,
Even on the tempest's verge, to smile again.

Hast thou not measured out the seas? and given
Bounds to the whirlwind which its rage adjust?
And shall we not adore thee? Whom in heaven,
Or whom on earth beside thee, shall we trust?
We, by thy breath through ocean's surges driven,
Like the tossed sea-spray, or the scattered dust—

Whom shall we fear beside thee? Men but thinking
On thy unfathomed depths, despair and die—
Earth sees her God and trembles—Ocean sinking
Through his dark caverns, leaves his borders dry—

The heaven of heavens, before thine anger shrinking,
Rolls like a scroll away, and shuns thine eye.

Whom shall we love beside thee? Seas may sever
Hearts whose fond ties are but the wreaths of earth,
Wreaths of fast fading flowers, which bloom, but ever
Die with the hour that gives their fragrance birth;
Thy love unchanging and unending, never,
Saviour!—oh, never can we speak its worth!

Didst thou not veil thy glory, and descending,
Dwell for our sakes in grief—and stoop to be Even with the humble, humblest—poor and wending
By the rough mountain paths, or troubled sea?
Now, thou dost hear our lonely cry ascending—
Whom shall we trust, Redeemer!—whom but thee?

On—let the winds sweep on—our prayers before thee,
Fraught with our sighs and sorrows, shall appear;
On—let the waves heave onward—we adore thee,
We trust, love, serve thee—how then shall we fear?
Even though thy tempests whelm us, we implore thee,
This, only this—be thou our refuge near!

EVENING WALK IN BENGAL.

BY BISHOP HEBER.

Our task is done! on Gunga's breast
The sun is sinking down to rest;
And moored beneath the tamarind bough,
Our bark hath found its harbour now.
With furled sail, and painted side,
Behold the tiny frigate ride.
Upon her deck, mid charcoal gleams,
The Moslem's savoury supper steams,
While all apart, beneath the wood,
The Hindoo cooks his simpler food.

Come, walk with me the jungle through,
If yonder hunter told us true,
Far off, in desert dank and rude,
The tiger holds his solitude;
Nor (taught by recent harm to shun
The thunders of the English gun,)
A dreadful guest but rarely seen,
Returns to scare the village green.
Come boldly on! no venomous snake
Can shelter in so cool a brake.
Child of the sun—he loves to lie
Mid nature's embers, parched and dry,
Where o'er some tower in ruin laid,
The peepul spreads its haunted shade;
Or round a tomb his scales to wreath,
Fit warder in the gate of death!
Come on! Yet pause! behold us now
Beneath the bamboo's arched bough,
Where gemming oft that sacred gloom,
Glow the geranium's scarlet bloom,*
And winds our path through many a bower;
Of fragrant tree and giant flower;
The ceiba's crimson pomp displayed
O'er the broad plantain's humbler shade,
And dusk anana's prickly blade;
While o'er the brake, as wild and fair,
The betel waves his crest to air.
With pendent train and rushing wings,
Aloft the gorgeous peacock springs;
And he, the bird of hundred dyes,
Whose plumes the dames of Ava prize.
So rich a shade, so green a sod,
Our English fairies never trod;
Yet who in Indian bower has stood,
But thought on England's good green wood,
And blessed beneath the palmy shade,
Her hazel and her hawthorn glade,
And breathed a prayer,—how oft in vain!—
To gaze upon her oaks again?

A truce to thought! the jackall's cry
Resounds like sylvan revelry;
And through the trees, yon falling ray
Will scantily serve to guide our way.
Yet mark! as fade the upper skies,
Each thicket opes ten thousand eyes.
Before, beside us, and above,
The firefly lights his lamp of love,
Retreating, chasing, sinking, soaring,
The darkness of the copse exploring;
While to this cooler air confessed,

* A shrub, called Indian Geranium, from the resemblance of its flowers to those of the plant known here by that name.

The broad Dhatura bares her breast,
Of fragrant scent and virgin white,
A pearl around the locks of night!
Still as we pass, in softened hum,
Along the breezy alleys come
The village song, the horn, the drum.
Still as we pass, from bush and briar,
The shrill cigala strikes his lyre;
And what is she whose liquid strain
Trills through yon copse of sugar cane?
I know that soul entrancing swell!
It is—it must be—Philomel!

Enough, enough,—the rustling trees
Announce a shower upon the breeze,—
The flushes of a summer sky
Assume a deeper, ruddier dye;
Yon lamp that trembles on the stream,
From forth our cabin sheds its beam;
And we must early sleep, to find
Betimes the morning's healthy wind.
But oh! with thankful heart confess
Even here there may be happiness;
And He, the bounteous Sire has given
His peace on earth—his hope of heaven!

MAIDENS OF ZIA.

BY THOMAS MOORE.

Here while the moonlight dim
Falls on the mossy brim,
Sing we our fountain hymn,
Maidens of Zia!
Nothing but musick's strain,
When lovers part in pain,
Soothes, till they meet again,
Oh maids of Zia!

Bright fount, so clear and cold,
Round which the nymphs of old
Stood, with their locks of gold,
Bright fount of Zia!
Not even Castaly
Famed though its streamlet be,
Murmurs or shines like thee,
Oh fount of Zia!

Thou while our hymn we sing,
Thy silver voice shall bring,
Answering, answering,
Sweet fount of Zia!
Oh! of all rills that run
Sparkling by moon or sun,
Thou art the fairest one,
Bright fount of Zia!

Now, by those stars that glance
Over heaven's still expanse,
Weave we our mirthful dance,
Daughters of Zia!
Such as in former days
Were danced by Dian's rays,
Where the Eurotas strays,*
Oh maids of Zia!

But when to merry feet
Hearts with no echo beat,
Say, can the dance be sweet,—
Maidens of Zia!
No,—nought but musick's strain,
When lovers part in pain,
Soothes, till they meet again,
Oh maids of Zia!

SONG.

BY REV. G. CROLY.

When eve's blue star is glancing,
When wakes the dewy breeze,
When watch-tower lights are streaming
Along the misty seas:

Oh, then, my love, sigh to me
Thy roundelay!—
The night when thou art nigh to me,
Outshines the day

MASONICK RECORD.

MASONRY AND RELIGION.

A Sermon preached before the Grand Lodge of Maryland, at the dedication of Ashler Lodge, No. 85, held at the Savage Factory, Anne Arundel county, Maryland, on the 4th day of July, 1827.

BY THE REV. C. WILLIAMS, A. M.

That most brilliant virtue, prudence, is represented in a mason's lodge by a blazing star, which is placed in the centre, that every mason's eye may be upon it, to expand his heart and influence his actions; that his conscience may never condemn him for exceeding the bounds which prudence prescribes, and that he may always be animated with the cheering reflection of its unqualified approbation. The starry zone of prudence, like the broad and spangled ecliptick, illuminated with studs of brilliant stars which circumscribe the universe, forms the sacred envelope of all human virtues.

The groundwork of a lodge points out the recurrence of prosperity and adversity, with which the life of man is variegated and checkered; and administers the most soothing consolation under the pressure of calamity or affliction. It displays the God of all comfort in his dispensations of mercy and justice; and shows that however man may be exalted above his species here on earth, while blessed with prosperity, and animated with strength, and health, and spirits, in the humble grave all are on a level, death destroying all human distinctions, for the dust of the most potent monarch is not distinguishable from the dust of the lowly pauper. Thus is humility inculcated; and thus are we instructed to submit with cheerful resignation to the dispensations of providence; assured that the hand which gives can also take away. This is a subject which affords ample scope for illustration, and has a rank assigned to it in the lodge commensurate with its high and paramount importance.

The covering of a lodge is that superb canopy spread over it by the Almighty Creator of all things. The blue, purple, and crimson covering of the first temple erected to the exclusive worship of God by Moses in the wilderness, was a striking symbol of this splendid arch, illuminated with the rays of that great and burning luminary which conveys life, light, and motion to all earthly things. The ground and covering are connected by means of a ladder consisting of three principal steps and resting on the Holy Bible; by which every mason, who firmly exercises the virtues they represent, hopes to leave behind the unsatisfactory pursuits of mortality, and mount, with the angels in Jacob's vision, to a better country, even the holy city of God.

These three principal steps have a direct reference to the three theological virtues, FAITH, HOPE and CHARITY; of which charity possesses the highest and most distinguished rank; and the reason of this will be evident, if we distinctly consider the exclusive properties of these virtues, and deduce from thence the incomparable excellence of universal charity.

FAITH is a firm and sincere assent to the fundamental truths of religion, the being of a God, the divinity of Christ, the Saviour and Judge of mankind, a future state of rewards and punishments, and the means and conditions of avoiding the one and securing the other. This faith, as the true basis of all religion, is the first incentive to holiness, and through its medium we are justified, accepted, and finally received.

HOPE is an earnest and well assured expectation of escaping threatened dangers, and obtaining promised rewards. The simple act of faith, or belief, in the existence of a heaven to reward, and a hell to punish, without knowing how to obtain the former and avoid the latter, would be a state of suspense, dark and appalling as the shades of midnight; without a ray to cheer us in our passage through the gloomy vale: hence arise the consolations of hope, which prompt us to a steady perseverance in the path of duty, that we may finally surmount all impeding obstacles, and receive the eternal rewards of our virtuous endeavours.

CHARITY, in its greatest latitude, is an ardent love of God, united with an unfeigned affection for all his creatures. The love of God naturally inspires the love of our brother, [1 John, iv. 20.] created by the same architect, formed of the same clay, springing from the same common parent, and cemented by the most indissoluble ties. The love of our brother is one of the principal conditions of our initiation into God's friendship, who is the Father and generous Preserver of us all. Hence, if the vivifying beams of God's love be not shed abroad in the heart, there will exist little fraternal affection; but the common bond of masonry and religion being violated, there can be no hopes of good fruit proceeding from so impure a stock, and thus both are calumniated from the vicious conduct of some of their professors. Charity is not capable of a more restricted sense: for, if it be disunited from the love of God, and understood simply of brotherly love, it would be a virtue of inferior rank, and must yield precedence to both faith and hope. But consider charity in its most extended signification, as the pure and unfeigned love of God and man, and the doctrine of masonry, corroborated by the argument of St. Paul, [1 Cor. xiii.] will be fully understood and admitted: and this argument lends a most powerful and decisive sanction to masonry, which shielded by the unequivocal support of such high authority, can never be overthrown by the united force of prejudice or passion.

A comparison of these virtues will show, more distinctly, why charity is so pre-eminently exalted above the other two.

Faith is the evidence of things not seen, the substance of things hoped for. Charity is the sublimity of faith and hope, and may be denominated a grand and beautiful entablature of good works, supported by the strong pillar of hope, and founded upon the wise and broad pedestal of faith.

From this uncontaminated source we are supplied with WISDOM from above, which its sheds light like the BLAZING STAR in the centre of heaven's glorious arch, with STRENGTH to support us while treading the MOSAICK PAVEMENT of this uncertain life, checkered with the variegated scenes of good and evil, and with BEAUTY like a rich TESSELATED BORDER of brilliant stars, to adorn our good works, which, shining before men, may tend to the glory of our Father who is in heaven.

Faith is the basis of religion; it points to duty and reward, clearly presents to view the means of obtaining the promises, strongly obligates the conscience and inclines the will to compliance. Thus we ascend the FIRST STEP of the MASONICK LADDER. Hope is a column raised on the basis of faith that God is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him: this consoling assurance adds vigour to the performance of duty, quickens the pursuit after happiness, circumscribes our wishes within the compass of God's promises, and enables us to win the SECOND STEP. Charity is the ornamented capital which completes the fabric, even the THIRD and SUBLIME STEP, embossed in clouds, and encircled with rays of everlasting glory.

It is apparent, from the preceding considerations, that masonry is not, as some suppose, an association of mere operative artists, nor a society instituted for the purposes of general and undefined beneficence; but that it is rather "a religious institution"—a mystery of ancient times; teaching, under various figures and symbols, some of the most interesting and sublime truths in religion; inculcating a pure worship of the one living and true God; enjoining personal holiness—a habit of constant devotion and intercourse with heaven; the strictest watch over our passions; an unbounded benevolence to the whole brotherhood of the human family; an unwearied practice of the most exalted moral virtue; and the necessity of a faithful and habitual preparation for another state of interminable existence.

Such then being the nature and character of the institution, the solemn dedication of our halls is manifestly proper; and thus we can easily account for the active part which, in all ages, our fraternity have taken, at the laying the foundation of public buildings and temples; not that we do it, as many suppose, because we are, or ever were, an association of operative mechanicks; but as a religious institution; as an institution established for, and now professing to inculcate among its members the knowledge and worship of the great Father of LIGHT, OF LIFE, and OF LOVE, and the practice of the most pure and exalted moral virtues. Hence, then, it is no less consistent with the grand objects of our order, that a part of the building where our social meetings are held, should be appropriated to the purposes of instructing the young; because as christians as well as masons, it is made a part of our duty to train up our children in the knowledge of virtue and religion; in an early detestation of vice and its unhappy consequences; in industry, as necessary to their condition; and to impress strongly on their minds a due sense of subordination, true humility, and obedience to their superiors.

But, brethren, if our order be clothed with such high privileges, and partakes of the nature and character I have briefly described, then what

SECONDLY, are those duties which, as a collective body as well as individuals, we are bound to manifest to the world in our public and private deportment; that we may be able to stop the gain-sayings of the ignorant and malicious, and let our light so shine before men that they may see our good works and glorify our Father who is in heaven.

The length of time which the preceding discussions have occupied, will compel us to be brief in our concluding remarks.

The duties of masons are those in common with all other men and christians, and will more particularly discover themselves by the exercise of those christian graces and virtues mentioned by the holy apostle, St. Peter—"Giving all diligence, add to your faith, virtue; and to your virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." Such are the virtues and graces which the Apostle mentions as necessary to be practised by every true believer, as the marks and genuine fruits of a true christian faith; and which, if they be in us and abound, they make us that we shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ; but diligently attaining and practising them, an entrance shall be hereby ministered unto us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; who will then say unto us, "well done ye good and faithful servants; ye have been faithful over a few things, I will make you rulers over many things; enter ye into the joy of your Lord."

* The building erected by the members of Ashler Lodge, is a neat and commodious brick edifice, the upper story of which is dedicated to masonic purposes, and the lower is intended for a school room, which is sufficiently large to accommodate sixty or seventy children. The lot on which the hall stands was generously given by the proprietors of the Savage factory.

But in addition to those duties, which as men and as christians we are bound to perform, and in the faithful discharge of which we can alone manifest to the world the religious character, and the beneficial tendency of our order—and that the superior light of which we boast, is not darkness; there are other duties which we owe to the body of which we are members, from the performance of which we can not be exempt, and to disregard, would be highly criminal. Remember what our blessed Lord says in his address to his disciples; words which I may well apply to you, my brethren of Ashler lodge, on the present occasion: "A city that is set on a hill can not be hid." You are now placed in a conspicuous situation, as a city set on a hill. You must therefore expect that those by whom you are surrounded, will look upon you with a scrutinizing eye, and make observations on all your words and actions, in order to form an estimate and judgement of the value of your society, from what they see. It becomes, therefore, your bounden duty, and should also be your grand object, so to recommend the truth which you openly profess, by your christian conversation and behaviour, that men may see your good works, which flow from faith and love, the two grand pillars of our order, and thus be induced to glorify their God and Father. Your good examples, as well as good works, will have a most powerful tendency to remove the prejudices of those who are now professedly inimical to the institution, and lead them to attend to the truth; and thus you will be instrumental to their conversion, by which they glorify God, and become his worshippers and servants. This then should be the chief aim and effect of your general conduct; though we must remember, we are forbid to do any particular action "to be seen of men," or seek our own glory in any thing. I need not remind you how indispensably necessary it is that you use the utmost caution in the admission of new members into your lodge. You must be sensible how great is the injury done, and reproach brought upon the fraternity, by the enrollment of one unworthy member in its ranks; and it is an injury done, not simply to a fraternity of a district, state or country, but to a fraternity extending over the whole world. The ignorant and malicious are ever ready, and on the watch, to lay hold of every circumstance that may be turned to the disadvantage of the order; it is therefore more particularly incumbent upon us not to furnish them with any weapon whereby they may have it in their power to injure us in our character as a society; and certainly none so likely to do us harm, as the evil lives and conduct of our members. We must bear in mind then, that whenever we offend against the laws of God, and the established laws of society, we at the same time inflict a wound upon the society of which we are now proud to be considered members, and which we, as individuals, are bound to vindicate from the sneers of cradition, and the irreverent sallies of wit; and no course so likely to obtain this object, as the correct and orderly deportment of its members, in their intercourse with the world. True it is, that masonry as well as christianity has too much cause to weep for the errors of some of her sons; but this is not owing to any defect in the system, but to the weakness and frailty of human nature; and it would be unjust to visit a whole society with opprobrium, because a few of its members have proved themselves unworthy and been unmindful of their duty. We fear not the scrutinizing eye; for masonry, the more it is examined, the more beautiful it becomes; and, like the purgation of a precious metal, it rises from each successive ordeal with renewed claims to our admiration, from its augmented brilliancy and worth.

Masonry has no point, part, or secret, which does nor illustrate some valuable truth, or recommend some amiable precept of religion. The furniture of our pedestal plainly intimates, that the object of all our researches is the glory of God; the end of all our illustrations, happiness in a future state. The many dignified names which grace the annals of masonry throughout the wide expanse of the inhabited universe, sufficiently prove that our institution is of the most social and beneficial tendency. No age has exceeded the present in the extent of its illustrious patrons, who dare not stoop to sanction vice, or lend their influence to the promulgation of fraud and deception; and the universal diffusion of masonry at this day, proclaims to the rest of mankind, that its pedestal is religion; its shaft, morality; and its capital, virtue: the whole surmounted by a beautiful entablature of universal charity; that it strongly incites us to follow the Apostle St. Peter's direction; [1 St. Peter ii. 17.] "to honour all men, to love the brotherhood; to fear God, and to honour the king."† Such a system which occupies a situation at least equally elevated with any human institution, is calculated to expand our benevolence, to extinguish animosities, and to destroy all unimportant differences amongst mankind. This indeed is the true cement and intention of masonry, which embraces all the graces and perfections of holiness; unites mankind in the strictest bonds of amity, as children of a common parent; and incessantly urges them to ask that they may have, to seek and they shall find, and to knock that the door may be opened unto them. And this is the conclusion that masonry draws from all her illustrations: he who practises all the virtues thus recommended in FAITH, will rejoice in HOPE, be in perfect CHARITY with all mankind, and finally receive a PASS WORD into the Grand Lodge above, where peace, order, and harmony eternally preside.

Now to Him who is able to keep you from falling, and conduct you safe to those happy mansions, be ascribed, as is most due, all praise, power, glory, and dominion, for ever and ever.—Amen.

* The following chronological list of Grand Masters and Patrons of the order in England, from the time of the Anglo-Saxons, will be a decisive testimony that the order contains nothing repugnant to civil or religious liberty. A. D. 597, Austin the monk; 680, Bennet, abbot of Wirral; 857, Saint Swithin; 872, King Alfred the great; 900, Edward, king of Mercia; 924, King Athelstane; 957, Saint Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury; 1041, King Edward the Confessor; 1066, Gundulph, bishop of Rochester; 1100, King Henry I.; 1216, Peter de Rupibus, bishop of Winchester; 1272, Walter Giffard, archbishop of York; 1307, Walter Stapleton, bishop of Exeter; 1327, King Edward III.; 1357, William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester; 1375, Simon Langham, abbot of Westminster; 1413, Henry Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury; 1443, William Waynflete, bishop of Winchester; 1471, Richard Beaneham, bishop of Salisbury; 1485, King Henry VII.; 1493, John Islip, abbot of Westminster; 1515, Cardinal Wolsey; 1540, Edward Seymour, duke of Somerset; 1551, John Poynt, bishop of Winchester; 1603, King James I.; 1607, Inigo Jones; 1625, King Charles I.; 1660, King Charles II.; 1674, George Villiers, duke of Buckingham; 1685, Sir Christopher Wren; 1695, Charles Lennox, duke of Richmond; 1719, J. T. Desaguliers, L.L.D., F.R.S.; 1721, John, duke of Montague; 1722, Philip, duke of Wharton; 1726, William O'Brien, earl of Inchiquin; 1729, Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk; 1732, Anthony Brown, lord viscount Montague; 1735, T. Thynne, lord viscount Weymouth; 1736, John Campbell, earl of Loudoun; 1738, H. R. H. Frederick, duke of Cumberland; 1786, H. R. H. George, Pr. of Wales; 1813, H. R. M. Augustus Frederick, duke of Sussex; 1820, King George IV., Grand Patron.

† Give every man the respect and kindness due to him. Love all your fellow christians. Fear God; and, in subordination to him, pay all obedience to the emperor.—Dr. Hammond. This last duty consists in reverencing the persons of our governors, in obeying their lawful demands, in a cheerful payment of their dues, in praying affectionately for them, and in praising God for the blessing of their government. Nero, the worst of kings, and the persecutor of the christians, was then upon the throne; yet the command is express to honour him. From the connexion of the two precepts, "Fear God; honour the king," it may be remarked, that religion best qualifies persons for good subjects; that this is the true and steady principle of loyalty; and that obedience to governors is firm and durable when it is established on a conscientious regard to the command of God.—Burkitt.

At a regular communication, of Social Master's Lodge, No. 59, convened at Mason's Hall, in Williamstown, Vermont, February 26th, A. E. 5828, voted, that Orcott Hyde, a master mason, be expelled from this Lodge, for unmasonic conduct. By order of the Lodge,

INDIAN PENANCE OF GULWUGTY, OR CHURUK POOJA.

BY R. H. KENNEDY, M. D.

I do not recollect to have seen a description by a medical writer of the Indian penance of Gulwugty, or swinging with the whole weight of the body suspended on a pair of hooks perforating the integument of the loins. The process itself is so appalling to an ordinary spectator, and the after consequences seem so singularly disproportionate to the apparently serious nature of the injury endured, that it deserves consideration.

On the western extremity of the old cantonment of the Bombay Dekkan division, was the village of Seroor, whence the station was named, and on the south-eastern extremity of the camp was the village of Hingny, the distance between the two being about three miles. At each of these villages was a pajodo of peculiar sanctity; and at certain periods, as far as I can remember, once in nineteen years it was deemed a necessary ceremony that the car of Gulwugty penance should be dragged from Seroor to Hingny, with devotees suspended from the mast during the whole route. The car was dragged by as many volunteer labourers from the spectators as could be yoked to it, and proceeded at a rapid rate, when a sufferer was undergoing the torture, but it remained still in the interval of unloosing one and fixing another, no progressive motion being lawful unless with a devotee pendant from the hooks. The spectators and officials assured me that such a circumstance had never occurred as the car's being unable to reach its destination through the want of mortifiers on their flesh; the penitents or devotees were always sufficiently numerous to keep the hooks occupied from one pajodo to the other. The car was four-wheeled, and about the size of an English farmer's wagon, rather broader, but not so lofty, of the coarsest possible construction, being built of half beams, rather than planks, and exceedingly heavy; upon this was a platform, ample enough to hold about twenty persons; a mast twelve feet high was erected in the centre, across which, fitting on an iron pivot, was balanced transversely a pole about fifteen feet in length, divided, however, unequally, the iron ring, which fixed on the pivot, being inserted into it about four feet from the heavy end, and of course, about eleven from the smaller. To the first was suspended a square scale of wood, capable of containing four or five persons, and upon the latter the hooks hung by a chain.

The process of the penance was as follows: A devotee, having the hooks fixed in his back as shall hereafter be described, the number of persons that were requisite to balance his weight and the lever, from his greater share of the pole, generally four or five, stepped into the scale at the short end of the transverse beam, and depressing it by their weight as low as the pivot would allow, to an angle of about 70°, they gave the cross beam a circular motion on the pivot, by pulling themselves round the mast, which they could touch, or were pushed round by other assistants, who crowded on the platform; whilst the poor penitent, dangling at the fearful height of at least twenty feet from the ground, was swung round with a rapidity scarcely describable, and the car meanwhile dragged forward by the multitude, till the sufferer himself prayed to be released from his painful and perilous situation. The longest period I ever witnessed any one endure the torture was seven minutes and a half, the generality were satisfied with two minutes. The bold and heroic went up with sword in hand, and shield on arm, as if accounted for action. The meeker characters held their beads in their hands, and continued repeating the names of their gods.

The total number who underwent the penance was about fifty, and the time required for the car to travel from one village to the other, was more than seven hours, two of which were spent within the limits of the village which closed the procession; the car at that time scarcely moving onwards a foot with each individual, in order by such slowness of advance to indulge as many as wished to offer themselves for the ceremony.

The hooks were precisely similar in shape, but rather stronger than the flesh hooks of the London markets, the points by no means particularly sharp, nor the iron polished to any remarkable brightness. No preparatory perforation of the integuments was made previously to introducing the hooks; but they were forced though, one after the other, with as much unconcern as can be imagined, the operator no more interested to be tender in the office than as if he considered the patient as accustomed to the ceremony, and as little affected by it as himself. The only care was to avoid a flesh wound; and the extent to which the integuments were disengaged from the muscles beneath, even in the youngest and stoutest persons, exceedingly surprised me. To effect this the patient was laid on the ground, and his back violently rubbed with abundance of oil; this being dried off with sand, another friction equally violent took place with soap scraped into such thin fragments as powdered and disappeared under the hand. This being again dried with sand, the operator's principal assistant, sitting on the patient's shoulders, commenced with his heels a process of kneading, jerking, and working the integuments over the loins, so as to loosen or slacken them, with a roughness of manual but completeness of success that, as I have already said, struck me with astonishment. This being done, or rather in the intervals of this process, the operator continued gathering up by little and little fold a of the integuments in his left hand as would raise up the skin for the introduction of a seton, and when he had mastered as much as he could with his utmost exertion force up, he then shoved his hook slowly and deliberately through it, always directing the point outwards. One hook being fixed, the other was speedily introduced on the opposite side in the same manner, the operation of fixing both taking generally about three or five minutes, depending upon the mucularity of the subject. After the patient had swung to his own content, he was taken down by the cross pole being lowered nearly to the ground, from the weights at the opposite end removing from the scale; then being laid flat on the ground the hooks were drawn forth, but without the least precaution to save pain. I did not observe a single instance of the skin having yielded or being rent. The appearance was invariably four wounds in a straight line, thus, o o o o, the two made by one hook being always four and sometimes five inches apart from each other. The curative process was simplicity itself. The principal assistant again seated himself on the patient's shoulders, and applying his heels to the wounded parts, laboured to squeeze out any blood or lymph that might be extravasated. One operator sucked the wounds, another applied a kind of dry poultice of cow dung and tumeric, the Hindoo specific for every shock that "flesh is heir to." The sufferer's kumrumbund (girdle) supplied the bandage, which was tightly applied round his loins, and he forthwith joined in the ceremony of swinging his comrades, as alert and unconcerned to appearance, as if the whole he had undergone were but a jest. I had an opportunity of examining daily, until their perfect cure, seven of the devotees, who were our battalion sepoy's or camp followers. In no one instance was pus formed, or did inflammation of any consequence whatever follow; nor did one quit his duty, or apply for hospital relief. And further, I had reports to be relied on of nearly twenty others from distant villages, whither I sent hospital servants to make inquiries after the poor people who had swung, not one of whom suffered in any important degree beyond a temporary soreness and stiffness in the loins. None but a medical man who has witnessed the process could suppose it possible that so little injury should result from so apparently serious an operation. The natives of course think it the miraculous interference of the god Cunda Row, in whose honour the torture is endured, a very natural conclusion, for even among our officers, who in great numbers attended to witness the spectacle, there were not a few whom it was difficult to impress with a satisfactory conviction that the whole was but a natural result from natural causes; and that the skill of the operator, and the antiphlegmonous habit of his own constitution, was the safeguard of the patient.

THE CULTURE OF BEES IN FORESTS.

By M. Buttner.

It has been a custom in Livonia, from time immemorial, to make cavities in the trees of a forest, for the purpose of receiving and rearing the swarms of bees. Some of the proprietors have hundreds and even thousands of bee trees. Those which are chosen for this purpose are large oaks, firs, pines, alders, &c. It has been objected to this system, that it destroys the forests and diminishes the quantity of building wood; but M. Buttner observes, that it is not necessary to choose the finest trunks, and that stunted are equally serviceable for this purpose, if they have sufficient size. He states also that a bee tree is worth more than if sold for wood; that the hollow trees which will serve for an age or two, spread seed around, and cause the production of young seedlings, which would be obtained with difficulty, by destroying the old trunks. He adds, that the pure air of the higher regions agrees better with the bees than the air enclosed in hives, which receive the exhalations of the earth, and in which contagious diseases sometimes make great ravages. The proof he offers is, that when garden bees swarm, they are directed instinctively towards the woods, whilst the bees of the wood never swarm towards the gardens.

THE GATHERER.

BELL RINGING.

A poor Swiss, who was in the madhouse of Zurich, was rather afflicted by imbecility than madness, and was allowed his occasional liberty, which he never abused. All his happiness consisted in ringing the bells of the parish church; of this he was somehow deprived, and it plunged him into despair. At length he sought the governor, and said to him, "I come, sir, to ask a favour of you. I used to ring the bells; it was the only thing in the world in which I could make myself useful, but they will not let me do it any longer. Do me the pleasure then of cutting off my head; I can not do it myself, or I would save you the trouble." Such an appeal produced his re-establishment in his former honours, and he died ringing the bells.

KISSING HANDS.

Mungo Murrey was a confidential servant and gentleman of the bedchamber to Charles I., who often entrusted him private correspondence, an anecdote respecting which deserves notice. In February, 1646, whilst the king was in the power of the English commissioners at Newcastle, Murrey, having obtained leave of absence on pretence of visiting Scotland, was admitted to his majesty's presence for the purpose of kissing his hand. The commissioners, however, were so suspicious and watchful that they observed something put in his hand by the king; and having followed him, when out of the presence, they searched him, and found a letter in cipher, directed to Montreuil, the French agent. The letter was immediately sent up to parliament, and Murrey committed to prison but admitted to bail, after two days' confinement.

ANIMALS THREE MILES LONG.

Dr. Sydal, Bishop of Gloucester, used to relate that a person of his college (Corpus Christi, Cambridge,) not famous for his acumen, once asserted that there were animals several miles long. This was said in a large company, and when the persons present began to stare, and express doubt of the fact, he said he could demonstrate the thing to any of them that would come to his chamber. In a day or two some went; upon which he took out his compasses, and went to a map hanging up in his room, and first measured the figure of an animal therein engraved by way of ornament, and then claps them to a scale of miles, saying, "Look you there, gentlemen; this animal is at least three miles long, and there are others of greater dimensions."

SMOKING WAGER.

The principal solace of Dr. Aldrich between the variety of his learned pursuits, was that of smoking; of which habit he was so fond, that, among many other compositions, he produced a "Smoking Catch," to be sung by four men smoking their pipes. His excessive attachment to this amusement becoming a subject of pleasant remark in the university, a student, one morning at breakfast, laid his companion a wager, that the Dean was smoking at that instant. Away they accordingly hastened to the deanery; and, admitted to the study, told the Dean the occasion of their visit; when addressing himself, in perfect good humour, to him who had laid that he was smoking, he said, "You see, sir, you have lost your wager; for I am not smoking, but—filling my pipe."

PIOUS DIRECTION POST.

Under this title, in an English west-country paper of the year 1927, there is the following statement:—

On the highway near Bickton, in Devonshire, the seat of the right hon. lord Rolle, in the centre of four cross roads, is a directing post with the following inscriptions, by an attention to which the traveller learns the condition of the roads over which he has to pass, and at the same time is furnished with food for meditation:—

To Woodbury, Topshaw, Exeter. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

To Brixton, Ottery, Honiton. O hold up our goings in thy paths that our footsteps slip not.

To Otterton, Sidmouth, Culliton, A. D. 1743. O that our ways were made to direct that we might keep thy statutes.

To Budleigh. Make us to go in the paths of thy commandments, for therein is our desire.

WILSON AND SHUTER.

When Wilson the comedian made his debut, it was in the character formerly supported by Shuter; but upon his appearance on the stage, the audience called out for their former favourite, by crying, "Off, off—Shuter, Shuter!" Whereon Wilson, turning round, and with a face as stupid as art could make it, and suiting his action to his words, replied, "Shoot her, shoot her!" (pointing at the same time to the female performer on the stage with him,) "I'm sure she does her part very well." This well timed sally of seeming stupidity turned the scale in his favour, and called down repeated applause, which continued during the whole of the performance.

KITTY WHITE'S PARENTHESIS.

Kitty White, a pupil to old Rich, the comedian, was instructed by O'Brien, of Drury-lane, how to perform Syleia, in "The Recruiting Officer." The lady reciting a passage improperly, he told her it was a parenthesis, and therefore required a different tone of voice, and greater volubility. "A parenthesis!" said Miss White, "What's that?" Her mother, who was present, blushing for her daughter's ignorance, immediately exclaimed, "Oh, what an infernal limb of an actress will you make! not to know the meaning of 'prentice' and that it is the plural number of 'prentices'!"

THEATRICAL STARS.

One of these great modern constellations, the other evening in the green room, said to a poor ill-starred author—"Entre nous, don't you think tip-top histrionick talent, like mine, is badly paid at £30 a night?" "Certainly," replied the irritated play-wright; "for consider your medical expenses." "My medical expenses!" exclaimed Roscius. "Ay; entre nous," rejoined young Sir Fretful, "consider the colds and agues caught by playing to empty houses!"

JUSTICE AND INDEPENDENCE.

Randolph, Earl of Moray, Regent of Scotland, after the death of Robert Bruce, was very strict in administering justice. Upon one occasion, a criminal who had slain a priest, and afterwards fled to Rome and done penance there, was brought before the Regent. The culprit confessed the murder, but pleaded that he had obtained the Pope's pardon: "The Pope," said Randolph, "might pardon you for killing a priest, but his remission can not avail you for murdering a subject of the King of Scotland." This was asserting a degree of independence of the Pope's authority which was very unusual among the princes and governors of the time. [Tales of a Grandfather.]

POPULAR TALES.

THE BALL.

BY MRS. HOFLAND.

"Even if I were not prevented by unlooked for engagement from accompanying you to the ball to-night, my love," said the honorable Alfred Seymour to his beautiful young wife, "you must nevertheless have declined it, for the child is evidently unwell; look, how the pulses throb in this little throat, Sophia!"

"So they always do, I believe. I really wish you were less of a croaker, and candle-maker, my dear; however, to make you easy, I will send for Doctor Davis immediately: as to the ball, as I am expected, and have gone to the trouble and expense of a new dress, and have not been out for such a long, long time, really I think I ought to go." "You would not leave my boy, lady Sophia, if?" "not if there is the least danger, certainly; nor if the doctor should pronounce it ill; but I do not believe it is so; I see nothing particular about the child, for my part."

As the young mother said this, she cast her eyes on the child, and saw in its little heavy eyes something, which she felt assured was particular—she saw, moreover, more strikingly than ever, the likeness it bore to a justly beloved husband, and in a tone of self-correction added, "poor little fellow, I do not think you are quite the thing; and should it prove so, mama will not leave you for the world."

The countenance of the father brightened, and he departed assured that the claims of nature would soon fully triumph over any little lingering love of dissipation, struggling for accustomed indulgence; and, as he bade her good bye, he did not wonder that a star so brilliant desired to exhibit its rays in the highest circle of fashion. Nevertheless, as he could not be present himself, he thought, on the whole, it was better she should be absent. A young nobleman, who had been his rival, and worn the willow some time after their marriage, had lately paid marked attention to a young beauty every way likely to console him; and Mr. Seymour thought it would be a great pity if his wife's blaze of beauty, appearing suddenly before him, after it had so long been withdrawn, should indispose his heart toward a connexion every way likely to prove happy.

Unfortunately, the fond husband gave indication of his admiration alike in looks and words, and as the fair young mother turned from him to her mirror, she felt for a moment displeased that her liege lord should be less solicitous than herself to "witch the world" with her beauty;—and whilst in this humour she called her maid to shew her the turban and dress "in which she had intended to appear."

"Laik, my lady! why sure you intends it yet. Did any body ever hear of such a thing as going for to stay at home, when you are all prepared! You have been out of sight ever so long; and you are a thousand times more beautifuller than you ever was. Ah! I knows what I knows. Miss Somerville may look twice ere she catches my lord, if so be he sees you in this here plume, 'cold broth is soon warmed' they say."

Could it be that this vulgar nonsense—the senseless tirade of low flattery and thoughtless stimulation to error—could affect the mind of the high born and highly educated Lady Sophia? Alas! yes—a slight spark will ignite dormant vanity; and the love of momentary triumph surpass the more generous wish of giving happiness to others, in a sphere distinct from our own. The new dress was tried on; its effect extolled by the maid, and admitted by the lady. The carriage was announced, and she was actually descending when the low wail of the baby broke on her ear, and she recollected that in the confusion of her mind, during the time devoted to dress and anticipated triumph, she had forgotten to send for the medical friend of the family.

Angry with herself, in the first moment of repentance, she determined to remain at home:—but, unfortunately, she reconsidered, and went before the arrival of the doctor. 'Tis true, she left messages, and various orders, and so far fulfilled a mother's duties; but she closed her eyes to the evident weakness of her boy, and contented herself with determining to return as soon as possible.

Who could return, while they found themselves the admired of all, and when, at least, the adoration of eyes saluted her from him, whom she well knew it was cruelty, or sin, to attract. The observation forced upon her of Miss Somerville's melancholy looks, told her this, and compelled her to recollect that she was without her husband, and therefore likely to be closely watched. She found that in the midst of triumph we may be humbled,—in the midst of pleasure, pained; and she resolved to fly from the scene of gayety, more quickly than she had come. But numerous delays arose, each of which harassed her spirits no less than they retarded her movements. She became at length, so annoyed, as to lose all her bloom, and hear herself as much condoled with, as she had before been congratulated. She felt ill, and was aware that she had a right to expect reproaches from her husband, not less on account of herself than her child; and whilst in this state of perplexity, was summoned to her carriage by servants, whose messages from home increased her distress.

The young mother arrived in time to see the face of her dying child, distorted by convulsions, and to meet from her husband, anger, reproach, and contempt. She was terrified to witness the death of the innocent being, she had forsaken in a moment so critical; and bitter was the sorrow and remorse, which arose from offending him, who had hitherto loved her so fondly, and esteemed her so highly. These emotions, combining with other causes, soon rendered her the inhabitant of a sick-bed, and converted a house so lately the abode of happiness and hope, into a scene of sorrow, anxiety, and death.

Lady Sophia, after much suffering, recovered her health; but when she left her chamber, she could not help being sensible that her husband's confidence was withdrawn from her, though pity and kindness were shown to her situation. Entire silence about the past was the utmost act of tenderness to which Mr. Seymour could bring himself on a subject, which had wounded him so deeply; and which recurred with renewed pain, when all anxiety was removed for the life of one still dear, but no longer invaluable.

And all this misery,—The fearful prospects of a long life embittered by self-reproach, useless regret, and lost affection, was purchased by a new dress, and an ignorant waiting maid; a risk so full of danger, and so fatal in effect, was incurred, to strike a man already refused, and wound a woman who never injured her. Such are the despicable efforts of vanity for temporary distinction; and such the deplorable consequences of quitting the tender offices of affection, and transgressing the requisitions of duty.

MISCELLANY.

WHITFIELD AND WESLEY.

From Angelo's Reminiscences.

With regard to Mr. Whitfield and this dramatic Proteus, (Tate Wilkinson,) who having been one of the sect denominated Whitfieldites, and a constant listener to his pulpit oratory, he could touch him off to the life. Foote saw the preacher but once. Tate (the wolf in sheep's clothing) was one of his disciples. That Whitfield was a man of talent there can be no doubt; he frequently addressed his auditory with energy, feeling, and pathos; but, as Foote used to say, "like the cow, after giving a good pailful of milk, he was apt to kick it down again;" or, in other words, that good sense which, at one period of his discourse, would please the most gravely orthodox, would be suddenly succeeded by such extravagant ravings pious rodmontade, that its effect reversed the line of Goldsmith which refers to the pious parson Primrose:—

"And those who came to scoff—remained to pray;"

for many who went with the serious intention to benefit by Whitfield's pious exhortations, on listening to the freedom, not to say levity, with which he handled Scripture, and the indecorous familiarity with which he frequently spoke of sacred things, thinking the preacher more of the zany than the priest, quitted the tabernacle in disgust.

The portrait of this reverend gent. was thus sketched by the pen of the mimick. He describes him as the first actor in his walk; and not without humour, here—and—there. His dialect was not only "very particular," he says, but certainly very affected. Lurd instead of Lord, and Gud, as the other pronunciation of the deity. One of his favourite texts was—May we all work the harder, continues the wag, which text he illustrated thus:—"There was a poor woman, and she was a long while before she was converted: she was three score years and ten.—Yes she was; she was three score years and ten." "Sir, (says she, to the good man that converted her,) sir, (says she,) I am three score years and ten. I have been a long time about it; but, sir, (says she,) I will work the harder:—yes, sir, (says she,) I will work the harder!" And O! may you all—all—all—like that dear, good woman—all work the harder! What, (looking down from his desk in a sudden rhapsody,) what—you young ones! You are some of you twelve, some fourteen years of age, yet you do not think of going to hell! What! twelve and fourteen years of age, and not think of going to hell! O ye little brats, you!" And then he shook his white wig, and growled exactly like my performance of Squintum, says the wicked actor. And so it seems it was—for the portrait was scarcely a caricature likeness of the master, drawn by a disciple of his own school. Whitfield proceeded—at least so says the mimick—"You go to plays—and what do you see there? Why, if you will not tell me, I will tell you what you see there. When you see the players on the stage, you see the devil's children grinning at you! When you go to the play-house, I suppose you go in ruffles—I wonder whether Paul wore ruffles! No; there were no ruffles in Paul's days. I am told that people say I bawl—well I allow it, I do bawl, and I will bawl—I will not be a velvet-mouthed preacher. I will not speak the word of Gud in a drowsy manner, like your church preachers—your steeple-house preachers—I'll tell you a story. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in the last age, was acquainted with Betterton the player. You all have heard of Betterton. One day the Archbishop of Canterbury said to Betterton the player, "Pray inform me, Mr. Betterton, what is the reason you actors on the stage can affect your congregation with things imaginary as if they were real; while we of the church speak of things real, which our congregations only receive as if they were imaginary?" "Why, my lord archbishop, (says Betterton the player,) the reason is very plain. We actors on the stage speak of things imaginary as if they were real, and you in the pulpit speak of things real as if they were imaginary." "Therefore, I will bawl," said Whitfield, "I will bawl—I will not be a velvet-mouthed preacher." His contemporary labourer in the vineyard, a man of parts also, used commonly to address his auditors in the same whimsical strain, as though he and his pious colleague would really interpret serious texts in a merry mood. "If ye be merry—sing psalms, and why not hymns?" quoth Whitfield, which begot that divine mirth, which, whatever might be its operation upon the pious ignorant, nevertheless, was too likely, in spite of decorum, to set all sensible persons upon the titter. Singing sacred hymns to the airs of Bacchanalian songs and Scottish reels, is divine mirth indeed! The said Mr. Wesley, as well as Whitfield, notwithstanding their having received an university education, became field-preachers. That the intentions of those celebrated holders-forth were pious, there is no apparent reason for doubting—that they were learned in the sacred Scriptures there can be no doubt at all; and few, perhaps, will be found to dispute what has been asserted, namely, that they were men of good understanding; but there can be no slander in asserting, that, however they might boast of grace, they were not abounding in taste. The following, to wit:—"When I was at college," said this rival of Whitfield, "when I was at college, I was fond of the devil's pops (cards,) and every Saturday I was one at a party at whist—not only of an afternoon, but an evening. After this I became acquainted with the Lord. On my first acquaintance I used to talk with him once a week, then every day, then twice a day; then, on better acquaintance, as our intimacy increased, he appointed a meeting every four hours. Now, my dear friends! if you think there is no harm in the devil's pops, play with them. So with other things, hunting the hare, and going to assemblies, there staying till two or three o'clock, and dancing," as the pious old gentleman delicately expressed it, "belly to belly, and back to back." Why, if you think there is no harm in these things, go—and do as you list. But better to get into conversation with the Lord." It surely can not surprise, that preaching of this "cast and character," even admitting that the audacious mimic quoted "not always upon oath," exposed such in-door and out-of-door holders-forth, as fair game to those who had procured a license from Wit to sport in the field of Satire.

MERCURY AND THE DEVOUT ATHENIAN.

BY FRANCES WRIGHT.

A citizen was driving to the market of Athens the produce of his farm, and, by the way, fell into deep cogitation respecting the nature and attributes of Jupiter. "How great, how wise, how powerful, how wonderful art thou," he exclaimed, "O king of heaven, and ruler of the earth! Thy majesty is beyond conception and thy goodness beyond praise. All things were made by thy power and are sustained by thy providence. Thy hand upholdeth the frame of heaven and keepeth the foot of man from stumbling."—So saying, with his eyes uplifted in devout ecstasy, he plumped into a well.

On recovering his senses, which the suddenness and depth of his fall had somewhat stunned, he lifted up his hands and voice in the darkness, and fixing his gaze on the narrow circle of blue sky which closed the mouth of his prison, "O Jupiter!" he exclaimed, "have I neglected thy service or thy altars? Have I failed to attribute to thee all my good fortune, and to absolve thee of all my evil? Have I doubted thy power, or thy goodness, or thy providence? Oh, Father of gods and men! have mercy, and draw me out of this pit, where doubtless in thy wisdom thou hast thrown me, that I may sing aloud thy praises in the ears of all men, and moisten thy altars with the blood and fat of sacrifice in the sight of all eyes!"

Now it chanced that Mercury had occasion to pass that way on some especial business with the pickpockets of Athens. Hearing the wailings of distress, and being a person of curiosity, he stopped, and gazing from right to left, at length looked down into the well and shouted to ascertain the nature of the disaster, "Holla!" said the pleasant deity, as the voice now rose more distinctly to his ear. "Hath a man taken the position of a frog? What do ye there, I the name of the seven sages and of Lycurgus my especial patron?"

The citizen, who espied the winged cap of the Olympian messenger bending over the abyss, nothing doubted the success of his supplications and shouted his acknowledgements in a passion of gratitude. "O thou most wise, most just, most benignant deity! O Jove, Father of gods and men! thou hast heard the prayer of my affliction, and my soul shall bless thee all the days of my life!"

"By my divinity," cried Hermes, "but here is one of the mad philosophers of Minerva's mad city, comfortably entombed in a lodging, doubtless of his own choice and fashioning! The fates forbid that I should disturb thee, friend! A long life to thee, or a speedy death as thou wilt, and after thy decease all the honour which fell to Empedocles! Good morrow."

"Stay! O most divine messenger of most divine Jupiter! Fulfil the purpose of him who sent thee and draw me out of this watery pit into the light of the sun!"

"Nay, an' thy acquaintance be with Jupiter and thou waitest his sending, by my six wings! I have nought to do with thee. I have no commission from the son of Saturn; and seeing thou art in correspondence with him, interference on my part would be contrary to the rules of celestial politeness. Good morrow."

"Nay, but Hermes! Hermes! most amiable and most excellent divinity! forsake me not in this misery! Hear me, I pray thee, and let my extremity move thee to compassion."

"But if Jupiter has promised a rescue!—it would be unhandsome on my part to anticipate his charity. Or if thou art there under his sentence, in punishment of some offence offered to his authority—I tell thee my meddling in such a case would impeach my divine honour and my standing as a god of good breeding in the eyes of all Olympus."

"Thy divinity misconceives the matter, O most excellent son of Maia! I am not here by the decree of Jupiter, nor have I to my knowledge offended against his will, neither have I any warrant to expect his assistance!"

"Then how is the name of all disasters came ye into your present station, or why heaped ye so many blessings on the head of my respectable father? If thou hast eyes thou canst have little wit, if it was thy own wisdom which lodged thee in thy present habitation, seeing that Sol shines at his brightest, and that the road runs smooth and straight a good stone's pitch to the right."

"May it please your divinity," said the citizen, "I was guiding my beast to market charged with the fruits of my garden, under the blessing of your providence perhaps, if not of Jupiter's!"

"Not of mine truly," interrupted the god; nor of Jupiter's either, to my fancying, for I left him but now breakfasting heartily on Ambrosia, after singing a catch with Apollo to the lyre of the laughing Euphrosyne."

"Ah, well!" sighed the unhappy citizen, "your divinity doubtless knows best. But, even as I said, I was driving my beast to market, and by the way raised my thoughts to the contemplation of the gods and my voice in their praise; when lo! as my eyes were upcast towards the heavenly residence, and my voice uplifted in honour of the divine company, and, yet more especially, in that of the divine Jupiter, the Father of gods and men, I stumbled into this region of water and darkness even as thou seest. And hearing thy divine voice and perceiving thy divine wings, O most excellent Hermes! I even thought that it had pleased the divine Jupiter, the Father of Gods and men, to accept my homage, and that in his infinite goodness he had despatched thee to my aid, O most divine messenger!"

"Now thou most divine ass, or divine father of asses, which thou wilt," said Hermes, holding his sides, and laughing until the nectareous moisture trickled from his celestial eyes: "Truly, but thy folly overtops that of Athenæ's philosophers; and, but that it were pity to deprive that learned city of so excellent a fool, I could find in my heart to leave thee where thou art, to prosecute thy celestial contemplations, and practice patience until Jupiter stooped his ear from heaven to listen to thy flattery, and I made a flight hither expressly for thy rescue. But come, thou hast furnished a joke for the celestial Symposium which shall lose nothing in my relation, and hast afforded me a most excellent laugh, for which Mercury was never ungrateful. So, up with thee!" and lowering his caduceus to the touch of the half-frozen, half-drowned votary of Jupiter, he drew him like a feather from the depths of the dark abode, and landed him on the dry warm earth.

"Come, shake thyself, find thy beast, and betake thee to thy business! And, understand, that thou art more likely to thrive by fixing thy thoughts on what concerneth thee and thy fellow mortals, than by occupying them in imagining and admiring the concerns and perfections of the gods. Your nature is one, and theirs is another. Improve your own, of which you know something, instead of praising theirs, of which you know nothing. And, bethink you another time, that if you have a beast to drive, and figs to sell, so has Jupiter his business and pleasure to pursue, and I mine."

THE ACTRESS OF ALL WORK.

From Hook's Sayings and Doings—Third Series.

The following is a portrait of that unhappy miserable devil, the great woman of a strolling company; this lady, the star of the Taunton troop, which had the honour of calling Mr. Kekewich manager, was blessed with the euphonick appellation of Almerosa Fugglestone, and was in the habit of undergoing, in one night, labours which would make us forget those of Hercules, and which had gained the unqualified approbation of the elegant audiences of the theatres Leek, Bishop's Castle, Bullock Smithy and Bokton-le-moors; these labours consisted in nothing less than performing Ophelia, introducing the airs of Mad Tom, Home, sweet home, and we are a' noddin,—playing nineteen different characters in the afterpiece; going through the manual and platoon exercise in male attire standing upon a pewter plate; dancing minuet de la cour; giving imitations of Muscovy ducks, nightingales, the filing of a saw, two cats upon the pantiles, and of several London performers; and winding up this varied entertainment by dancing the college hornpipe, enveloped in 'white tights' and fireworks:—

"Wonderful woman, sir!" said Kekewich: "full of talent as an egg's full of meat—husband a stick—must have him—part of her articles—pity she married—fine creature, depend upon it—plays Ophelia in high style—finds her own dress—silk stockings and all—symmetrical figure, sweet temper, and coal black hair, down to the small of her back—great hit for me—short life and a merry one—snapped up for the London houses—manager sent down a doctor of divinity and two physicians to see her at Leek—nabbed her—snapped her up like a lamb from my flock—her own terms, and an engagement for her husband—of course the carte blanche made her cut the wagon—accepted the offer, and comes out in the metropolis in three weeks—you'll hear the last of her, sir—an opportunity is not to be missed."

"Has she been long on the stage?" said Skinner.

"Born behind the scenes, sir," replied Kekewich—"inhaled lamp air with her first breath: somehow, however, she did not acquire celebrity, until she got into a scrape with a lover—the Prince in Richard, or the page in the Purse, were her outsides, till she became a little suspected of impropriety—then sir, she was run after like an innocent hare, by a pack of mad dogs—you'll excuse the allegory—however, having created a sensation, she practically gave the lie to calumny and married purely for love, her present husband, Mr. Fugglestone—between you and me, he is not worth his salt; but he is a sine qua non in her engagements—such things happen with our betters, you know, sir—in political life, Mr. this thing won't take an office unless Mr. t'other thing is employed—the same with us in the Thespian kingdom; but she is as correct as Catalani—punctual as clockwork—husband always behind the scenes, cloak and clogs always sent, in wet weather—regular maid of her own at the stage door—umbrella and lanthorn—no gallantry, no gallivanting—as virtuous as a vestal—and as proud as a peacock."

"You must introduce me forthwith," said Skinner; "I conclude she will join our little annual fooleries at Bagsden."

"I'll see what can be done," said Kekewich. "I know she would not visit one of the aldermen of Leek, because his wife had once been suspected of a little blind partiality for the apothecary's apprentice—she has her little oddities, her crinkums and crankums—you comprehend sir? but, she is a powerful tragedian—commanding figure—fine person, what we in the profession call a capital first night woman—yet we all have our failings, Mr. Skinner." Skinner bowed.

"Present company always excepted, sir," said Kekewich, smiling at his own urbanity.

Mrs. Fugglestone has here—she is blessed, sir, with an appetite—a woman of strong feeling, and full of sentiment—but fond of her meals—you understand me, sir. This is not by way of hint—for at Bagsden plenty always crowns the board—but it is a fact—and I let you into the trait—into the dinner trait you say, I know—in order that you may not be struck at once. I found it out, merely by acting with her—whenever I had to embrace her on the stage, I detected an over addition to onions—you'll excuse this little enlightenment, but it is so—in Juliet, three or four nights since, I discovered garlick among the honey; however, this is but a speck upon the orb of day, and I must not complain, for she draws wonderfully."

"An artist, too?" said Skinner, inquiringly.

"A powerful artist, I assure you," replied Kekewich; "but not, as I take it, in your sense of the word—to draw with us, means to attract—I mean she attracts."

"I am not much surprised at that," said my hero, "considering the variety of her talent."

"No, to be sure, she is versatile enough," continued the manager, "and full of ability. She sings admirably—her Ophelia, I think you'll say, sir, is a beautiful bit of acting: the pathos—the madness—the melody—all first rate; and in private life, when you come to know her you'll find her quite the domestic creature—quite the pussycat on her own hearth; does a mutton-chop to a turn with the gravy in it; and for fried tripe, sir, there is not her equal in England. Shall we go call upon her now, I'll be sworn she is at home."

"Where do they lodge?" said Skinner.

"At the pastry cook's," said Kekewich.

Heard of your excellent Taunton mutton pies, no doubt—she says in her way that a good cook is a man of goods scents—like the smell—she's quite a wag when she's pleased—prodigious hit in London, sir."

"Let us go then," said Skinner, "I shall be too happy to make their acquaintance, and proffer my invitation."

"With all my heart," replied the manager, "I'll just direct my boy to get in a few things we want, to start with, and be with you in the twinkling of an eye."

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1828.

Mr. Elisha Wilcox, of the Canal Bookstore Encyclopedia, is our authorized agent on the line of the Erie canal.

The London Literary Gazette for the months of February and March, the London Mirror and Atlas's Magazine for March and April have all been received at this office during the last week.

Each of our city subscribers as have changed their place of residence, will please to inform the carrier, or leave information at our office.

EDITORIAL DIARY.

May 17. Saint Paschal Babylon; Saint Possidius; Saint Maden, Saint Maw; Saint Cathan, and Saint Silave. On the 17th May, 1817, died at Heckington, England, Mr. Samuel Jessup, aged sixty-five years. During the last twenty-one years of his life, he took, on an average, twenty-nine pills a day, amounting in that time to 228,934. He did not however commence with this appetite for physic, but from moderate but regular doses he gradually increased his daily allowance, till he swallowed regularly each day, seventy-eight pills; 51,600 per year. Add to this 40,000 bottles of mixtures, which he also swallowed during the same twenty-one years, and we are astonished that he should ever arrive at the advanced age we have just mentioned.

May 18. Saints Erick, Theodotus, Venantius, and Potamon. We are aware that few of our readers are ignorant of the fact, that the disease usually known by the term "King's Evil," was formerly believed to be curable by the touch of a king; hence the origin of its name. In the reign of Charles II., when this popular superstition had perhaps nobody to call its absurdity to the test of reason, the monarch was so perpetually harassed by the applications of his people, (whom, by the bye, Cromwell had well nigh cured forever,) that the following police was published in one of the London papers, bearing date May 18, 1661.

Notice.

"His sacred majesty having declared it to be his royal will and pleasure to continue the healing of his people for the Evil during the month of May; and then give over till Michaelmas next, I am commanded to give notice thereof, that the people may not come up to the town in the interim and lose their labour."

May 19. Saint Peter Celestine; Saint Pudenciana; Saint Dunstan.—1536, Anne Boleyn, the unfortunate queen of Henry VIII., was executed, to gratify the supremacy of brutality which her husband held, unrivalled.—1692, the great naval battle off La Hogue, in which the French fleet was defeated by the combined force of the Dutch and English, under admiral Russell.—1813, on this and the two following days, three battles were fought between the French army and the allies, near the village of Bautzen, Upper Saxony, in which the latter were driven. Nearly 20,000 men were slain on a side; and the result of the battle was an armistice for sixty days.

May 20. Saints Bernadine, Ethelbert, and Yvo. On the 20th of May, 1736, the body of Samuel Baldwin was immersed without ceremony, in the sea at Lymington, Hants, England. This extraordinary mode of interment was in obedience to a clause in his will which the testator had provided to deprive his surviving wife from dancing over his grave;—a contempt which this modern Xantippe had previously threatened to execute, should she survive him.—1755, the articles of confederation and perpetual union were agreed to between the American colonies; hence we may date our existence as an organized government.

May 21. Saints Felix, Godrick, and Mospitus.—1777, Warren Hastings, late governor general of Bengal, was impeached at the bar of the British house of lords, of high misdemeanour, and after a trial which lasted eight years, during which the court actually sat 149 days, he was acquitted April 14, 1795.—1809, the Austrians were defeated with the loss of 20,000 men, at Aspern, in Austria, by the French army, under Buonaparte.

May 22. Saints Yvo, Basiliscus, Castus, Amilius, Bubo, and Conall. Saint Yvo, who is honoured in the church by the observance of this day, is not the same whose name is placed against the 20th of the same month. The Saint Yvo, whose nativity is celebrated on that day, was bishop of Chartres, in 1116; whereas the present Saint Yvo flourished nearly two hundred years later.—1807, Aaron Burr, vice president of the United States was arraigned before the supreme court of the United States on a charge of high treason. His trial commenced at Richmond, the 3d day of August following.

May 23. Saints Julia and Desiderius. This is the anniversary of the Battle of Ramilles, in the Netherlands, near Namur. A splendid victory was gained by the British under the great duke of Marlborough, over the French. The religious community have all heard of the pious colonel Gardiner; and perhaps perused with delight his religious writings, which have been given to the public. In this battle he was but an ensign, and was dangerously wounded, by a musket shot, which entered his mouth without injuring his teeth, or the tongue, and went through his neck. He lay all night among his dying companions, and it was considered by his friends, as well as himself, as almost a miracle that he ever recovered. He had before that event been noted as one of the most profligate of youth; but a radical reformation gave the world a worthy man; and an exemplary christian.

BACHELORS' JOURNAL. This periodical has appeared, in a neat quarto form, on good paper, good type, and tout ensemble as fair a specimen of good taste, so far as relates to the mechanical execution, as any we know of. Thus much must be said in favour of its appearance. Its design and principles are another thing; and before we give an opinion on its beneficial or detrimental effects on the happiness of community, it is proper to examine thoroughly the merits of the great question which its very existence presents to the public attention. We will then canvass its pretensions to the patronage of the American people.

It is extremely natural for any denomination or sect, whether they have embraced their particular creed through necessity, cowardice, accident, or choice, to support it with the utmost warmth, and a zeal worthy in most cases of a better cause. Thus we see in the common enterprises into which our acquaintances so frequently enter, that the timorous churl who dares not risk the chance, hugs himself up in his safety, and seems very contented with the want of what a little more courage might have ensured to him, while he inwardly envies the better lot of his more prosperous neighbour; and, though he will not own it, would give double what he had before to risk for the return of a similar opportunity. Thus too do we see those who have sued for favours to those who had them to grant, and that again and again, without success, when they have fairly given up the chase, and laid down their suit in disgust,—not to say in despair,—then for the first declare their independence of their privations, and "turn tail to," as they say in the terms of sportsmen. It is also very common for those whom fate has in a measure debarked from the fruition of their desires to say with the contented Caledonian, "We have muckle cause to be thankful that we are as we are." And those who willfully turn their backs on both duty and reason,—we can expect nothing more or less from them than an obstinate perseverance in the evil of their ways. Under one or the other of the above characters may every devotee to the cause of Bachelorism find his own history. Who will deny it?

We see much and we hear much of the independence which the bachelor enjoys. Is it real?—or only an affectation assumed to palliate the inward sense of a most abject and mortifying dependence? The poor bachelor must be dependent for many nice little things which are eminently necessary to his hourly comfort. He must depend on some one for his cooking, his washing, his mending, and such little offices of mutual assistance which nature seems to have designed the respective sexes to afford each other. And on whom is he thus dependent? Not on any being who has any interest in his personal welfare. Not on one who is ready to read his wishes in his eye, and strives to anticipate the petitions which proceed from his lips. But on mere strangers; over whose actions he has not the least authority, and who care more for his money than his comfort.

This is a serious and uncoloured drawing of the evils of Bachelorism, to refute which we defy them, with their whole united talent and philosophy. The world is against them; and especially that sex which has been aptly styled "heaven's last best gift to man."

We fear, from what we have already said, that we shall be understood to have doubts of the beneficial tendency of the Bachelors' Journal. We beg leave to assure all, both advocates and opponents, that our opinion is altogether in favour of it. Our reasons for this opinion are founded, not on the belief that it is likely to be feebly and spiritlessly conducted. They are more charitable towards the talents of the editors; and we will say further, that the more meritorious and praiseworthy their labours are in the opinion of the fraternity of bachelors, so much the more good to society in general do we believe will result from a wide and free circulation of their paper. In the first place, as universal happiness is concerned in our best wishes, if this journal can reconcile one sorrowing lonely bachelor, by dint of argument, no matter how much tinged with sophistry, to a patient and cheerful resignation to his hard fate, one good end will be answered. Again, as truth is the ultimate aim of most readers, if there be yet in the ranks of celibacy one wavering subject, who has hitherto clung to the singleness of his lot, believing that there might yet be some good reason for tarrying thus, he may be induced to search the lean catalogue of objections to matrimony with candour; and the result will be his complete conversion to reason. Once more, as literature is concerned,—and good taste in that department ought to be the cause espoused by all,—the foolish vagaries of lovesick poets and silly sonneteers will of course be subjected to wholesome chastisement through its columns; and even if the Journal pass into the other extreme, and cherish the coldness of stoicism, it is but fairly to be expected that every folly will find in its opposite the surest motive to correction.

As to its support, there can be no doubt of a patronage equal to the most sanguine wishes of its friends. Its correspondents, having no wives and little ones to feed, clothe and educate, will have so much the more inclination to fly from their sorrows to their pens; and we may expect to find it a permanent fund of wit and amusement. It will be patronized and read by all classes. The wedded will eagerly run over its contents, to laugh at its qualmish objections which they have refuted by experiment; and while they sympathize with the children of error, will rejoice in the children of their love. Old maids will certainly patronize it; for there they may learn the full force of their adversaries, and study more profitably the surest means to subdue them. In short every body will read it; and we do in good faith commend it to the public as truly and richly worthy their attention and support.

The Bachelors' Journal is published every Thursday, by Samuel G. Andrews, No. 30, Market-street, Boston, at $2 per annum in advance.

FOR AN ALBUM.

'Tis a stranger defaces
This beautiful sheet,
To blend with its graces
His tuneless conceit;
Though vainly and boldly
He proffers the token,
The muse hath not coldly
Nor recklessly spoken.

Bright eyes shall glance o'er this,
Which mine have not met;
And memory shall store this,
Which I must forget;
For why should I cherish
The thoughts I have wasted,
When better hopes perish
No sooner than tasted.

Yet here will I pride me
To trace one dull line—
No eyes to deride me,
But kind ones like thine—
And when friends are thought on,
Through joy, toil, or danger,
O, leave not forgotten
The rhyme-driving stranger!

TO CATHARINE.

I would I were at gay nineteen
With heart as light as thine;
I'd win a smile from thee, I ween,
My lovely Catharine;
For now, even when my heart is sore,
'T will wake at beauty's touch—
'T will throb with pain at beauty's tear,—
'T will feel, alas! too much.

For oft I've seen thine agile form
Threading the mazy dance,
And felt my blood wax quick and warm
Beneath thy thrilling glance.
And yet for me perchance 't is well
That I am not like thee;
For if I were, oh, who can tell
How weak this heart might be?

For thee I own a brother's love—
A brother's kindest care;
And though in distant lands I rove,
I'll bear thine image there,—
Beneath the myrtle's fragrant shades
Or in the orange grove,

Where stray the sportive southern maids—
Where wings the turtle dove.
I'll think of thee, sweet Catharine!
And breathe a brother's prayer,—
That round thy path fate may entwine
All that is bright and fair;
That you may feel nor pain nor wo
While down life's stream you glide,
And the young bosom never know
A wish ungratified.

EVENING FANCY.

The glorious sunlight lingers
Upon the misty west,
And evening's dewy fingers
Pass o'er the earth's green breast;
Glad meeting gloom and glory!
My pleasure loves the hour,
Yet thought will steal on lifted heel
To melancholy's bower.

An April sun is falling
Behind the ocean wave,
And night is softly calling
Her shadows from the grave;—
I love the stilly breathings
Of nature in her sleep,
And I will go while fading so,
The lingering light doth keep!

A girl is far in heaven
Who hath my heart's first love;
Oft by my feeling driven,
I watch the curved above;
I think how far her spirit
Hath passed beyond the sun;
And oft that she forgetteth me,
Since her earth's life is done.

It is a woful flowing,
A sad wrong way of soul,
That mocketh pleasure's glowing,
And putteth back the roll
Of happy thoughts; and giveth
Strong tinge to grief's alloy;
I will not cast to its sure blast
Life's every coming joy.

Look now, my soul, around thee,
And mark the earth at rest;
Thy early childhood found thee
Of all the earth the best;
Look to the stilly heaven,—
And—ha! a snow-drop there?
It is! and see! it seeketh me!
One lonely flake, and fair!

Why is thy flight thus hovering,
Thou fallen flower of sky?
Thy reckless kin were covering
Our world in days gone by:
I love thee, spotless phantom!
For thou art from on high!
Perhaps hast known, ere thou wast flown,
My love, whose life passed by.

MARY saith—"angels bless thee!"
I will for aye be thine!
Thy MARY would caress thee—
Doth send thee down a sign—
Her spirit's grief is swelling,
That thou shouldst doubt her heart—
Now drink thy tears, and drown thy fears!—
Thus shall thy grief depart!"

Where was the sign—her sending?
I dropped upon my knee—
The little flake was blending
A blush, and strife to flee!
The rover was departed,
But left a precious boon,—
A pearly tear!—It shineth here
In the chill midnight moon!

STANZAS.

No—no—I knew it could not be!
I knew ye could not break the spell,
Which, caught from love's deep mystery,
My heart and lute had learned so well.
Why did ye bid me wake a strain
Of lightness, when ye should have known,
The crushed heart ne'er can feel again
Joy—once—but now no more—its own!

Oh, think not thus the stream is won Forth from its deepening course to err—
Nor seek light hearted smiles from one
Whose heart is but their sepulchre.
I could not—no, I would not change
The notes my lute so loves to breathe,
Through pleasure's loveliest bowers to range,
Or wear eternal glory's wreath!

Glory!—where is its magic now?
What is it to a heart like mine—
Bound by a deep and fearful vow
To worship at another shrine?
I seek not now the deathless name
That lives in inspiration's tone—
For what hath lie to do with fame,
Whose heart and lute are sorrow's own!

JUAN.

ORDINATION HYMN,

BY REV. J. PIERPONT.

O God, we see thee smile again
In the sweet sunshine of the spring;
Thou comest in the gracious rain,
Thou ridest on the wind's soft wing.

Thou visitest the vales in floods
That in their fulness roll along;
And when thou breakest on the woods,
They wave in pomp, and wake with song.

And, Lord, are not thy goings thus
In this our sanctuary seen?
Comes not thy breath of life to us,
Our prospects clothing all in green?

Reviving hopes around us bud,—
Hopes that were rooted long ago,
But languished till thy grace, in flood,
Returned and bade them swell and blow.

What though for years thy feeble flock
By hands of strangers hath been fed?
What though we've long drawn near our rock
Without a shepherd at our head?

We humbly hope that not in vain
We've borne the trials of our trust;
And that thy truth will rise like grain,
The stronger for its sleep in dust.

For days of care, and hope deferred,
O grant us years of large increase,
Till from above thy voice is heard;
Ye faithful ones, depart in peace."

LIFE'S WEATHER-GAGE.

THE LAST SONG WRITTEN BY CHARLES DIBBIS.

I'm for Tom Tiller's golden maxim,
Who studies life in every stage;
He'll tell you plainly if you ax him,
Content 's this life's best weather-gage.
I own Tom has but little learning,
Such as your flats pick up at school;
Yet he is cunning and discerning,
And though no conjurer, Tom's no fool.

A tar 's (cried Tom) to peace a stranger,
'Fore fortune's tempest cuts and drives,
No single moment free from danger—
And so does every man that lives.
In toil and peril he his part takes,
Stands fire, and hurricane, and shot;
He has his qualms, his headaches, heartaches—
And where 's the lubber that has not?

The gold he gets does good to others,
Though he at random lets it fly;
For as mankind are all his brothers,
He keeps it in the family.
Hair-breadth escapes each hour he weathers,
No moment he can call his own,
And thus are men put to their tethers,
Up from the cottage to the throne.

The thing is this—in every station
We're born for pleasures and for trouble;
And if you strike to each vexation,
Good Hope's true cape you'll never double.
But take the good and evil cheerly,
And sum up creditor and debtor;
If in this world they use you queerly,
Be honest and you'll find a better.

Here lies retired from busy scenes
A first lieutenant of marines,
Who lately lived in peace and plenty
On board the ship the Atalanta:
Now, stripped of all his warlike show,
And laid in box of elm below,
Confined to earth in narrow borders,
He rises not till further orders.

FREEMASONRY IN ENGLAND.

We learn by English papers that the whole number of lodges registered with the United Grand Lodge of England, is only 816. Of these 783 have been instituted during the last century, and 132 in the last ten years. The increase for the last ten years is equal to the first thirty years of the century. Seven have been added during the last year. From this and other facts; we learn, that however other powers may restrict the order, it will flourish in every country where civil and religious liberty are enjoyed; and the more or less in proportion as that liberty is more or less universal. This we may prove by putting the increase of the order in England, and particularly in America, in comparison with any other nations on earth of proportionate population. The increase in America is doubtless double, in proportion to its population, to any other nation or country on the globe; and in England, we see as she advances in the liberal reform which she has gradually been making for the last two centuries, that the increase of masonick light bears the same invariable evidence of its love of liberty.

FUNERAL SOLEMNITIES.

On Thursday the sixth of March last, the last honours were paid to the remains of Brigadier General JOHN GEDDES, and his son JOHN GEDDES, jr. esq., by the military, masonick fraternity, legislative and municipal authority, and citizens of Charleston, South-Carolina.

In public life, general Geddes has been governor of the state, and also speaker of the house of Representatives of South-Carolina, and Intendant of the city of Charleston for many years. He had also been several times Grand Master of Masons in that state; and at the time of their death, both father and son were members of the same lodge, in the city of Charleston.

The procession moved between 11 and 12 o'clock, in the following order:—

- The military.
- Masonick lodges in proper order.
- Knights Templars.
- Musick.
- Officers of the Grand Lodge of South Carolina.
- Grand Master B. F. HUNT.
- The reverend Clergy.
- Body of John Geddes jr., supported by six masonick pall bearers.
- General Geddes's horse, with accoutrements.
- Body of general Geddes, supported by six military, and six masonick pall bearers; the latter of whom five were Past Grand Masters, and the other, Past Deputy Grand Master.
- Servants of the deceased; Mourners; Brigade officers; Officers of the United States' Army and Navy; Division officers; Governour and staff; Municipal officers; the Judiciary; Members of the bar, and Citizens. At the church, the funeral service was performed by the Rev. Mr. Buist, and a concluding prayer by the Rev. Mr. Palmer. The bodies were then conveyed to the place of interment, where the ceremonies were concluded by the customary military and masonick honours.

Charleston papers speak of the procession as numerous and respectable as ever had been witnessed in the city. The bells commenced tolling at an early hour, and continued until the closing of the ceremonies.

At a special communication of the Grand Lodge of Ancient Freemasons of South-Carolina, held on Thursday the 6th March,

It was, on motion, unanimously resolved, that this Grand Lodge have witnessed with deep regret the death of their late Past Grand Master, Brother JOHN GEDDES, and as a testimony of their respect for the memory of their deceased brother, the Grand Lodge hereby recommends to the officers and members thereof, and those under their jurisdiction to wear crape on the left arm for the space of thirty days; and that the Grand Lodge be clothed in mourning for the same space of time.

By order of the M. W. G. L.

E. HUGHES, G. Sec'y.

MASONICK CEREMONIES.

The foundation stone of Washington Lock, No. 1, on the line of the Pennsylvania canal, was laid with masonick honours, at Pittsburgh, on Saturday the 3d of May inst., by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania. Judge Shaler, the district Grand Master, being prevented by necessary legal business from attending, Magnus M. Murray, esq., mayor of Pittsburgh, Past Grand Master of the district, presided. The procession was formed at 3 o'clock, the masonick body being arranged in proper form, and preceded by captain McCandless's company of city blues. The canal commissioners, engineers, architects, &c., formed a part of the masonick body. Thus arranged, the procession moved from the hall in Water-street, through Water, Market, and Third-streets, to the lock. An immense concourse of spectators covered the high grounds bordering on the canal; and from the windows, balconies, and roofs of the houses of the city, people were seen, one above another, eager to see the ceremony performed.

The Grand Master then addressed the craft, and proceeded to place the stone, pronouncing it well formed, true and trusty. The Grand Treasurer, Brother A. Shaw, made the customary deposits,—coins, scrolls, &c. Upon one of the latter was the following inscription:

"This corner stone of Washington Lock No. 1, of the Pennsylvania canal was laid according to the ancient usages of freemasonry, by a Grand Lodge of ancient York masons, composed of lodges Nos. 45, 113, 165, and 173, working under the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, and many sojourning brethren—the 3d day of May, A. D. 1828, A.

The other scrolls contained the names of the different lodges, their officers, &c., in the vicinity of the city; the officers of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania; the names of the canal commissioners and engineers; the municipal authority of Pittsburgh, and other notes and records, properly arranged by brother S. Jones.

The working tools were then presented to the architects, with an appropriate charge; and an address was delivered by brother James Ross. The brethren then returned to the lodge, after which they partook of a sumptuous collation, provided for them by the liberality of the canal contractors. The company departed, expressing the highest satisfaction with every part of the day's exercises, which nothing but the fineness of the atmosphere and the good feelings between all classes could equal.

The first stone of the "Christiana Presbyterian Church of Wilmington" in the state of Delaware, was laid on Monday the 5th inst. by the Grand Lodge of the state of Delaware, in masonick form. We learn by the papers of that borough, that there were nearly two hundred brethren present, and an immense concourse of spectators. The procession was formed at 12 o'clock, in masonick order, when it moved through the Kennet road, and Shipley-street, to Third-street, where it was joined by the clergy and the building committee of the new church; thence through Shipley to Front-street, where it was joined by the Burgesses and borough council; thence through Shipley, Water, Market, and Hanover streets to the site of the building at the corner of Hanover and King streets. The Grand Lodge then proceeded to the ceremony of laying the stone, in which the usual deposits were made; several anthems were sung by the Wilmington Harmonick Society, one of which was composed for the occasion, by the Rev. Joseph Wilson, Grand Chaplain. A prayer was offered, and a highly appropriate address delivered by the Rev. Mr. Danforth; after which the stone was placed in its destined position, and pronounced well formed, true, and trusty, by Deputy Grand Master colonel Josiah F. Clement, acting Grand Master in the absence of G. M. Naudain; and during the singing, corn, wine, and oil were poured upon it, and the blessing of the Almighty Architect invoked on the workmen to be employed in the erection and preservation of the building. The ceremonies were concluded by an address to the Throne of Grace, by Rex. Mr. Danforth. The ladies who assisted in the singing, are especially entitled to the thanks of the brethren, for their timely and efficient assistance.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

ON REARING SILK WORMS UPON LETTUCES ONLY.

In a letter from Mr. Edw. Hoard, Chymist, to the editor of the London Technological Repository, dated London, Dec. 29, 1828.

The culture of silk has, for some time past, engaged my labours and attention; I diligently read all that has been written on rearing of silk worms in England for the last forty years; and I have daily weighed the plausible objections urged against their successful propagation, from a scanty supply of food especially of that description of it which they are said to prefer, viz. the mulberry leaf.

I am clearly of opinion that too much stress has hitherto been laid upon the necessity of confining the worms solely to the leaf of the mulberry tree. The results of various experiments I have made, have fully demonstrated, that the nature of food has very little to do with the quantity or quality of the silk produced; these deviations arise from quite different causes. Any vegetable which these insects can relish, so as to constitute their daily food, upon which they evidently thrive and attain maturity, is equally well calculated to supply silk of the same quality, and in equal quantity, as that from the mulberry! These conclusions, I am aware, stand quite opposed to the notions generally entertained; but we should be governed by facts alone; and a variety of experiments, rigorously conducted with different species of vegetables, have decisively confirmed my opinion.

I have during the present year (1827) reared several hundred worms upon a species of LETTUCE obtained from abroad which have gone through their successive changes, and spun silk of a quality and in quantity equal to that obtained from a corresponding number, fed entirely on the mulberry leaf. Indeed in a few instances, the cocoons were much larger, and the silk double the quantity, in these fed on this lettuce, but on an average there was at least an equality of produce. I have further the pleasure to add, that I have a second generation of these worms, spontaneously hatched this autumn, which have, throughout their larva state, solely subsisted on this lettuce diet, have attained maturity, and in produce yielded similar results. The superiority of this lettuce, over those indigenous to the soil of England, consists in its being less succulent, producing very large leaves, less stalk, and consequently affording less opium (which may be injurious to them) than the common lettuce—the worms, too, invariably give it the preference. In a rich soil, placed at a proper distance from each other, they attain an immense size, and are, therefore, more economical.

It has been conjectured by naturalists, that the mulberry leaf "contains a silky tissue," which is assimilated by the worm, and afterwards spun; were this the case, and this silky matter exclusively found in the leaf of the mulberry, it would naturally follow, that no other food could supply the insect with the requisite materials for forming silk; but the above recited experimental trial, of an exclusive lettuce diet, and its favorable termination, exposes at once the fallacy of such a theory, and confirms the practicability of rearing them entirely on other food.

If we examine a worm in the act of spinning, no vestige of silk appears externally: on destroying the animal and opening its body, there is an equal absence of a silky filament within; a gold coloured, thick, viscous fluid is usually found, and this unquestionably must be the basis of the silk obtained.

It strikes me then, as a probable operation carried on, that this fluid, by a vermicular motion, is gradually ejected into the mouth of the animal, where it undergoes a change, either by abstraction, or absorption of some principle, which renders it convertible from a fluid to a solid state, gives it tenuity and susceptibility of being drawn into a long continuous thread, by the natural instinct and efforts of this industrious animal, until the whole of this juice is thus expended, and then it proceeds to enter into another state of existence, in which it has its last and most important duty to perform—that of perpetuating its species.

I assume it as a fact, sustained fully by my own experiments, that whatever description of food this insect can consume, which ripens it to maturity, and preserves its animal juice in a healthy state, is doubtless fit for the formation of silk; but the quantity must, in a great measure, depend upon the species, size and constitutional energies of the individual worm; a variation often observable in those fed on mulberry leaves, as well as with any other diet.

The primary cause of a defect in the quality and deficiency in the quantity of silk obtained from these insects, (commonly attributed to the quality of the food) proceeds in reality, from errors in the treatment of these animals. When too great a number are congregated together, and no adequate provisions made to remove, frequently, their ordure, in order to keep them perfectly dry and clean; when irregularity in the hours of feeding occur, and their food is not administered free from moisture, and in proper proportions, to avoid waste, being trampled on, or covered with their excrement; when the bodies of those who have died in their various sicknesses are not speedily removed, to prevent contamination; when ventilation is neglected, and a proper temperature not preserved; disease will inevitably be the consequence; the functions of the animal become impaired, and such a state of imbecility will necessarily produce a deteriorated quality, and a diminished quantity of silk.

It is to this cause principally, and not to the quality of the food, that such discrepancies are owing; for it is a well ascertained fact, that these animals will not devour food injurious to their existence; and as lettuces are proved to be as good food for them as mulberry leaves and can be cultivated in all seasons, in sufficient abundance, the main difficulty of their propagation is thus obviated.

There is a consideration, which above all others [in the culture of silk] demands our most grave and immediate attention; and it has, I fear, been much over-looked, or is not generally known.

It is an ascertained fact, that there are different species of the silk worm, some yielding even more than double the quantity of silk that others do; and this silk of a superior quality and colour.

The crops of silk may be doubled by a second generation, in our common temperature; and by ARTIFICIAL HEAT and suitable ventilation, with other concurrent precautions, may be made to yield even three or four crops of silk in succession the same year!

INCREASED SEVERITY OF THE CLIMATE OF NORTH AMERICA.

From the Halifax Nova Scotian.

On few subjects have the opinions of people in North America been more concurrent, than on that of a progressive improvement of their climate. To cast a glance over the former wilderness map of the continent, and then over the present village picture, diversified with marks of agricultural dominion, seems to be in accordance with popular impressions, all that is necessary for securing a continuance in, and giving weight and circulation to, these opinions. A theory, more controvertible by those who choose to be guided exclusively by facts, than that thus generally formed, could not perhaps be set up, though it would be difficult to point out one; which has received more from the combined countenance of talent and prejudice.

Hakluit, in the notes to his history of the Newfoundland Fisheries, relates that one Savalet, a native of Gascony in France, made forty-two voyages to L'Acadien, (Nova Scotia.) They commenced in 1566 and ended 1607. One circumstance of the history is important to the present inquiry. The vessel of Savalet was frozen up in Annapolis River, but the spring thaw coming, she put to sea again, in the month of March, to the great joy of the men on board. This happened in 1583. Vol. i. p. 112.

The author whose testimony I shall cite next, is the Sieur Abbeville. A few years after the treaty of St. Germain (1633) this person joined the Company of New France, and visited the Canadas and Acadia. The country lying between the 45th and 48th degrees of north latitude, he describes as having, generally, a hot soil, favourable for prolific vegetation. The Indians were accustomed to launch their barks in the rivers and streams, the latter part of March. From the first of April, a light dress, or doublet, (pierpoint) was worn by most persons, and in the same month, hunting parties in their expeditions were obliged to escape at noon, under some shelter, from the heat of the sun. In his description of some of the animals of North America, the same author alludes to the periods when the weasel and hare (bellette et lievre) began to put on their white livery, and if he was any way careful in his observations, it would appear that these quadrupeds wore their summer coats a month longer than they do at present.

One of the Missionaries of Syllery, who, in 1636, founded the Jesuits College at Quebec, was Father De Pon. We find this person thus describing part of an excursion he had taken with some friends in the month of April, into the country adjoining the capital of Canada.

"We sat down under a broad beech tree, and the birds around us seemed to have a friendly contention for the pleasures of the scene. There were some field flowers, to show us what a teeming earth it was, while frolick lambs were seen about the thatched houses of the settlers, seeking a cool shelter from the fervent sun, and comfort from the swollen udders of their dams."

Perhaps the most satisfactory and important historical compte rendu of the former state of our climate, is that of Monsieur Lescarbot, who, in the reign of Henry IV. of France, visited and prosecuted some researches in the transatlantic dominions of that monarch. It is to be found in the History of New France, Paris edition, 1609, p. 623. The author spent his time principally at Annapolis, Nova Scotia.

The particulars it communicated explanative of our climate are the following:

1st. More than two centuries ago, morning frosts in Nova Scotia, were not so sharp as to occasion inconvenience, until about the end of January, and through February.

2d. Previous to this period in January, it was customary for the author and others to be lightly clothed.

3d. Annapolis River, (le riviore de l'Equille,) was, on the 11th March, perfectly navigable, so much so, that he and his friends amused themselves on it, on a Sunday afternoon, with music and singing.

4th. In the same month, they made an excursion in the country adjoining the Citadel, where the corn (winter grain) was growing, and dined pleasantly in the open air (au sol il).

In another place, p. 625, the author states also, that the Acadians began to dig and sow their gardens in the latter part of March.

I shall, in a forthcoming article, exhibit registers of temperature for the last fifty years, in proof that the climate of North America has been gradually passing from a state of warmth to a state of cold.

BEECHING LIQUID.

From Braide's Lectures.

When water is added to the chloride of lime, it effects its partial decomposition; one half of the chlorine leaves the lime, and dissolves in the water; and this is the bleaching liquid of the shops, which is sold at a high rate, although it cannot cost more than a farthing a gallon. Sometimes this fluid is applied immediately to the substance to be bleached, but sometimes a weak acid is added to destroy the slight affinity of the chlorine for the lime, and you will see by this addition, how much the bleaching power of the fluid is increased. The manufactory of the chloride of lime is carried on on a large scale in the north of England, by passing chlorine into leaden chambers containing hydrate of lime in fine powder.

THE GATHERER.

BOSWELLIANA.

The following anecdotes are related by, or relate to, the well known James Boswell, who conducted Dr. Johnson to the Highlands of Scotland.

It may be recollected that when Boswell took the doctor to his father's house, the old laird of Auchinleck remarked, that "Jamie had brought an odd kind o' a chiel wi' him?" "Sir," said Boswell, "he is the grand luminary of our hemisphere,—quite a constellation, sir."—"Ursa Major, (the Great Bear,) I suppose," said the laird.

Some snip-snap wit was wont to pass between the sire and son. "Jamie" was bred an advocate, and sometimes pleaded at the bar. Pleading on a particular occasion, before his father, who, at that time, was "Ordinary on the bills," and saying something which his lordship did not like, he exclaimed to Jamie, "Ye're an ass, mon."—"No, my lord," replied Jamie, "I am not an ass, but I am a colt, the foal of an ass!"

In 1785, Boswell addressed "A Letter to the People of Scotland" on a proposed alteration in the court of session. He says in this pamphlet, "When a man of probity and spirit, a lord Newhall, whose character is ably drawn in prose by the late lord president Arniston, and elegantly in verse by Mr. Hamilton of Bangor,—when such a man sits among our judges, should they be disposed to do wrong, he can make them fear and tremble. My honoured father told me, the late lord Auchinleck, that Sir Walter Pringle 'spoke as one having authority'—even when he was at the bar, 'he would cram a decision down their throats.'"

Boswell tells in the same "Letter," that "Duncan Forbes of Culloden, when lord president of the court, gave every day as a toast at his table, 'Here's to every lord of session who does not deserve to be hanged!' Lord Auchinleck and lord Monboddo, both judges, but since his time, are my authority," says Boswell, "for this. I do not say that the toast was very delicate, or even quite decent, but it may give some notion what sort of Judges there may be."

It is further related of Boswell, that a person was executed to please his laird. "Before the heritable jurisdictions were abolished, a man was tried for his life in the court of one of the chieftains. The jury were going to bring him in 'not guilty,' but somebody whispered them, that 'the young laird had never seen an execution,' upon which their verdict was—'death,' and the man was hanged accordingly."

This is only to be paralleled by the story of the Highland dame, whose sense of submission to the chief of her clan induced her to insinuate want of proper respect in her husband, who had been condemned, and showed some reluctance to the halter. "Git up, Donald," said the 'guid wife' to her 'ain guid man; "Git up Donald, and be hangit, an' dinna anger the laird."

A PRINCESS A-PICK-A-PACK.

The great constable of France, Anne de Montmorency, a man whose valour and military skill was only exceeded by his pride, his cruelty, and his bigotry, was ordered by Francis I. to carry on his shoulders, or any way that he could contrive it, his niece, the princess of Navarre, to the altar, where she was, against her will, to be married to the duc de Cleves. Brantome observes, that this was a hard task, as the little lady was so loaded with jewels, and rich brocade of gold and silver, that she could scarcely walk. The whole court were amazed at the king's command, the queen of Navarre was pleased, as she wished her daughter to be humbled, on account of her having imbibed Lutheran principles; but the constable was much hurt, at being exposed to the ridicule of the whole world, and said, "It is henceforward over with me; my favour at court is passed away;" accordingly, he was dismissed as soon as the wedding was over.

SIZE AND VALUE OF MAHOGANY.

These boats (says Roberts in his voyages to the East coast on Central America,) were each cut out of a single tree, one mahogany, the other cedar: measuring about thirty-five feet in length; nearly six feet in breadth; and above five feet in depth. Few people are acquainted with the immense size and value of some logs of mahogany brought to this country. The following may serve as an example. "The largest and finest log of mahogany ever imported into this country, has been recently sold by auction at the docks in Liverpool. It was purchased by James Hodgson, esq. for three hundred and seventy-eight pounds, and afterwards sold by him for five hundred and twenty-five pounds, and if it open well, it is supposed to be worth one thousand pounds. If sawn into veneers, it is computed that the cost of labour in the process will be seven hundred and fifty pounds. The weight at the King's beam is six tons thirteen hundred weight."

PASQUIN OR PASQUINADE.

Takes its name from a cobbler at Rome, called Pasquin, famous for his sneers and gibes; and whose shop was the resort of a number of idle people, who diverted themselves with bantering folks as they passed by. After Pasquin's death, as they were digging up the pavement before his shop, they found a statue of an ancient gladiator, well cut, but maimed, and half spoiled. This they set up in the place where it was found, at the corner of the deceased Pasquin's shop, and by common consent, called it by the name of the defunct. From that time all satires and lampoons are ascribed to this figure. This statue is to be seen in a corner of the Palace of the Ursini, at Rome, and lampoons are frequently put in its mouth or pasted against it.

CLERICAL DRESS.

We never could understand the reason for the clergy being clad in black. Why should the messengers of glad tidings wear that gloomy colour? There are certain offices, which from their ill-boding nature would seem to render a black dress appropriate—such, for example, are those of the lawyer, the sheriff, the executioner, the undertaker, &c. But he, who proclaims peace here, and life and immortality hereafter, should rather be clad in garments of white, as emblematical of the joyous nature of his mission as well as indicative of the purity of character which the pastor of the flock should sustain. [Berkshire American.]

TAKING A LIBERTY.

The most singular instance of British pride is related of a man, known in his time by the name of the "Proud Duke of Somerset." This pillar of "the Corinthian capital of polished society" married a second wife. One day, with an affectionate case, she suddenly threw her arm round his neck; and fondly saluted him. "Madam," said the unmanly peer, "my first wife was a Percy, and she would not have taken such a liberty."

UPRIGHTNESS IN DEATH.

Of German pride we have the following extraordinary anecdote:—A German lord left orders in his will not to be interred, but that he might be enclosed upright in a pillar, which he had ordered to be hollowed, and fastened to a post in the parish, in order to prevent any peasant or slave from walking over his body.

LITERARY NURSERYMEN.

Melancthon studied the gravest points of theology, while he held his book in one hand, and in the other the edge of a cradle, which he incessantly rocked.

"M. Esprit," a celebrated author and scholar, "has been caught by me," says M. Marville, "reading Plato with great attention, considering the interrogations which he met, from the necessity of frequently sounding his little child's whistle."

LANDED ESTATES IN HEAVEN.

The charter of the foundation of the Abbey of Signy, in Champagne, states, in express terms, that St. Bernard promised as many acres in heaven as should be given on earth to the abbey.

POPULAR TALES.

THE HYPOCONDRIACK.

From "Death's Doings," by an Eye Witness.

Tom Wunderlich was the son of Jacob Wunderlich, an honest sugar-baker, on Fish-Street Hill, who, having acquired an ample fortune in trade, was anxious to elevate his descendants, above the humble German stock from which he sprung, by marrying into some patrician family of his adopted country, to whom his wealth and interest in the city would make him acceptable. He fixed his choice upon the eldest daughter of Sir Roger Penny, a baronet of an ancient family, with much pride, two sons, eleven daughters, and twelve hundred a-year; but the match was not concluded without the stipulation that he would get himself previously knighted, a matter which, although at variance with his sugar-baking ideas, yet, he was convinced, was consistent with the object of his marriage; and, having accomplished it, he quickly transformed Miss Penny into Lady Wunderlich.

My lady gained some long anticipated points by her marriage. She had acquired the same title as her mother, and, although the rank of her husband was inferior to that of her father, yet his fortune turned the scale greatly in her favour. She had much at her command; and by her power of occasionally obliging the old lady in pecuniary matters, she obtained an ascendancy over her mamma which consoled her for deficiency of rank. Poor Wunderlich, on the contrary, found that he had spread his bed with nettles. His sugar-baking concern he willingly relinquished, as his fortune was ample; but to quit Lloyd's; his old cronies and city habits; to be forced to enter into the beau-monde; to pay and receive forenoon calls with my lady; attend evening parties, give at homes, balls and suppers; and, to use his own expressions, "to have his house turned inside out," without daring to exclaim, "My Got, meine ladie! this will not do!"—was too much for the worthy knight; whose chagrin, having brought on an attack of confirmed jaundice, terminated his disappointment and his life, a few months after the birth of our hero. Previous to his death, however, Sir Jacob had made a will, leaving a very moderate jointure only to Lady Wunderlich; and the reversion of his property to his son; failing whom it was to devolve upon a nephew who had succeeded him in the sugar-baking concern. This deed blasted the hopes of any second alliance, in the mind of Lady Wunderlich, and obliged her to devote her life to the superintendence of the health and education of her son, on whom all her expectations now rested.

"I recollect Tom" (says the writer of this narrative,) "at school; a fine spirited boy; a little wilful, perhaps, and too timid in the play-ground, if a shower threatened, or the wind blew from the north east. But then, although all the boys quizzed him, yet, they pitied him; for his mamma sent every morning to inquire after his health. Mr. Bolus, the apothecary, saw him regular twice a week, when he was well, and twice a day if labouring under the slightest symptoms of indisposition; and, frequently, when the boys, on a half-holiday, were at cricket on the common, a servant would ride over from the Pavilion, to see whether Tom had cast his jacket; or, if the air happened to be chilly, whether his neck were encompassed with one of the numerous bandanas her ladyship had sent for that purpose in his trunk. Tom was not devoid of ability, but Doctor Bumpem was ordered not to overstrain his mind; for being a delicate boy, an only child, and heir to a large fortune, learning was quite a secondary concern; health was every thing, and to secure that all other considerations were to yield. Tom was, nevertheless, a mild, good-natured, friendly boy; and, although he was frequently laughed at, as much on account of his mother's weakness as his own, yet he was universally liked. But, as he did little in the way of classical literature, he quitted Bumpem's with the character of being a good-natured, idle, soft-headed boy; whom the Doctor said it would be useless to send to Eton, or to Harrow; and, therefore, in order to fit him for Oxford, in which university, his fortune, in her ladyship's opinion, rendered it necessary he should sojourn, he was placed under the care of a clergyman, near

Cheltenham. This arrangement was formed by Lady Wunderlich, in order that Tom, whilst his head was stored with classics by his tutor, should have the health of his body confirmed by the constant use of the waters; to superintend which, her ladyship took a house in that modern Sinope.*

From this time I lost sight of Tom for nearly ten years, during three of which I have been informed he lived in Exeter College, Oxford, where he kept a couple of horses and a servant; that, four years after leaving the university, he had travelled to Italy, attended by Dr. Bolus; for the quondam apothecary had procured an Aberdeen diploma, at her ladyship's request, in order to confer dignity on himself, and add to that of his patron, in the eyes of foreigners. The doctor was chosen for this important office, because he had been acquainted with Tom's constitution from his infancy; and not less on account of his knowledge of that of her ladyship, who was to be the companion of her son and the doctor; for the latter of whom, it was scandalously reported, she had a more than ordinary attachment. How Tom passed through this journey, and what harvest of knowledge he reaped from travel, I could never learn; although I have heard him declaim against the continent generally for its want of comfort and of medical talent; and once descant feelingly on the insupportable heat of Naples and the infernal scorching sirocco which he felt at Nice. Tom, however, having become of age when on his travels, her ladyship and the doctor contrived to wheedle him out of twenty thousand pounds; and, having united their destinies, Mr. and Mrs. Bolus remained behind at Naples; whilst their son returned to England with a young Scotch physician, who was glad of an opportunity of being franked home. Tom had arrived ten days only, when I happened to meet him in Hyde Park.

It was towards the middle of May: the wind was blowing rather sharply from the northeast, when looking in at the window of a chariot, which formed one of the line of vehicles that moved slowly along on each side of me as I walked my horse up the drive, I perceived a gentleman, whom I thought I ought to recognize, seated in the corner of the carriage, muffled up in a fur cloak. He seemed also to be actuated by the same feeling, for, as if by a simultaneous impulse, his fingers were tapping at the glass at the moment I was turning my horse's head to beckon him to let down the window. I soon perceived he was my old schoolfellow, and waited for a minute expecting the carriage window to be opened; but finding that, from the shake of his head and his signs, he wished me to go round to the leeward side of the carriage, which, with some difficulty, I was enabled to effect; in a few minutes I was convinced, from the shake of his hand, that my friend Wunderlich carried in his bosom the same heart, as a man, which had beaten so warmly in it as a boy. "Hah! Dick, my worthy fellow!" said he, "how happy I am to meet you. Let me see! it is ten years since we parted at old Bumpem's—how is the old boy!—Ten years! faith, time has altered both of us, Dick; I have been over half of Europe since we parted, and it is only ten days since I arrived from Italy. But," continued he, holding a handkerchief to his mouth, "this cursed variable climate will kill me. Indeed, my dear friend! you must excuse me from talking more at present: but come to me this evening. I have lodgings at the bookseller's, in Holles-street:—went there to be near my doctor:—good bye, Dick! don't fail to come, good bye! adieu!" and drawing up the window, he beckoned the coachman to drive on. I had returned my friend's salutation with all the warmth in my nature; but after the first "how d'ye"—could not wedge in a single sentence; and remained as it were, rivetted to the spot, for a few minutes after his carriage drove on, uncertain whether the whole was not a delusion. "If it be not so," thought I, "the poor fellow must be either on the verge of insanity, if not already insane: but I will determine the point this evening, by calling at his lodgings;" and, turning my horse, I rode home to dinner, revolving in my mind the oddness of our meeting, after so long an absence.

It was nine o'clock in the evening, when I entered Tom's lodgings. He was seated before a large fire, in an elbow-chair, rolled in a chintz dressing-gown, with his night cap on, and his feet pushed into a pair of red morocco slippers lined with fur. On a small table near him, lay his watch, six apothecary's phials full of medicine, one of which, by the label, was to be taken every fourth hour, and a pill box containing half a dozen pills. On the same table, also, was a pair of scales, in which I perceived he had been weighing two ounces of biscuit; and a graduated pint measure, which contained one ounce and a half of distilled water. Tom rose and shook me warmly by the hand as I entered the room; but his eye had lost the animation it displayed when we first recognized one another in the park; and he was more emaciated than I had anticipated I should find him. "I am truly grieved to see you in this plight, my dear friend," said I, glancing my eye upon the garniture of the little table; "what are your complaints?" "Ah!" replied he, forcing a faint smile, "there's the rub!—Were my complaints but known, there would be no difficulty in curing them. At least, so says Dr. Frogfoot, who, however, assures me that it is a gastrick affection; and that the uneasy state of my head is merely symptomatic, depending on the connexion between the par vagrum, the symptomatic nerve, and the great semilunar ganglion." I saw I had hit upon a wrong key. "My learning, my dear Tom!" said I, "does not enable me to follow you into the depths of physick which these terms imply."—"I know nothing of them either," replied he, "I only give you the doctor's words." He, however, with the greatest politeness changed the matter of our discourse, which gradually became extremely animated, and taking me kindly by the hand, as I rose to depart, he acknowledged that my visit had done him an essential service; that the pain in his eye, which he was apprehensive was an incipient cataract, had completely left him; and he earnestly begged that I would repeat my visits every evening, whilst I remained in town. My hand was upon the handle of the room-door, and he had rung the bell for his servant to attend me to the street door, when I turned round, recollecting that I had not inquired after his mother; and merely asked "how and where she was!" He started up and approached me—"You must," said he, "sit down, only for ten minutes, to hear that part of my story." I sat down accordingly. "You know that d—d fellow Bolus!—but, I am forgetting," looking at his watch, "it is time to take my pill and draught." He instantly placed one of the pills upon his tongue, and washed it down with a draught, which he emptied into his mouth, from the phial, without evincing the least reluctance to it, in any feature of his face; and, having sat down, again began his narrative.

"You know that fellow Bolus! He became a physician and attended me on my travels, in which my mother also formed a party. He quite mistook my case, and treated me improperly from the beginning; but, at length, he formed a design upon my poor mother; and, as his suit advanced with her, he became more and more negligent of his patient, until he had the impudence to tell me, that my complaints were all imaginary; although the rascal knew that my liver was in the most torpid state, and the secretions consequently vitiated; that my stomach had lost its digestive functions; that the bowels were in such a sluggish condition as to require the constant aid of art; all which had so shaken my nerves that life was a burden to me, and I would have given a thousand pounds to any wretched bravo, to have blown my brains out." Here my poor friend sunk back in his chair, and seemed almost affected to tears with the recollection of what he regarded as the height of inhumanity in Dr. Bolus. It was in vain for me to interfere. I said nothing, and he soon recovered his self-possession. "I really believe," continued he, "that the fellow would have poisoned me if I had remained longer his patient." I soon convinced him that the Doctor could have no interest in his death, as his fortune would pass to his cousin, and not to his mother, with the detail of whose marriage with Bolus he had concluded his story. He appeared struck that he should have forgotten this fact; and then, as if he thought I also doubted the validity of his complaints, be-seemed me to meet Dr. Frogfoot on the following day; and concluded by assuring me, that he believed he had water on his brain, for that, "this morning, two drops of as clear fluid as ever distilled from a rock, dropped from his nose whilst he was at breakfast." I promised to be present at Dr. Frogfoot's next visit, and hurried out of the house, happy again to get into the world of reality; fearful that my own imagination might become infected, were I to remain long in the imaginary atmosphere of evils which surrounded my unhappy friend.

* The original name of Sinnesa, a town in Campania, celebrated for its hot baths and mineral waters, was Sinope. Ovid, Met. 13, v. 715. Mela, 2, c. 4. Strab. 5. Liv. 22, c. 13. Mart. 6, ep. 42, lib. 11, ep. 6.

I entered Tom's apartment, on the following day, at one o'clock, and in less than two minutes the Doctor was announced. He was a tall, spare man, of much gravity of demeanour, rather advanced in years, with a thin sharp visage, an ample forehead, deeply sunk eyes, hollow cheeks, and a hanging of the nether lip, as Shakspeare would express himself, which gave a marked peculiarity of expression to his countenance. He made a slight inclination with his head as he entered the room, and, having seated himself close to my friend, inquired, in a soft under-tone of voice, how he felt himself; whilst, at the same time he took out his watch, and placed his fingers upon the pulse of his patient. Tom said nothing until this ceremony was over, after which he put out his tongue, then drew a deep inspiration, and immediately commenced a voluble detail of all his symptoms and feelings since the doctor's last visit, not forgetting an exact account of the ingesta, and the quality and aspect, to the nicest shade of colour, of the egesta. He had had pains in his legs, arms, head, and heart; he was certain his complaint was retrocedent Gout; he was alarmed this morning with straitness in the swallow, indicative of Dysphagia; his perspirations were sometimes so great, that he conceived he must be the first victim to a return of the Sudor Anglicus; and concluded by seriously inquiring, whether Phlegmasia dolens ever attacked the arm, as his right arm was so much swelled in the morning, that he was certain it could not have entered the sleeve of his coat, if the swelling had not greatly fallen. I heard, with amazement Tom's knowledge of diseases, and their names; the doctor listened to him with patience; and, at the end of each sentence, ejaculated the word—"Aye!" He then made a few remarks; told him that he must be galvanized again, on the following day; wrote on a sheet of paper, "Pergat in usu medicamentorum," took his fee, said, "Good day," in his soft, low voice, with a gentle smile on his features; and again gently inclining his head, left the room.

"This is really too much," said Tom as the door closed upon Frogfoot; "that is the tenth fee which I have given the doctor, without receiving any more satisfaction than you have heard to-day, or one new prescription. As for his galvanism—my skin is excoriated with the heat of it where the brushes are placed; and I am certain that if that hot stream is passed through my spine and liver much longer, I shall be burnt to a cinder. I will write him this instant to discontinue his attendance, and procure some other advice. Do you know any good physician, my dear Dick?" As I was convinced that this hasty determination of poor Wunderlich afforded me an excellent opportunity to try the effects of change of air; scene, and social intercourse, in diverting his mind from his corporeal ailments, in which I could not help thinking that fancy had a considerable share, I told him that I knew an excellent physician, who lived near me in the country, and who I was satisfied could cure him. He caught at the information. "But," continued I, "you must go with me into Worcestershire; the air of the Malvern hills, the pure water, the skill of the doctor, and my own good nursing, will do wonders for you. I shall be here to-morrow with my travelling-carriage, at twelve; so have every thing in readiness—I will take no refusal." He looked seriously at me; for a few seconds; and then said, "I thank you greatly; but I cannot stand the fatigue of such a journey."—"Nonsense, Tom! trust that to me. Be ready at twelve;" and I abruptly left the house before he had time to utter a negative. "A pretty scrape I have got into," thought I, as I walked down Regent-street: "to volunteer myself as the keeper of a hypocondriack on the verge of insanity!—yet—he is my friend, and I am rescuing a drowning man, which is the duty of every passer-by who sees his danger, be he friend or foe."

MISCELLANY.

QUACKS.

[From Angelo's Reminiscences.]

Formerly the mountebank doctor was as constant a visiter at every market-place as the peddler with his pack. Almost all old customs, however, have ceased in our time, and these itinerants are now rarely seen. The travelling doctor, with his zany, I believe, is now no where to be seen in Great Britain; and the mountebank himself is become almost an obsolete character. Dr. Bossy was certainly the last who exhibited in the British metropolis, and his public services ceased about forty years ago. Every Thursday, his stage was erected opposite the northwest colonnade, Covent Garden. The platform was about six feet from the ground, was covered, open in front, and was ascended by a broad step-ladder. On one side was a table, with medicine chest, and surgical apparatus, displayed on a table, with drawers. In the centre of the stage was an arm chair, in which the patient was seated; and before the doctor commenced operations, he advanced, taking off his gold-laced cocked hat, and, bowing right and left, began addressing the populace which crowded before his booth. The following dialogue, ad litteram, will afford the reader a characteristic specimen of one of the customs of the last age. It should be observed that the doctor was a humourist. An aged woman was helped up the ladder, and seated in the chair; she had been deaf, nearly blind, and was lame to boot; indeed, she might be said to have been visited with Mrs. Thrale's three warnings, and death would have walked in at her door, only that Dr. Bossy blocked up the passage. The doctor asked questions with an audible voice, and the patient responded—he usually repeating the response, in his Anglo-German dialect. Doctor. Dis poora voman vot is—how old vosh you? Old Woman. I be almost eighty, sir; seventy-nine last Lady-day, old style. Doctor. Ah, tat is an incurable disease. Old Woman. O dear! O dear! say not so—incurable! Why you have restored my sight—I can hear again—and I can walk without my crutches. Doctor (smiling.) No, no, good voman—old age is vot is incurable; but, by the blessing of Gote, I vill cure you of vot is elshe. Dis poora voman vos lame, and deaf, and almost blind. How many hospitels have you been in? Old Woman. Three, sir; St. Thomas's, St. Bartholomew's, and St. George's. Doctor. Vot, and you found no reliefs? vot none—not at all! Old Woman. No, none at all, sir. Doctor. And how many medical professioners have attended you? Old Woman. Some twenty or thirty sir. Doctor. O mine Gote! Three sick hospitels, and dirty (thirty) doctors! I should vonder vot if you have not enough to kill you twenty time. Dis poora voman has become mine patient. Doctor Bossy gain all patients brunounced ingurable; pote mid de blessing of Brovidence, I shall make short work of it, and set you upon your legs again. Goode beoples, dis poora voman vas teaf as a toor nails (holding up his watch to her ear, and striking the repeater.) Can you hear dat pell? Old Woman. Yes, sir. Doctor. O den be thankful to Gote. Can you vork round this chair? (offering his arm.) Old Woman. Yes, sir. Doctor. Sit you town again, good voman. Can you see? Old Woman. Pretty so-so, doctor. Doctor. Vot can you see, good voman? Old Woman. I can see the baker there (pointing to a mutton-pie-man, with the pie-board on his head. All eyes were turned towards him.) Doctor. And what else can you see, good voman? Old Woman. The poll-parrot there, (pointing to Richardson's hotel.) "Lying old—," screamed Richardson's poll-parrot. All the crowd shouted with laughter. Dr. Bossy waited until the laugh had subsided, and looking across the way, significantly shook his head at the parrot, and gravely exclaimed, laying his hand on his bosom, "Tis no lie, your silly pird, 'tis all true as is de gospel." Those who knew Covent Garden half a century ago can not have forgotten the famed

Dr. Bossy. And there are those too, yet living in Covent Garden parish, who also recollect Richardson's gray parrot, second in fame only (though of prior renown) to Colonel O'Kelly's bird, which excelled all others upon record. This Covent Garden mock-bird had picked up many familiar phrases, so liberally doled out at each other by the wrangling basket-women, which were often, as on this occasion, so aptly coincidental, that the good folks who attended the market believed pretty well to be endowed with reason. The elder Edwin, of comick memory, who resided over the north-east piazza (improperly so termed,) used to relate many curious stories of this parrot. Among others, that one day, the nail on which her cage was hung in front of the house having suddenly given way, the cage fell upon the pavement from a considerable height. Several persons ran to the spot, expecting to find their old favourite dead, and their fears were confirmed, as the bird lay motionless; when suddenly raising her head, she exclaimed, "Broke my back, by G—!" Every one believed it even so, when suddenly she climbed up with her beak and claw, and burst into a loud fit of laughter. Nearly underneath her cage had long been a porter's block, and, doubtless, she had caught the profane apostrophe from the market-garden porters, on pitching their heavy loads.

LETTER FROM DOCTOR FRANKLIN TO MADAME HELVETIUS.

[From Memoires Historiques, &c.]

Mortified at this resolution pronounced by you so positively yesterday evening that you would remain single the rest of your life as a compliment due to the memory of your husband, I retired to my chamber. Throwing myself upon my bed, I dreamt that I was dead and transported to the Elysian Fields. I was asked whether I wished to see any person in particular, to which I replied that I wished to see the philosophers. There are two who live here at hand in this garden, they are good neighbours and very friendly the one towards the other. Who are they? Socrates and Helvetius. I esteem them both highly, but let me see Helvetius first, because I understand a little French, but not a word of Greek. I was conducted to him, he received me with much courtesy, having known me, he said, by character some time. He asked me a thousand questions relative to the war, to the present state of religion, of liberty, and of the government in France. "You do not inquire then," said I, after your dear friend Madame Helvetius, yet she loves you exceedingly; I was in her company not more than an hour ago." "Ah," said he, "you make me recur to my past happiness which ought to be forgotten in order to be happy here. For many years I could think of nothing but her, though I am at length somewhat consoled. I have taken another wife the most like her I could find; she is not indeed altogether so handsome, but she has a great fund of wit and good sense, her whole study is to please me. She is at this moment gone to fetch the best nectar and ambrosia to regale me this evening; stay here awhile and you will see her." "I perceive," said I, "that your former friend is more faithful to you, than you are to her; she has had several very good offers but has refused them all. I will confess to you that I love her extremely, but she is cruel to me, and rejects me peremptorily for your sake." "I pity you sincerely," said he, "for she is an excellent woman, and has a very good understanding. But do not the Abbe de La Roche and the Abbe M— visit her?" "Certainly they do, not one of your friends has dropped her acquaintance." "If you had gained the Abbe M— with a bribe of good coffee and cream perhaps you would have succeeded, for he is as deep a reasoner as Saint Thomas; he arranges and methodizes his arguments in such a manner that they are irresistible. Or, if by a fine edition of some old classick you had gained the Abbe de La Roche to speak against you, that would have been still better, as I always observed that when he recommended any thing my wife had a great inclination to do directly the contrary." As he finished these words the new Madame Helvetius entered, and I recognized her immediately as my former American friend Mrs. Franklin. I would have reclaimed her but she answered me coldly; "I was a good wife to you for forty-nine years and four months, nearly half a century; let that content you. I have formed a new connexion here which will last to eternity." Displeased with this refusal of my Eurydice I immediately resolved to quit the ungrateful Shades, and return hither into this fair world again to behold the sun and you. Here then I am, Madam, let us revenge ourselves.

EDITORIAL DIARY.

May 24. Saint Vincent; Saint Donatian; Saint Rogation; Saint John de Prado. On this day, 1736, five felons in Newgate were to have been executed; but the prison was so insecure that one of them made his escape. The other four were taken to Tyburn and executed; and Jack Ketch, on his way home, robbed a woman of three shillings and sixpence.

May 25. Saints Mary Magdalen of Pazzi, Urban, Adhelm; Gregory VII., Maximus, Venerand, Dumbade, &c. WHITSUNDAY. This is the annual commemoration of the feast of the Pentecost. It is celebrated with great ceremony in all Catholic countries, and among many of the Protestant churches, is observed with great respect. When England was yet a Catholic kingdom, it was usual to dramatize the descent of the Holy Ghost in the churches. Thus we see in the old fashioned rhymes of Barnaby Googe,—

"On Whitsunday whyte pigeons tame
In strings from heaven fle,
And one that framed is of wood
Still hangeth in the skie."

In Spain, also, wafers, or cakes, preceded by water, oak leaves, or burning torches, were thrown down from the church roof; small birds with cakes tied to their legs, and pigeons were let loose; sometimes there were tame white ones tied with strings, or one with wood suspended. This moveable feast is still observed even in this country, in several churches. It would not be improper, perhaps, to mention a rather curious tradition in the annals of the saints, respecting Saint Adhelm. It is recorded of him, in the "Golden Legend," that, while saying mass in the church of Saint John de Lateran, in Rome, he put off his vestment; the servant neglecting to take it, he hung it on a sunbeam, whereon it remained, "to the wonderful admiration of the beholders!"—1796, the island of Saint Lucia surrendered to the British forces under Sir Ralph Abercrombie.

May 26. Saint Philip Neri; Saint Augustine, Archbishop of Canterbury; Saint Eleutherius; Saint Quadratus; Saint Oduvald. WHITMONDAY. The observance of this day as an annual holiday, is one of the good old European customs which has become almost extinct. That our New-England ancestors should utterly neglect the observance of cheerful holidays is not strange. They were Puritans, and brought over with them that detestation for May-day sports, and all such innocent and healthy field games, which were at that time so much cried against by the steeple crowned preachers of England. Though to this day, Whitmonday is a universal festival in the humble ranks of life, throughout the kingdom of Great Britain, it has never been restored to its place among the cheer-inspiring seasons of the New-England calendar. Not so among our citizens who are of German descent. With them it has lived in all its hilarity, for a century or more. It begins to lose its interest among them in some portions of our country, it is true; but even now, our gray headed old German fathers, smoothe their furrowed brows, and amidst the hilarity of Pfingst-Montag, their heart simst sing,—

"O, gäbe den Deutschen ein holdes Geschick Die glücklichen Grossvaterzeiten zurück."

—1784 there was a grand jubilee in Westminster Abbey, in honour of the memory of Handel.—1815, the legislators, electors, citizens, and soldiers of France, swore fidelity to Buonaparte on his return from Elba.

May 27. Saint John, Pope; Saint Bede; Saint Julius.

Saint Bede was an Englishman, in priests' orders. He is styled by Wordsworth, "venerable Bede." He was a prodigy of learning in an unlearned age. It is said that Europe scarcely ever produced a greater scholar. He was a teacher of youth, and had at one time six hundred pupils under his tuition; yet he never neglected his clerical duties, and also wrote an incredible number of books, on theology, science and the polite arts. He fell into some of the prevailing absurd opinions of the day; but who escaped them? He flourished in the year 735. We hope it will not be conceived ridiculous in us to relate one of the miracles which tradition has fixed to the character of this venerable saint and philosopher. There is always a desire to attribute miracles to every good and great worthy in the church; and thus we find in the "Golden Legend" the following ridiculous story. Saint Bede, when he had lost his sight wished to be led forth to preach; and his servant, for a profane jest, led him to a heap of stones, to which the good father, delivered a powerful discourse, thinking himself addressing a sensible congregation. But to shame the wicked servant, and to serve as a miraculous reproach to the stony hearted hearers of the word in every place, when he had finished his sermon, the flinty hearers found a tongue and with one accord, the whole heap were heard to give in a full voice, the customary response, "Amen!"—1799, on this and the three following days, the library of the celebrated Addison was sold at auction in London. The whole of the books, manuscripts, &c., produced £456 2s. 9d., or $2027, 27.—1813, Fort George and Fort Erie, two British posts near the head of Lake Ontario, were captured by the American troops.

May 28. Saints Germanus and Caranus, or Cheron.—1546, Cardinal Beaton, primate of Scotland was assassinated in his own palace, by John Lesly, and Normand Lesly, brother and son to the earl of Rothes, and about twelve others. This deed was done to avenge the death of George Wishart, a reformer, whom Beaton had caused to be burned for a heretic, and forbid by proclamation that any should pray for him, under the heaviest ecclesiastical censures. They entered his palace at Saint Andrews, early in the morning, and thrust out a hundred tradesmen and fifty servants before their intentions were suspected; and having secured the gates, proceeded very deliberately to execute their purpose on the cardinal. Beaton alarmed, barricaded the door of his chamber, but finding that they were about to force the door, he opened it, and conjured them to spare his life, reminding them that he was a priest. James Melvil, one of the company, stopped the career of those who would have slain him without a word, and bade them reflect that the work they were about to do was the judgement of God, and ought to be executed with becoming deliberation and gravity. He then called on Beaton to repent of his iniquities, especially of the murder of Wishart; and solemnly protested that it was not from any personal hatred, fear, or envy, that they sought his life; but that they believed themselves sent by God to inflict a deserved punishment. He then thrust him through the body; and his corpse was afterwards exposed to public view, in the very spot where he had a few days before set with his prelates on velvet cushions, under a splendid canopy, to witness the execution of George Wishart.—1795, Mr. Patrick Henry brought into the house of burgesses of Virginia, his memorable resolutions;—that the first settlers of Virginia brought with them all the liberties of British subjects; that they had been ratified by two royal charters;—that they had enjoyed those rights, without dispute; that the General Assembly of Virginia, together with the king, or his substitutes, had the sole and exclusive privilege of levying taxes on the inhabitants of the colony;—that the inhabitants of the colony were not bound to yield obedience to any other authority intent on imposing any taxation on them.—and that any person who should assert the contrary, shall be deemed an enemy to this his majesty's colony. These sentiments were so bold and novel, so firm and unexpected, that one of the members was affected to such a degree, that he cried out "Treason! Treason!" The people however believed them true, and the result proved them so.

May 29. Saints Maximinus, Cyril, Conon and his son, Sisinarius, Martyrius, and Alexanier. This day is the anniversary of the restoration of Charles II., or rather the day in which he entered London, in 1660, and re-established royalty, which had been suspended from the death of his father. It is customary with the peasantry of England to wear oak leaves in their hats on this day, and dress their horses' heads with them. This is in commemoration of the shelter afforded to the king by an oak, while making his escape from England, after his defeat at Worcester, September 3, 1651. While concealed for a season in Boscobel house, in the borders of Staffordshire, he lay several nights on straw in the house, and fed on such coarse fare as it afforded. Understanding that search was to be made, he mounted into an oak, in company with Colonel Carlos, and staid hidden among the leaves and branches for twenty-four hours; the family reaching them victuals with a nut-hook. In this situation he could neither stir nor speak without imminent danger; for during this space he saw several soldiers pass by, all of whom were in pursuit of him, and some expressed in his hearing their earnest wish of seizing him. This oak has perished, but another has been raised on the spot from one of its acorns, and goes by the title of the Royal Oak. It is enclosed with a brick wall with the inside covered with laurel, of which we may say with Ovid, when he speaks of that before the Augustine palace,—

"Mediamque tuebere quercum."

Close by its side there stands a young thriving plant, from one of its acorns. Charles was absent from his kingdom nearly nine years. It was sometime before he could secure his flight, and during this time he was in constant jeopardy, as well as his numerous loyal friends who secreted him. He was often protected and hid by the Catholics themselves, whose religion he was bound as king of England to oppose. The priests' hole, as it is called, where persecuted priests were allowed a refuge, was often employed to shelter him. Will any one now doubt that a Catholic may be a loyal subject? It would have been well had the kingdom found him worthy in every respect of such disinterested loyalty.—1813, the British made an attack on Sackett's Harbour, and are defeated with the loss of their commander and a dreadful slaughter of troops, by the New-York militia and a few regular soldiers, under general Brown. This battle cost the Americans some valuable lives; among the rest, the brave colonel Electus Bagkus was universally lamented.

May 30. Saint Felix I.; Saint Walstan; Saint Ferdinand; Saint Madelgisibus.—1431, Joan of Arc, the Maid of Orleans, was publicly burned at Rouen, France. [See first volume of the American Masonick Record, pp. 236—237.] Her memory is revered by Frenchmen, and even the English of the age were ashamed of the inhuman deed. A splendid fountain stands on the very spot where she was burned, in the old market place of Rouen.—1814, two gunboats and 175 soldiers, with five barges were captured at Sandy creek, on Lake Ontario, by Major Appling, with 129 riflemen and a few Indians. The British loss was fourteen killed and twenty-four wounded; Americans, one wounded.—1539, Fernando de Soto landed at Spirito Santo, in Florida, having sailed from Cuba with the intent of conquering the country, and annexing it to the Spanish crown.

MORE WONTERS. By a letter from a friend, dated Lockport, May 17th, we learn that colonel WILLIAM KING, the same person of whom Messrs. Garlinghouse and Bates were sent in pursuit, and who they say, made his escape from them by the connivance of the commandant, has returned from Arkansas, and is now with his family in Niagara county. This letter is worthy of the most implicit belief; from a man whose word would be sufficient even among anti-masons. It is also confirmed by the Rochester Republican of the 19th. We learn that colonel King did not try to make his escape from Garlinghouse and Bates; but refused to come with them, a distance of nearly three thousand miles, as a criminal. He comes back to defend himself from the charges wickedly and maliciously brought against him. It is false that he ever ran away. He went away from that county openly, and all knew where he was going. Bates Cook has pretended to act honest in this Morgan excitement; and here we have a specimen of his honesty. The night before he went away he heard from King's own lips his intention and his business. All knew what his business was, and since that time, Cook has very honestly assented to the story that he ran away. Who will now condemn the course that King has taken. He will be justified by all who owe him no malice or who would not willingly have shaved the state out of a large amount of money for the very humane service of jolting him in a wheel carriage, over the fine roads between here and Arkansas, together with the fun of exhibiting him in irons at every tavern and village by the way! To such men he has bid defiance, and at the same time shown a respect for the laws, which does him honour. We repeat it. All honest men will justify him in it. He may be thrown into prison; he may be used with all the contumely imaginable; he may be ruined by the expenses of defending his character, or his life; he may—and we doubt not it will be attempted—he may be condemned by the testimony of such men as Edward Giddins, or the stratagem of such a man as Thurlow Weed. But he fears not either, and if we are not mistaken in our conception of his character, the humbug makers have caught a Tartar this time.

Now for the poor, murdered, kidnapped, spitit-away, lost witness, ELISHA ADAMS. He who has figured in all the anti-masonick handbills of cant and scurrility, and even arrived at the honour of a notice from the acting governor of this great state.

First we heard that he knew all about the murder of Morgan, and was carried away or lost while on his way to attend the trials of the conspirators. Next we hear from himself that he knows nothing about the affair, and that he left home publicly for his friends in Vermont. What then? Thurlow Weed of barber-ous fame, was deputed, and we presume paid, by our acting governor to fetch him from his place of captivity, for a witness at the approaching trials. He came through this city; staid over night; went with his liberated charge to oyster cellars, &c.; in short, lived like fighting cocks; but we never could learn that he had made any disclosures as to the fate of Morgan, and on the contrary, we heard it reported that he knew nothing about it. But it must be that he told Weed that he knew all about it, while on his journey; for the anti-masonick papers say so; and we all know they are too pious to lie. But half his troubles do not end here. He goes back to his former place of residence, and the very next we hear, he is indicted for a misdemeanor, for aiding in the abduction of Morgan. We have heard of George Buchanan's plan of contriving to be carried to London without expense, when he was out of money, by creating a suspicion that he was working treason; and if Elisha Adams has played at that game to get back from Vermont, he deserves to be indicted. But Giddins is the man who makes the chaff fly. He points his finger, and whether Weed tells him where or not, wherever he points there flies an arrest. He says that Adams and himself were with Morgan at Fort Niagara; that while Giddins was absent to York the deed was done; and that Adams was present. If so, why was he not arrested before as a principal? Why was not Giddins also indicted as an accessory? Were they spared for witnesses? If so, we have one question to ask, and we have done. Did any of our citizens ever hear of an accomplice or a principal, allowed the prerogatives of a state witness without previous indictment?

"THE COMMONWEALTH OF KINGS." It is a fact that among her free and happy citizens, our republic can number one who has worn the crown of royalty, and now is invested with the more enviable diadem,—that of an American citizen. He was once the sovereign of an ancient and once powerful kingdom,—a nation that could justly boast that "much of earth and all the watery plain of ocean" were her own. Now, that kingdom is ruled by a pitiful fickle slavish piece of mortality, and he, her former sovereign is now realizing the truth, that a republican is the only happy monarch which nature ever designed. How enviable is his lot, when compared with the occupant of any throne in the world! Here he has no subjects, it is true; but among his millions of allies, there are none who do not cherish his political prosperity as warmly as their own. There the puny arm of the monarch is palsied, by the conflicting interests of his allies, and the jealousy or disloyalty of subjects, whom legitimacy alone keeps in awe, and who hold their interest as diametrically distinct from his. Such is Ferdinand VII. of Spain. Not so the subject of our present remarks. His purse is now a part of our national wealth and he is not niggardly in the use of it, when public improvements call for it. He owns an extensive estate, and there is scarcely a poor family around him, so many he employs on his lands. He is constantly in the field with his men, encouraging them to labour by his example. Courteous to strangers, and benevolent to his fellow citizens, his fame as a republican will shine in the memory of his fellow beings, while the glory of emperors is too often tarnished by their tears. He asks no power, for he has already had a surfeit of that; and he has proved this fact,—that no office is worth holding when compared with the office of making himself happy, and imparting of that happiness to his fellow men. Such is Joseph Buonaparte.

AFRICAN TRAVELLERS. The fatality attending the enterprising few, who have endeavoured to explore the interior of the African continent, is truly a melancholy subject of reflection. The death of major Laing and his party, we fear is proved beyond a doubt; whether by the influence of the climate or through the jealousy of the natives, we know not for certainty; but we fear the latter. A son of the celebrated Mungo Park, who it is said has lately undertaken the fatal route pursued by his father, it is also stated, has fallen a victim to the superstitions of Africa Interior. He was poisoned by the priests, or Fetish men, for sacrilegiously ascending a Fetish tree, to take a sketch of the group assembled at the annual Yan festival at Akimboo. This tree it is unlawful for any to approach but the priests, and young Park was dissuaded from his attempt to ascend it, by the king of Akimboo; but he unhappily persisted in his design, and his life has been the forfeit of his rashness.

WHO SHALL DECIDE? A petition was lately presented to our Common Council, praying that an inquiry be made into the qualifications of our licensed wood measurers. The petitioner, it appears, having purchased a boat load of wood on the 9th of May inst., applied to one of the qualified measurers for a certificate of the same, by which it was pronounced to measure 22 73-128 cords. The next day the same wood was measured by another of the faculty, and made to contain 17 32-128. Subsequently two other measurers made it severally to measure 19 52-128, and 16 43-128. The difference between the extremes of these several measurements is upwards of six cords, and the question now arises, whether there can be any certainty in the mensuration of wood. If there can, it is proper that the Common Council adopt some standard method, or leave the same to the honesty of the vender.

TABLE TALK.

Oh! Bulls and Calves. From a certain paper, printed in a certain great city, under the head of original poetry, we have selected the following brilliant poetical ideas:—

"And there, so late a captive to thy net,
Is now with freedom blest and."

Again,—

"But do not those declaim on hard-ships most,
Who must have felt them and who feels no more."

In another article we read,—

There is a light, more brighter far,
Than yonder beaming holy star."

Upside down will prove it. Some very cunning person has discovered, that if the snuff of a candle be bent down, the inhaled wick will revolve imperceptibly around the candle in the direction of the sun. The aforesaid cunning genius remarks that it cannot be owing to the twist of the wick, because—he proved it by lighting a candle at the butt end! Well done! Who before ever heard that any thing twisted with the sun, as it is familiarly called, would be any the less so by being turned upside down?—Feline Arson. A barn in Norristown, New-Jersey, was set on fire by a cat on the 12th inst. A coal of fire had become fixed to her hair, and she immediately ran from the house to the barn with it. A horse, a carriage, a quantity of hay, and some farming utensils were consumed.—Tarnished Silver. Specie was very dull in London on the 28th March.

Post Office Facility. The Concord, New Hampshire, Register, announces the safe arrival at the post office at Aeworth, its place of destination, of a letter, mailed at Windsor, Vermont, May 29th 1820—having performed the route in little less than eight years. Distance 23 miles—intermediat post offices one—change of arriving, 832.—Immortality. The following, says the Batavia Press, on the back of a note of one of the hundred banks in Rhode-Island, if not a profitable, is a very pleasant improvement upon the practice of endorsing. "July 4th, 1776—May it be remembered as long as there are Onions in Bristol, or girls in Newport."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Contents of the Western Monthly Review, for April:—Adventures of Arthur Clenning; Pleasures of Authorship; Anniversary Hyman; Stanzas. Review, of the History of Louisiana; Butler's Hudibras; Paley's Works; Transylvania Journal of Medicine. To Subscribers. This number completes the volume. The cheapness of the work, its certain beneficial influence on the literature of the west, and more than all, its unassuming merit, induce us to commend it to our literary friends,—particularly as a new volume is to commence forthwith. [There, sir, is another item for your "philosophy of patience and tranquillity."]

The Sullivan Whig, lately published at Monticello Sullivan county, has assumed a new name, and will hereafter be issued under the title of the Republican Watchman.

Number 45 of the New-York Mirror is accompanied by a rich, and beautiful engraving of the New-York City-Hall.

We have received several numbers of the Hesperian, and Western Miscellany, a new semi-monthly quarto, published at Pittsburgh, by the "Hesperian Society," at 1 per annum, in advance.

HARTWICK SEMINARY.—This Seminary has been established about thirteen years, in the pleasant valley of the Susquehanna, county of Otsego, situated four and a half miles from the village of Cooperstown, and seventy miles west from the city of Albany. Young gentlemen from various parts of the United States, have there received a preparatory education for entering college in this and the neighbouring states. And the subscriber believes that most of the pupils have hitherto sustained a favourable character at college, both in relation to their moral conduct, and their proficiency in the several branches of sciences in which they have been instructed.

The branches taught are the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, French and German; Natural Philosophy; History; Mathematics in general, and particularly Surveying, both theoretical and practical; Geography; English Grammar; exercises in English composition; Arithmetic; Writing, &c.

The Rev. George B. Miller, who for a number of years past, has been successfully engaged in the tuition of youth, both in this state and the state of New-Jersey, has been appointed assistant teacher in the seminary. The present term commenced on Monday the 15th of May, to continue to the last Wednesday in August.

For further particulars and references as to the character of the institution, the subscriber would refer the public to the Rev. F. G. May, of Albany; the Rev. Dr. Wackerling, of Germany; the Rev. Dr. Quimman, of Rhinebeck; the Rev. Dr. Sumner, President of Union College; the Rev. Mr. Shaffer, and the Rev. Dr. Goetschius, of New-York; to the clergy of the Lutheran Church in the neighbourhood of New-York; in general, and to the trustees of Hartwick Seminary in particular.

Good boarding may be had in the neighbourhood of the seminary, at the moderate price of 12 or 14 shillings per week.

ERNEST L. HAZELIUS,
Principal of Hartwick Seminary.

Those who wish to purchase will please call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean, combed Hogs' Bristles. Jan 12.

POETRY.

From "Whimwhams."

MASTER-SPIRITS.

I have, in time, been well acquainted
With poets sixty-six,
Who were pricked on, by gift divine,
To kick against the pricks;
By this I mean, they all were starved,
Except the latter six.

How these were saved, heaven knows, not I—
Conjecture would be vague,
As for mine humble self to learn
The language of the Haghe;
But probably, as some escape
Where many die of plague.

I have a liking for the tribe,
They all are clever fellows;
Though some with vanity are puffed,
As full as blacksmith's bellows;
And of their brothers' fame, alas!
Quite furiously jealous.

A "round unvarnished tale" I'll tell,
Of these surviving six;
Description may acquire them fame;
On them attention fix;
But glory evanescent is,—
Sandford has filched big Dick's.

One was a fat and jolly wight,
Who had a Bardolph nose;
His colour was a varied one,—
Predominant the rose;
He had a muddy, dozy eye,
And wore nankin small clothes.

And no one, I have ever seen,
Could greater justice do
To mutton—ducks—or soups—or steaks—
A boil—a fry—a stew—
He wrote much sentiment—indeed,
Inclined to pathos too.

The second was a mournful man,
With hair quite thin and sleek;
Tears often filled his little eyes,
Which smiled but once a week;
His nose from sorrow wasted much—
He had a chalky cheek.

Shrivelled and fleshless was his frame,
And bloodless all, his phiz;
He never tried to speak aloud,
His voice could only whiz;
This man wrote comic poetry,
And was esteemed a quizz.

The third a sneaking rascal looked,
And crept, and crawled along;
His courage was like Bobadil's,
Vociferous and strong,
Till danger threatened, then he sung
A very different song.

He was a sickly, feeble wight,
Much troubled with the croup,
Living on viands acetose,
Weak gruels, mutton soup.
He wrote in epick verse, and sung
Of blood and warlike troop.

The fourth was merry, fat and short,
With legs a little bandy,
Around the ladies dancing oft,
By them esteemed quite handy;
He wore a decorated coat,
And was pronounced a dandy.

His countenance was swoln and flushed,
The hue of a new cheese;
He wrote all sorts of sugar rhymes,
And issued his decrees
Wrapped up in cockles—lived and laughed
In "literary ease."

The fifth resembled Byron much;
Had an ambitious eye,
Retreating for the id, lolly brow,
Where one might pride descry;
I never liked his bearing quite,
It was so firm and high.

Examination great I made,
And searched the town quite through,
To learn his title; but in vain
Was all that I could do;
Somebody said, "he wrote for fame,"
His name nobody knew!!!!

The sixth made canticles, and lived
A very jovial fellow;
Forever ripe for fun, indeed,
Inclining to be mellow;
And when "in cups," his tedious songs
Vociferously would bellow.

But sometimes he would favour me
With strains a little richer;
Which, if a lady might but hear,
They surely would bewitch her;
"Drink to me only," oft was given,—
Beside—"My friend and pitcher."
These poets live—perchance may die—
Though I have heard folks say,
That wondrous men evaporate—
Ne'er know a closing day:
Perhaps these gifted spirits will
"Dry up and blow away!"

WHAT'S THE MATTER? THE-MATTER.

Edgar. My cue is villainous melancholy, with a sigh like Tom o' Bedlam.—Lear.

You may talk of the "Sorrows of Werter,"
And the "devils" of Jean Rousseau;
You may tell of the man that suffered thus,
And the maid that suffered so—
But the sorrows I'm going to tell you of,
Are sadder things than these,
And Job's—but there's no comparison—
Were moonshine to a cheese.

I'm living, you see, in the country—
It's nothing to you the why;
And a room in a certain story—
It's nothing to you, how high.
I've a bed, and a chair, and a table,
And a fraction of a glass;
And I write for a living, and read for fun,
And my name—but let that pass.

I eat my dinner at twelve o'clock—
It's mostly real just now;
And I drink my tea at half past four,
And the tea-kettle is a cow.
We sit till twelve in our quiet room—
My merry quill and I,
And I tell him tales of my busy brain,
That would make you laugh "to die."

(I'll come to my sorrows presently.)
I rise when the robin sings,
I have a slut of a country girl,
Who looks to my bed and things;
I take a bit of a willow switch
To emphasize withal,
And I walk and repeat my poetry,
With the leave of the stone wall.

But when I'm out, the slut goes in,
And she makes my bed—'t is true—
But she does some other things beside
That I would n't have her do.
I hate to have my papers touched,
Or meddled with—a straw—
She calls it "slicking up the room,"
And stuffs them in the draw!

I write upon a slate, to save
My paper, ink, and pen;
And in the ashes frequently
Make "Chateau en Espagne!"
She swept my hearth to day—and there
A blessed dream was gone!
And washed my slate, when—hang her soul,
It had a sonnet on!

Oh scrape my boils with an oyster shell—
Bedevil me like Rousseau—
Love me and marry, as Charlotte did,
Who finished her Werter so.
I'll go on peas a pilgrimage—
Sit all day on a stone—

But when I'm out, you Cicely,
Just let my things alone!

SONG.

Summer cometh,
The bee hummeth,
The grass springeth,
The bird singeth,
The flower groweth,
And man knoweth
The time is come
When he may rove
Through vale and grove,
No longer dumb.

There may he hear sweet voices
Borne softly on the gale;
There he may have rich choicés
Of songs that never fail;
The lark, if he be cheerful,
Above his head shall tower,
And the nightingale, if tearful,
Shall soothe him from her bower.

If red his eye with study,
If pale with care his cheek,
To make them bright and ruddy,
The green hills let him seek.
The quiet that he needeth
His mind shall there obtain,
And relief from care, that feedeth
Alike on heart and brain.

THE BROTHERLESS SISTERS.

Two solitary sisters, who
A brother's fondness never knew,
Agreed, poor girls, with one another,
That they would make themselves a brother:
They cut them silk, as snow-drops white,
And silk as richest rubies bright;
They carved his body from a bough
Of box-tree from the mountain's brow;
Two jewels dark for eyes they gave;
For eyebrows, from the ocean wave
They took two leeches; and for teeth
Fixed pearls above, and pearls beneath;
For food they gave him honey sweet,
And said,—now live, and speak, and eat!

THE PORTRAIT.

Ha! Is it thou, old friend, or is 't another?
Thyself, indeed, thy cousin, or thy brother?
I know a face like that, but never viewed it
In such an attitude—what fellow screwed it
Into that hang-dog look: 't can not be Thyself has countenanced such villany.
Some painter thinking of "a duck in thunder,"
Or hoping to strike out another wonder,
Has stolen thy honest features for a head
Would kill the living, or upraise the dead!
It is like thee! and yet it is unlike thee!
Do n't frown, but hear me; hear me if you strike me!
Thou honest son of Adam, this display
Were a good thing to frighten crows away!

EPITAPH.

BY J. MONTGOMERY.

Weep for a seaman, honest and sincere,
Not cast away, but brought to anchor here;
Storms had o'erwhelmed him, but the conscious wave
Repented, and resigned him to the grave:
In harbour, safe from shipwreck, now he lies,
Till Time's last signal blazes through the skies;
Refitted in a moment, then shall he
Sail from this port on an eternal sea.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ORATION,

Delivered at the celebration of the festival of Saint John the Evangelist, in Georgetown, South-Carolina, December 27, A. L. 5824.

BY BR. A. B. SHACKELFORD.

Where is the Mason's trust!—The stream of Time is not unruffled, and the slender bark must some time breast an overwhelming surge. Where is the Mason's trust!—The tempest comes; the waves lift up their heads; the angry elements conspire to hurl destruction on the little ship: she buffets, struggles, founders, sinks. No! she cannot sink. The hand of faith is at the helm, and, on her prow, Eternal Hope. Her strong arm buoys up the heaviest burthen: her penetrating eye looks through the twilight, and discerns a calmer latitude. Yes! various indeed is this world's climate. There is a calmer latitude; but our strength is crippled, and we cannot reach it. Behold! one cometh as the morning, and the glory of the noon-day is round about her. Her head is in the Heavens, and her strength upon the mighty deep. She leads us into smooth waters, and we move on our way rejoicing.

The man who basks in fortune's bright meridian; whose life is tranquil as the summer sky; whose stores are plenty, and whose heart is glad—Is he a Mason! Then has he been taught, that the serenity of his summer sky may be disturbed; that the treasures of his riches may be taken from him; and that, to-morrow, he may ask that bounty which to-day he gives. Yes! he has been taught, that adversity is not the consequent of crime alone, but may obtrude upon the good man's dwelling; that the brightest prospects are often evanescent, and permanent felicity not to be found on earth: that human nature is extremely frail, and miserably dependant. Man, therefore, should meet his brother on the level, and part upon the square.

These, my friends, are among the earliest lessons of Masonry: an Institution whose purpose is to relieve, support, and comfort merit in distress, virtue in temptation, and innocence in tears. These are, indeed, the lessons of the Bible. We claim no competition with that holy Religion, whose precepts are taught, and whose ordinances are administered in this sacred temple; but we presume to think that Masonry is an humble auxiliary in the same glorious and eternal work. Our order, so far as I have learned, is not of Divine establishment; but originated, under Divine approbation, with that man who asked of the Almighty, not riches, not honour, but wisdom for his portion. It began with the building of that Temple, upon which, for seven years, it rained not in the day-time, to impede the workmen. It was confirmed at the completion and dedication of that Temple, when "the fire came down from Heaven, and consumed the burnt offering and the sacrifices, and the glory of the Lord filled the house." And Solomon said, "Let the people of the earth know, that I have built this house, and consecrated it to thy name."

In the erection of that magnificent edifice, there were engaged more than one hundred and fifty thousand men. To prevent interruption in work; to exclude from this immense multitude strangers and intruders; to detect impostors, who might demand wages never earned, would have been utterly impossible, save by the adoption of certain secret signs and tokens, which ever have, and ever shall, belong exclusively to Masons. Hence originated that secrecy which distinguishes the order; that secrecy which, in this enlightened age, in this republican country, we do not relinquish, simply, my friends, because—we can not. It is no secret, however, that the first great light in Masonry is the Holy Bible. It is no secret, that the earliest copy of that sacred book was hidden by the Masons from the fire and the sword of the desolating heathen, and by the Masons found and restored at the erection of the second Temple. It is no secret, that our system embraces and inculcates all the precepts of the inspired page. It is no secret, that the Mason is required to circumscribe his passions within a proper compass; to square his conduct by the strict rules of justice and of honesty; nor suffer the pride of his prosperity to lift him up above the poor man's level. How important! how solemn! how interesting, is our profession!

We are sometimes condemned, on the ground that we receive and cherish members whose characters deny the precepts that we profess to teach. But he that participates in the celebration, parades in the procession, and adorns himself with the jewels of the order, is not therefore a Mason, any more than that man totally unacquainted with tactics, is a General, merely because he wears the uniform of the army. But should some religious querist reproach us because we have not universal purity, to him, with due solemnity, I reply:—At that memorable pascal feast, which the Christian Church devoutly commemorates; at that agonizing parting supper near the Mount of Olives; at that hallowed board where sat the Christian's God; there, also, sat a Judas. If, then, the presence of Divinity was visited with crime and treachery; if in the church militant there sits a bad man and a hypocrite, (and that eye which can not count amiss, must number many,) why is the Lodge reproached because it is not perfect!

We have the misfortune, too, to meet a frown where frowns should never be. For us, no sunny smile sits in that eye which marks the fairest, purest, best of God's creation. If there be on earth one work of moral symmetry; one work of spotless loveliness, whereon the hand of Heaven has written Masterpiece; that work is WOMAN. Who is he that denies!—He is no Mason. Who is he that doubts!—He is no Mason. Who is he that hesitates to avow it!—He is no Mason. The spirit of the Craft whispers to the heart of every Brother, thou shalt bow before that workman who pronounced it good; thou shalt cherish and support the work; for, without it, the pilgrim, man, has no sun, no home, no comfort, and no hope. From woman, thou shalt withhold nothing good, save that which, like the apple of Eden, is forbidden. I do not say, however, that the whole sex presume to censure what they do not comprehend. I have the happiness to know otherwise. There are many distinguished and honourable exceptions. Elizabeth, old England's beautiful, intelligent, and jealous Queen, hearing that the Masons had certain secrets which could not be revealed to her, (for that she could not be Grand Master,) and being jealous of all secret assemblies, sent an armed force to break up the Lodge at York, at a celebration in honour of St. John the Evangelist. The Grand Master, being not dismayed, received the guests with gallantry; and so convinced them of the excellency of our order, that the chief officers were themselves initiated on the spot. And Elizabeth said that she would never repeat the effort; for that she esteemed the Masons a peculiar set of men, who cultivated peace and friendship, arts and sciences, without meddling in the affairs of Church or State.

Are you a Mason's wife!—Then remember that you may become a Mason's widow. The smile that mantles on your cheek to-day; the love that sparkles in your gladdened eye; the hopes that nestle in your tranquil heart;—all, like the buds that blossom in the morning, may be blighted by a killing frost to-night. But, thank God, winter is not always. The spring shall breathe upon the garden, and it shall bring forth buds. So shall thy tear, Oh! Sympathy! more grateful and refreshing than the dews of spring, fall upon the withered stalk, and it shall bloom again. Go, cherish and encourage him who is the source and fountain of your present happiness. While, by your amiable gentleness, you teach him to love his wife, suffer him to love his brother also: and when your little boy shall ask you what a Mason is, tell him that a Mason is the Orphan's Father, and the Widow's Friend.

The benefits which the order dispenses to its own members; the important privileges which are conferred upon them, none but a Mason can properly comprehend or appreciate. It is the delight of Masonry, to walk into the humble retirement of poverty, to administer relief to the unfortunate, and to pour oil into the wounded spirit. By the power of Masonry, we oftentimes check a Brother on the brow of a precipice, and are enabled, too, oftentimes to avert the peril that is aimed at our own breast. By the power of Masonry, the captive Putnam arrested the scalping-knife of the savage; and the fettered Coustus commanded the wheels of the Inquisition to stand still, and they obeyed him. These are instances where Masonry operates individual good. Her general good effects upon the whole human family; the many important results which have originated in the spirit of Masonry, are not easily enumerated. Her spirit is seen in the enlightening philosophy of Franklin: her light shines in the history of her distinguished son and patron, general Washington; beams in the heroism of the yet lamented De Kalb; and blazes in the philanthropic chivalry of La Fayette. Illustrious brother, welcome to our shore. The lodge is open to receive you: the whole American people, in one common shout, exclaim! "HAIL LA FAYETTE!"

Most Excellent High Priest, Worshipful Master, Brethren and Companions: The road to happiness, like the old road from Babylon to Jerusalem, is a difficult way, abounding with impediments, the chief of which are, temptations to do evil. It has been said, that a good mason is the least imperfect man on earth; and, it is very certain, that in the exercise of virtue consists the only true and permanent felicity. You have been pleased to invest me with a sacred office. Suffer me, in the discharge of it, though a young brother, to suggest to your recollections some of the chief duties of a mason. There is a duty to yourselves, that you be regular and temperate, so that you preserve your faculties, and do credit to your honourable profession. A needy and distressed brother you are to relieve and comfort; and, should occasion offer, you are to "judge with candour, admonish with friendship, and reprehend with justice." But your highest duty is to your Creator. In all your life and conduct, you are to acknowledge, that "He is God, and before Him there is none other." Thus acting, should misfortunes assail you, should friends forsake you, should envy traduce your good name, and malice persecute you; ever bear in mind, as a consolation under all the frowns of fortune, and as an encouragement to hope for better prospects, that "the Stone which the builders rejected, became the head stone of the corner."

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

VERMONT.

At a regular communication of Randolph R. A. Chapter, convened at Mason's Hall, in Randolph, Vermont, April 3, 5928—

Resolved, that we deeply lament the death of our illustrious companion DE WITT CLINTON, late H. P. of the General Grand Chapter of the U. S. and that we unaffectedly unite with other bodies of masons in our country in deploring his loss, and in yielding our tribute of affection to his memory.

Resolved, that this Chapter deeply regret the loss, our country and this institution has sustained in the recent death of our respected countryman and brother, Maj. Gen. JACOB BROWN. By order of the Chapter.

EXPULSIONS.

NEW-YORK.

At a regular meeting of Pulteneville Lodge, No. 201, in Wayne County, A. L. 5828, Joseph

Wilkins was expelled from all the benefits of masonry, for unmasonick conduct. Extract from the minutes.

JOHN P. WEST, Sec'y.

VERMONT.

At a regular communication of Federal Lodge, No. 15, convened at Mason's Hall, in Randolph, Vermont, April 28, A. L. 5928.

Voted, unanimously, that Darius Sprague, William Hyde, and Lund Tarbox, master Masons, and Phineas Smith, an entered apprentice, for unmasonick conduct, be expelled from the lodge. By order of the lodge.

J. S. WASHBURN, Sec'y. pro tem.

At a regular communication of Independence Lodge, No. 40, holden at Orwell, Vermont, April 22, A. L. 5928, Asher Nichols, of Whiting, a master mason, was expelled the Lodge, and debarred the privileges of masonry, for unmasonick conduct.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

From Braude's Quarterly Journal for April.

ON THE RECENT IMPROVEMENTS IN THE ART OF PRINTING.

Communicated by Mr. Cowper.

It is a remarkable fact, that from the invention of the art of printing, to the year 1798, a period of nearly 350 years, no improvement had been introduced in this important art. In Dr. Dibdin's interesting account of printing, in the Bibliographical Decameron, may be seen representations of the early printing presses, which exactly resemble the wooden presses in use at the present day. The immense superiority of the press over the pen induced, perhaps, a general belief that nothing more was possible, or it might be that the powers of the press were quite equal to the demand for its productions.

A new era has, however, arisen, the prompt and extensive circulation of the publick journals and other periodicals requiring powers which the ordinary press could never reach.

The first important improvement of the common press was the invention of the late Lord Stanhope. This press is composed entirely of iron; the table, on which the types rest, and the platten, (or surface which gives the impression,) are made perfectly level: he has thus introduced better materials and better workmanship, to which, however, he added a beautiful combination of levers, to give motion to the screw, causing the platten to descend with decreasing rapidity, and consequently with increasing force, till it reaches the type, when a very great power is obtained. There have been, perhaps, twenty contrivances for obtaining the same effect; but as a press, Lord Stanhope's invention has not been surpassed. Still it is only a press, and in point of expedition has little superiority over its wooden rival, producing 250 impressions per hour.

Lord Stanhope was also the successful reviver of the art of stereotype founding,—the process of which is as follows,—a brass frame is placed round the form of types; plaster of Paris, mixed with water to the consistence of cream, is then poured on the type, the superfluous plaster being scraped off. When the plaster is hard, the mould is lifted off by means of the brass frame, and from which it is readily detached—it is now baked in an oven, and when well dried and quite hot, it is placed in an iron box or casting-pot, which has also been heated in the oven; it is now plunged into a large pot of melted type-metal, and kept about ten minutes under the surface, in order that the weight of the metal may force it into all the finest parts of the letters,—the whole is then cooled, the mould broken and washed off, and the back of the plate turned in a lathe. This manufacture has been carried to a considerable extent; Mr. Clowes, the proprietor of one of the largest and best conducted printing offices in London, has on his premises between 700 and 800 tons of stereotype plates, belonging to various booksellers,—the value may be estimated at £200,000.

In connection with the Stanhope press, may be briefly noticed a little improvement for the particular purpose of printing musick, after a new process the lines are formed of thin slips of copper driven into small blocks of wood, and the notes are formed of copper driven into a separate block. Two note blocks and corresponding sets of lines are placed on the table of the Stanhope press; to the ordinary tympan of the press is attached another tympan, which revolves in the direction of its plane on a pin in the ordinary tympan. Two sheets of paper are placed under two friskets, hinged to the revolving tympan; an impression being now taken, one sheet will receive the notes, and the other the lines. The revolving tympan is then turned half round, when the sheets will have changed places, another impression is taken, when both sheets will be perfected. This plan is now in operation at the printing office of Mr. Clowes, to whom I have assigned the exclusive use of the patent.

It was in the year 1790, that Mr. W. Nicholson took out a patent for certain improvements in printing, and on reading his specification, every one must be struck with the extent of his ideas on this subject; to him belongs, beyond doubt, the honour of the first suggestion of printing by means of cylinders: the following are his own words, divested of legal redundancies—

"In the first place, I not only avail myself of the usual methods of making type, but I do likewise make and arrange them in a new way, viz. by rendering the tail of the letter gradually smaller, such letter" (he erroneously says) "may be imposed on a cylindrical surface; the disposition of types, plates, and blocks upon a cylinder are parts of my invention."

"In the second place, I apply the ink upon the surface of the types, plate, &c. by causing the surface of a cylinder, (smeared with the colouring matter) to roll over or successively apply itself to the surface of the types, &c., or else I cause the types to apply themselves to the said cylinder,—it is absolutely necessary that the coloring matter be evenly distributed over this cylinder, and for this purpose I apply two, three, or more smaller cylinders, called distributing rollers, longitudinally against the colouring cylinder, so that they may be turned by the motion of the latter,—if this colouring matter be very thin, I apply an even blunt edge of metal or wood against the colouring cylinder.

"In the third place, I perform all my impressions by the action of a cylinder, or cylindrical surface, that is, I cause the paper to pass between two cylinders, one of which has the form of types attached to it and forming part of its surface, and the other is faced with cloth, and serves to press the paper so as to take off an impression of the colour previously applied—or otherwise, I cause the form of types, previously coloured, to pass in close and successive contact with the paper wrapped round a cylinder with woollen. He also describes a method of raising the paper cylinder, to prevent the type from soiling the cloth.

These words specify the principal parts of modern printing machines, and had Mr. Nicholson paid the same attention to any one part of his invention which he fruitlessly devoted to attempting to fix types on a cylinder, or had he known how to curve stereotype plates, he would, in all probability, have been the first maker of a printing machine, instead of merely suggesting the principles on which they might be constructed.

The first working printing machine was the invention of Mr. Koenig, a native of Saxony. He submitted his plans to Mr. T. Bensley, the celebrated printer, and to Mr. R. Taylor, the scientific editor of the Philosophical Magazine. These gentlemen liberally encouraged his exertions; and in 1811 he took out a patent for improvements in the common press, which however produced no favourable result; he then turned his attention to the use of a cylinder, in order to obtain the impression, and two machines were erected for printing the Times newspaper, the reader of which was told on the 28th of November, 1814, that he held in his hand a newspaper printed by machinery, and by the power of steam.

In these machines the type was made to pass under the cylinder, on which was wrapped the sheet of paper, the paper being simply held to the cylinder by means of tapes; the ink was placed in a cylindrical box, from which it was forced by means of a powerful screw depressing a tightly-fitted piston; thence it fell between two iron rollers; below these were placed a number of other rollers, two of which had, in addition to their rotary motion, an end motion, i. e. a motion in direction of their length; the whole system of rollers terminated in two which applied the ink to the types.

In order to obtain a great number of impressions from the same form, a paper cylinder (i. e. the cylinder on which the paper is wrapped) was placed on each side the inking apparatus, the form passing under both. This machine produced 1100 impressions per hour; subsequent improvements raised them to 1900 per hour.

The next step was the invention of a machine, (also by Mr. Koenig,) for printing both sides of the sheet. It resembled two single machines placed with their cylinders towards each other, at a distance of two or three feet,—the sheet was conveyed from one paper cylinder to the other by means of tapes—the track of the sheet exactly resembled the letter S, if laid horizontally, thus, z: in the course of this track the sheet is turned over. At the first paper cylinder it received the impression from the first form, and at the second paper cylinder it received the impression from the second form—the machine printed 750 sheets on both sides per hour. This machine was erected for Mr. T. Bensley, and was the only one Mr. Koenig made for printing on both sides the sheet—this was in 1815.

About this time Messrs. Donkin and Bacon were also contriving a printing machine; having, in 1813, obtained a patent for a machine in which the types were placed on a revolving prism—the ink was applied by a roller which rose and fell with the irregularities of the prism, and the sheet was wrapped on another prism, so formed as to meet the irregularities of the type prism: one of these machines was erected for the University of Cambridge, and was a beautiful specimen of ingenuity and workmanship; it was, however, too complicated, and the inking was defective, which prevented its success. Nevertheless a great point was attained; for in this machine were first introduced inking rollers covered with a composition of treacle and glue; in Koenig's machine the rollers were covered with leather, which never answered the purpose well.

In 1815 I obtained a patent for curving stereotype plates, for the purpose of fixing them on a cylinder. Several of these machines, capable of printing 1000 sheets per hour on both sides, are at work at the present day, and twelve machines on this principle were made for the Bank of England a short time previous to the issue of gold.

It is curious to observe that the same object seems to have occupied the attention of Nicholson, Donkin and Bacon, and myself, viz. the revolution of the form of types. Nicholson sought to do this by a new kind of type, shaped like the stones of an arch. Donkin and Bacon sought to do this by fixing types on a revolving prism, and at last it was completely effected by curving a stereotype plate.

In these machines two paper cylinders are placed side by side and against each of them is placed a cylinder for holding the plates; each of these four cylinders is about two feet diameter,—on the surface of the plate cylinder are placed four or five inking rollers, about three inches diameter: they are kept in their position by a frame at each end of the plate cylinder the spindles of the rollers lying in notches in the frame, thus allowing perfect freedom of motion and requiring no adjustment.

The frame which supports the inking-rollers, called the waving-frame, is attached by hinges to the general frame of the machine; and the edge of the plate cylinder is indented, and rubs against the waving-frame, causing it to wave, or vibrate to and fro, and, consequently, to carry the inking rollers with it, thus giving them a motion in the direction of their length, called the end motion.—These rollers distribute the ink upon the three-fourths of the surface of the plate cylinder, the other quarter being occupied by the curved stereotype plates. The ink is held in a trough; it stands parallel to the plate-cylinder, and is formed by a metal roller, revolving against the edge of a plate of iron; in its revolution, it becomes covered with a thin film of ink; this is conveyed to the plate-cylinder, by an inking roller vibrating between both. On the plate-cylinder, the ink becomes distributed, as before described, and as the plates pass under the inking rollers, they become charged with colour; as the cylinder continues to revolve, the plates come in contact with a sheet of paper in the first paper cylinder, whence it is carried by means of tapes, to the second paper cylinder, where it receives an impression on its opposite side, from the plates on the second plate cylinder, and thus the sheet is perfected.

These machines are only applicable to stereotype plates, but they formed the foundation of the future success of our printing-machinery, by showing the best method of furnishing, distributing, and applying the ink.

In order to apply this method to a machine capable of printing from type, it was only necessary to do the same thing in an extended flat surface, or table, which had been done on an extended cylindrical surface; accordingly, I constructed a machine for printing both sides of the sheet from type, securing, by patent, the inking apparatus, and the mode of conveying the sheet from one paper cylinder to the other by means of drums and tapes. A full description of this machine is given in J. Nicholson's "Operative Mechanic," and in the supplement to the Encyclopedia Britannica; in the latter, by some mistake, it is called "Bensley's machine."

My friend, Mr. A. Applegath, was a joint-proprietor with me in these patents, and he also obtained patents for several improvements. I had given the end motion to the distributing-rollers, by moving the frame to and fro in which they were placed. Mr. Applegath suggested the placing these rollers in a diagonal position across the table, thereby producing their end motion in a simpler manner. Another contrivance of Mr. Applegath's was to place half of my inking apparatus on one side the printing cylinder, and half on the other side, in order that one-half the form might be inked on one side, and one half on the other, and so have a less distance to travel.

Another contrivance of Mr. A. was a method of applying two feeders to the same printing cylinder; these latter inventions are more adapted to newspaper than to book printing.

We have constructed upwards of sixty machines upon our combined patents, modified in twenty-five different ways, for the various purposes of printing books, bank-notes, newspapers, &c. They have, in fact, superseded Mr. Koenig's machines, in the office of Mr. Bensley, (who was the principal proprietor of Koenig's patent,) and also in the office of the "Times," as was announced in that journal a few days since.

It may not be uninteresting to state that no less than forty wheels were removed from Mr. Koenig's machine, when Mr. Bensley requested us to apply our improvements.

Having, on the first trial of our machines, discovered the superiority of the inking-roller and table over the common balls, we immediately applied them to the common press, and with complete success; the invention, however, was immediately infringed throughout the kingdom, and copied in France, Germany, and America; and it would have been as fruitless to have attempted to stop the infringement of the patent as it was found in the case of the Kaleidoscope.

This invention has raised the quality of printing generally,—in almost any old book will be perceived groups of words very dark, and other groups very light; these are technically called "monks and friars," which have been "reformed altogether."

The principal object in a newspaper machine is to obtain a great number of impressions from the same form, or one side of the sheet, and not from two forms, or both sides of the sheet, as in books.

In the Times machine, which was planned by Mr. Applegath, upon our joint inventions, the form passes under four printing cylinders, which are fed with sheets of paper by four lads, and after the sheets are printed, they pass into the hands of four other lads; by this contrivance 4000 sheets per hour are printed on one side.

Machines upon our joint patents are also used for printing the—

A variety of machines have been invented by other persons, which have not been attended with sufficient success to make me acquainted with their merits, with the exception of Mr. Napier, who has erected several machines for newspapers.

Although the success of the inventions in which I have been engaged has rendered frequent reference to them unavoidable, I trust I have distinctly assigned to Mr. Koenig the honour of making the first working machine; and to Mr. W. Nicholson the honor of suggesting its principles, and that I have thus fairly stated the origin, the progress, and the success of the recent improvements in the art of printing.

THE GATHERER.

TILT AND TOURNAMENT EXTRAORDINARY.

On occasion of the last election of Coroner for Worcestershire, a very warm contest was maintained and personal feelings excited, which, for the credit of humanity, it is to be hoped are not general upon such occasions. The successful candidate was Mr. Stokes, son of a gentleman of that name lately living at Pountney Court, on the confines of the counties of Worcester and Gloucester, and acting as land-steward or agent for Mr. Ricardo, on the estates of that gentleman in the neighbourhood. About three weeks ago, Mr. Stokes, sen. while driving his chaise not many miles from Worcester, was met by the gentleman who had opposed the election of his son, who was also in a chaise; neither would accommodate to the exigency of the meeting, which was in a narrow road, and, as if by mutual impulse, they drove furiously against each other. Both were on the instant precipitated to the ground; injured and lacerated, the one was just able to crawl to a cottage—Mr. Stokes was killed on the spot, and his survivor outlived him but five days!

THE LEAPING PIKE.

A gentleman of Ely, famed for his performances among the finney tribe, has a most wonderful phenomenon, a fish of the pike species, weighing about 2 1/2 or 3 lb. If a roach or any other small fish is suspended by a string attached to a pole held in his sight, he will dart out of his native element 16 or even 18 inches, seize the fish and make a meal of him. The cause appears to arise from some natural defect in the organ of sight; if the fish be placed on a level with the jack or in an oblique direction, he can not see it; but being placed horizontally, he immediately recedes a few feet, and bringing his tail in a curve towards his head, by a sudden volition of his tail, he darts out of the water, and seldom misses his object. The only apparent difference between this fish and others of his species is his eyes, which project similarly to those of a hare, and much more than any of his species. The fish is so perfectly tame, that he will follow the waving of a handkerchief round the pond, and may be attracted to any part.

LORD'S PRAYER.

The following is a literal translation into English, of the Lord's prayer in Cherokee,—Our Father, who dwellest above, honoured be thy name. Let thy empire spring to light. Let thy will be done on earth as it is done above. Our food day by day bestow on us. Pity us in regard to our having sinned against thee, as we pity those who sin against us. And lead us not in any place of straying, but, on the other hand, restrain us from sin. For thine is the empire, and the strength and the honour. So let it be.

POPULAR TALES.

THE HYPOCONDRIACK.

From "Death's Doings," by an Eye Witness.
(Concluded.)

I had ordered the carriage to be in Holes-street at twelve precisely; and, anxious to secure my friend, walked to his lodgings immediately after breakfast. I was surprised to find the knocker of the door muffled; but only supposing from it that his landlady was in the straw, I inquired hastily of his servant if his master was packing. "Lord, sir!" says John, "he is in bed." The look of John told me something was wrong, but I was not willing to take the hint; and, stepping into the drawing room, said, carelessly, "Tell your master I am here." Whilst I waited the return of the servant, I took up several books, which were all upon medical subjects: for instance, the Gazette and the Oracle of Health:—Paris on Diet and Digestion:—Abernethy's Works:—Thomson's London Dispensatory:—and Good's Study of Medicine.—"Alas! poor Tom! if this be your course of reading, my efforts to wean you from your malady will prove fruitless," said I, soliloquizing aloud, as John entered the room to conduct me to his master.

I found my friend in bed, in a deplorable state. He informed me that he had been attacked with spasms in the night, and could not have survived but for the skillful aid of Doctor Palm, whom he had sent for, and who he momentarily expected would repeat his visit. He had scarcely uttered his name, when the bed room door opened, and the Doctor was announced. I had no time to make my physiognomical observations, before the learned gentleman was at the bed side, which he approached with a light springy step, on tiptoe; and seizing my friend's hand between both of his hands, and leaning forwards, inquired with all the apparent warmth and anxiety of an old associate, into the state of his present feelings. "I trust, my dear sir," said he, "that the medicines which I prescribed speedily relieved those frightful spasms?" And, without waiting for a reply, turning to me, with the sweetest smile, voice, and manner imaginable, "I found Mr. Wunderlich in a very critical state." He then seated himself, still holding the hand of his patient, and recommenced his professional queries. I had now an opportunity of observing the doctor. He was below the ordinary stature, and of a meagre form; plainly, I should almost say shabbily attired; but his head might have been selected by an artist as the finest model for that of a philosopher. It was partly bald; the forehead beautiful, broad and elevated; the eyes small and shaded; the cheek bones rather high; the nose straight and projecting, and the mouth large and compressed. The forehead was, indeed, the finest I had ever seen; and, although he could not be called good looking, yet his countenance bore the impression of superior intellect, great gentleness, and an anxious desire to please. When he had finished his inquiries and written his prescription, he politely addressed himself to me;—spoke of the news of the town; inquired if I had read the last Edinburgh Review, made many just and critical remarks upon its merits, and those of its rival, the Quarterly; and entering a little into the characters of some of the leading members of both parties in parliament, displayed powers for conversation truly enviable. As he rose to take his leave, he again pressed his patient's hand between both of his hands; promised to see him in the evening, and left the room with the same light springy step, with which he had entered it.

"Ah! my dear Dick!" said Tom, looking after the doctor, "if I had met with that worthy man two years ago, how much misery I should have escaped. Would you believe it, I had beside Bolus, three different physicians at Naples, five at Rome, two at Geneva, three at Paris, my young Scotch travelling companion and Dr. Frogfoot since my return; and not one of them understood my case. Now I feel that I shall get well; and be able to visit you in comfort, in Worcestershire. Did you not admire the tact with which Dr. Palm conducted his inquiries? He is the man." I nodded an assent; and, telling my poor friend that I expected, on my return to town, in eight or ten days, to find him quite recovered, I took my leave, pondering on the delusions which tyrannize over reason, in certain states of our habit; and raising a thousand metaphysical conjectures on the nature of the connexion between body and mind.

Having been detained longer in the country than I expected, twelve days had elapsed before I had an opportunity of again calling in Holes-street. On answering my knock, John received me with a significant smile as he made his usual bow. "We are still here," said he; "and master in the old way. The doctor is with him just now; but you,—I am sure you may walk up. My master is in the drawing room." I followed John; and was kindly received by my poor friend. I expected to have seen, also, my late acquaintance, Dr. Palm, but the individual who now supplied his place, was the antipode, both in form and manner, of that fascinating disciple of Hippocrates. He was a little, portly figure, with a round fresh-coloured, pleasant face; and his head, which was rather large, covered with a profusion of white hair, dressed in the fashion of the last century. Indeed, his entire figure and dress were those of a substantial citizen of 1790. He did not rise when I entered; but merely made a slight inclination of his head, and waved his left hand, which held his hat, raising it from his knee on which it rested. He then fixed his eyes steadfastly upon me, whilst I addressed my friend. After a few minutes, turning suddenly round to his patient, he abruptly inquired, "Have you any thing more to say?" Tom assured him that he had not; that he fully understood his orders; "But the pain!"—"Stop!"—ejaculated the little man,—"I know what you are going to say; it is all fudge. If you know my orders, follow them." Notwithstanding this specimen of his abrupt manner, I ventured to address the doctor; and stated, as my opinion, that my friend would benefit greatly by a change of air and scene. He again eyed me, for a few seconds, and demanded, "Are you a physician, sir?"—"No."—"Are you a surgeon?"—"No."—"Then, sir, what right have you to form an opinion on the subject?"—and, without waiting for a reply, rose from his seat, and left the room.

"Your new doctor is the pink of politeness, my dear Wunderlich!" said I, as he shut the room door with a bang. "He is a character;" replied my friend. "You must have heard of him: Mr. Mybook, the eminent surgeon; a man of great learning, consummate skill in his profession; and, although apparently rough and abrupt in his manners, yet, I am informed, possessed of the kindest and most benevolent disposition." He, at this moment, again opened the door; and having peeped in and said "Friday," shut it, this time, in a more gentle manner. "What a pity," said I, "that the diamond has not passed through the hand of the lapidary! But what has become of my favourite, Doctor Palm?" Here Tom informed me, that he and the doctor had gone on very well together for a week; but at length, coming to a stand still, he thought he would try Mr. Mybook, whose work he had perused, and under whom, although he had been only four days, he really thought he was improved. "He relies little upon medicine," said Tom, "of which he says, I have taken too much, but greatly upon diet and regimen. I ride out twice a day, dine at an early hour, and eat a certain quantity only of food at each meal; after which I lie down on the carpet for an hour, and then crawl, on my belly, to the corner of the room for my tumbler of water, which is all the liquid he allows me. You smile, Dick! but, trust me, all this is done upon principles which experience has verified." I smiled at the gravity with which my friend had gone through these details; telling him at the same time, that I approved much of that part of his plan which referred to horse exercise; on which account the country was the best place for him; and that I had come on purpose, to take him into Worcestershire. He thanked me, but said he could not accept my offer: that he was in search of health, and must be near advice. I perceived it was a hopeless case; and shaking my poor friend by the hand, with a melancholy foreboding departed.

It was not until the end of August, whilst I was busied in preparing for the shooting season, that I again heard of Tom Wunderlich. I was thinking, one morning at breakfast, how much I was to blame for having neglected so long to inquire after him, and wondering whether he was now well enough to bring down a partridge, when a letter from the poor fellow was put into my hands. It entreated me, earnestly, to come and see him, in the vicinity of Dorking, where he had taken a cottage; and, as his health was worse than ever, he hoped nothing would prevent me from forthwith seeing him. The epistle, indeed, was written in a strain which left me only one mode of decision; and, therefore, ordering my tilbury, I drove over to Gloucester; threw myself into the mail; and on the afternoon of the following day, found myself seated in the little parlour of my friend's cottage. He could not at that moment be disturbed, but John informed me, that he feared his master was now ill in good earnest; that he had retained nothing on his stomach for four days; was delirious, and reduced to "an atomy." I inquired what he had been doing. "Ah! sir," said John; "you know how fond he is of new doctors: he has had twenty since you saw him; and has taken a wagon load of physic. Lord, Sir! I have turned many a good penny on the empty phials; but it won't do. I really fear that the poor gentleman is dying." In a few minutes my friend was ready to see me, and I entered his bed room.

Alas! what a change! a young man, not twenty-six, metamorphosed into an old, infirm invalid of seventy; his skin yellow and shrivelled, his cheeks sunk, and his wan eyes almost lost within their bony sockets. He could not rise to welcome me; but stretched out his skinny hand, and with a hoarse yet scarcely audible voice, said: "God bless you, my dear Dick! This is indeed a visit of true friendship." I took hold of his hand and sat down by him, for my heart was too full to speak. He perceived the state of my feelings; and as he feebly returned the pressure of my hand, a hectic smile passed over his countenance, to check a tear which stood in the corner of his eye. "Ah! Dick!" said he, "this is a severe trial. After finding that all the regular faculty had mistaken my case, and having at length found a remedy for it, to be unable to avail myself of the blessing." Here he paused to fetch his breath, for the least effort exhausted him; and although he was up, yet he had scarcely strength to support himself in a chair. I ventured to inquire of what remedy he spoke. "It is," said he, shuddering as he uttered the words, "a live spider; and I have the most implicit faith in the prescription: but I cannot overcome my aversion to the insect. I see a spider in every article of food I swallow; and it consequently does not remain a moment on my stomach. Two nights ago I dreamt that I saw a spider, with a body the size and exact resemblance of a human skull, and legs like those of a skeleton. It crawled up to my mouth, which it was about to enter; and—" Here he was again forced to pause to draw breath: a cold sweat stood upon his forehead, and his fleshless hand was bedewed with an icy moisture. He heaved a deep sigh, and looked me full in the face; and then, as if recollecting himself, he continued his detail. "This spider haunts me day and night, so constantly, that I am perfectly conscious of its existence; and I am also aware that it is the identical one which I must swallow." At this idea he became so much convulsed, that I called aloud for John, and ordered him instantly to fetch a doctor. My poor friend seemed insensible to the sound of my voice and the order I had given. I felt that he was making an ineffectual effort to push back his chair, and I saw that his eye was following, as it were, something on the ground. "Do you not see there," said he, pointing with the finger of his right hand, which he could scarcely raise from his knee—"there!" "I see nothing, my dear Wunderlich!—it is your imagination which is thus distorted by your disease." He drew himself up with horror: "No! no!" he feebly exclaimed, "it is not my fancy:—see it has crawled up my leg: there—there—it is on my heart—I feel it;" and he sunk into his chair. I thought he had fainted; but in a few seconds, he gave a convulsive sob; which was succeeded by another at an equal distance of time; these were then followed by a hissing expiratory sound; his limbs became powerless, and he would have fallen on the floor, if I had not supported him in the chair. The doctor entered the room; but it was only to confirm my apprehensions. The force of the delusion had overwhelmed his nervous system; and, in this doing, Death, in his triumph over mortality, had demonstrated that life may be expelled from her fortress by a phantom of the imagination.

MISCELLANY.

OWEN FELTHAM.

From the Massachusetts Journal.

The works of Owen Feltham, who lived during the reign of James 1st, are full of sententious wisdom. He is strangely in love with conceits and pointed expressions,—so that the gravest sentiment sometimes appears ludicrous by the dress in which it is presented. His style too has very much of poetical involution, and sometimes of sonorous roundness. But there is every where so much of strong conception, and clear, discriminating thought, that one always finds the book a valuable moral treasure. Of time he says, "time is like a ship which never anchors; while I am aboard, I had better do those things that may advantage me at my landing, than practice such as shall cause my commitment when I come to shore." "We see the things we aim at, as travellers do towns in hilly countries; we judge them near at the eyes' end, because we see not the vallies and the brooks that interpose." "Tis much safer to reconcile an enemy than to conquer him. Victory deprives him of his power, but reconciliation of his will; and there is less danger in a will, which will not hurt, than in a power, which can not."—"When two friends part, they should lock up one another's secrets, and interchange the keys." "Let no man slight the scorns and hate of the people. The sands of Africa, though they be but barren dust and lightness, yet, angered by the winds, they bury both horse and traveller alive." "It is with virtuous men as it is with spices, and some kind of fragrant herbs. Their bruising by context tells us all about how rich their odour is."

Owen Feltham wrote an exceedingly humorous "Character of the Low Countries," from which we extract the following:

"They are a general sea-land; the great bog of Europe; there is not such another marsh in the world, that's flat. They are an universal quagmire epitomized. They are the ingredients of a black pudding, and want only stirring together; marry, 'tis best making on't in a dry summer, else you will have more blood than grist."

"Says one, it affords the people one commodity beyond all the other regions; if they die in perdition, they are so low, that they have a shorter cut to hell than the rest of their neighbours. And for this cause, perhaps, all strange religions throng thither, as naturally inclining toward their centre. It is an excellent country for a despairing lover; for every corner affords him a willow to make a garland of: but if justice doom him to be hanged on any other tree, he may, in spite of the sentence, live long and confident. If he had rather quench his spirits than suffocate them, so rather choose to feed lobsters than crows, 'tis but leaping from his window, and he lights in a river, or sea. 'Tis a singular place to fat monkeys in; there are spiders as big as shrimps, and I think as many. No creatures; for sure they were bred, not made; were they but as venomous as they are rank, to gather herbs were to hazard martyrdom. They are so large, that you would almost believe the Hesperides were here, and these the Dragons that did guard them. Their ordinary pack-horses are all of wood, carry their bridles in their tails, and their burdens in their bellies. A strong tide and a stiff gale are the spurs that make them speedy; when they travel they touch no ground, when they stand still they ride, and are never in danger but when they drink up too much of their way. The lining of their houses is more rich than the outside; not in hangings, but in pictures, which even the poorest are there furnished with. Not a cobbler but has his toys for ornament; Were the knacks of all their houses set together, there would not be such another Bartholomew-Fair in Europe. Their artists, for these are as rare as thought, for they can paint you a fat hen in her feathers; and if you want the language, you may learn a great deal of Dutch by their signs, for what they are they never write under them. So by this device hang up more honesty than they keep. Their houses they keep cleaner than their bodies; their bodies than their souls. They are as churlish as their breeder Neptune; and without doubt very ancient, for they were bred before manners were in fashion. They are seldom deceived, for they trust nobody; yet trust them you must if you travel. To ask a bill of particulars is to purr in a wasp's nest; you must pay what they ask, as sure as if it were the assessment of a subsidy. The government is a democracy, and there had need be many to rule such a rabble of rude ones. Tell them of a king, and they cut your throat in earnest. The very name carries servitude in it; and they hate it more than a Jew doth images, a woman old age, or a Non-conformist a surplice. 'Tis a dainty place to please boys in; for your father shall bargain with your schoolmaster not to whip you; if he doth, he shall revenge it with his knife, and have law for it. Men and women are there starched so blue, that if they once grow old, you would verily believe you saw Winter walking up to the neck in a barrel of indigo. To a feast they come readily, but being set once, you must have patience; they are longer eating meat than we in preparing it. They drink down the Evening star, and drink up the Morning star."

NAPOLEON'S RETURN FROM EGYPT.

From Hazlitt's Life of Napoleon.

On the 9th of October, 1799, (16th of Vendémiaire, year 8,) the frigates La Muiron and La Carrière, and the zebecks La Revanche and La Fortune, with which Buonaparte had sailed from Rosetta, cast anchor at the break of day in the gulf of Frejus.

No sooner were the French frigates descried, than it was conjectured they came from Egypt. The people ran in crowds to the shore, eager for news from the army. It was soon understood that Napoleon was on board, and such was the enthusiasm among the people that even the wounded soldiers got out of the hospitals in spite of the guards, and went to the shore. The spectators wept for joy. In a moment the sea was covered with boats. The officers belonging to the fortifications and the customs, the crews of the ships that were anchored in the road, in short, every body thronged round the frigates. At six o'clock that evening Napoleon, accompanied by Berthier, set off for Paris. The fatigue of the passage, and the effect of the transition from a dry to a moist climate, compelled Napoleon to stop some hours at Aix. The inhabitants of the city and the neighbouring villages came in crowds to offer their congratulations at seeing him again. Those who lived too far from the road to present themselves there in time, rang the bells, and hoisted flags upon the steeples, which at night blazed with illuminations. It was not like the return of a citizen to his country, or of a general at the head of a victorious army, but seemed to imply something more than this. The enthusiasm of Avignon, Montelimart, Valence, and Vienne, was only surpassed by that of Lyons. That city, in which Napoleon rested for twelve hours, was in a state of general delirium. The Lyonnese had always testified a strong attachment to him, perhaps from feeling a peculiar interest (on account of their situation) in all that related to Italy. They had also just received the accounts of the battle of Aboukir, which formed a striking contrast to the defeat of the French armies of Germany and Italy. "We are numerous, we are brave," the people seemed every where to say, "and yet we are conquered. We want a leader to direct us—we now behold him, and our glory will once more shine forth." In the mean time, the news of Napoleon's return had reached Paris. It was announced at the theatres, and caused an universal sensation, of which even the Directory partook. Some of the Société du Manege trembled on the occasion, but they dissembled their real feelings so as to seem to share the common sentiment. Baudin, the deputy from the Ardennes, who had been much grieved at the disastrous turn the affairs of the Republic had taken, died of joy when he heard of Napoleon's return.

Napoleon had already quitted Lyons before his landing was announced in Paris. With a precaution hardly necessary in these circumstances, he took a different road from the one he had mentioned to his couriers; so that his wife, his family, and particular friends went in a wrong direction to meet him, and some days elapsed in consequence before he saw them. Having thus arrived in Paris quite unexpectedly, he had alighted at his own house in the Rue Chanteraine before any one knew of his being in the capital. Two hours afterwards he presented himself to the Directory; and being recognised by the soldiers on guard, was welcomed with shouts of gladness. Happy still was this period when every spark of enthusiasm was not dead, and there was at least one man in the world who could excite the least emotion in the public breast!

Buonaparte had every reason to congratulate himself on the reception he met with on all sides. The nature of past events sufficiently instructed him as to the situation of France; and the information he had procured on his journey had made him acquainted with all that was going on. His resolution was taken. What he had been unwilling to attempt on his return from Italy, he was now determined to do at once. He had the greatest contempt for the government of the Directory and for the leaders in the two Councils. Resolved to possess himself of authority and to restore France to her late glory by giving a powerful impulse to public affairs, he had left Egypt to execute this project; and all that he had seen in passing through France had confirmed his sentiments and strengthened his design.

HUMANITY OF ROBERT BRUCE.

From Scott's Tales of a Grandfather.

Robert Bruce was universally celebrated as a wise and good prince: a circumstance, which happened during his retreat from Ireland, shows that he was likewise a kind and humane man. One morning, when the English, with their Irish auxiliaries pressed hard upon Bruce, he gave order to continue a hasty retreat; for a battle with a much more numerous army, and in the midst of a country which favoured his enemies, would have been extremely imprudent. On a sudden, just as king Robert was about to mount his horse, he heard a woman shrieking in despair. "What is the matter?" said the king: and he was informed by his attendants, that a poor washer-woman, mother of a new born infant, was about to be left behind the enemy, as being too weak to travel. The mother was shrieking for fear of falling into the hands of the Irish, who were accounted very cruel; and there were no carriages or means of sending her and her infant on in safety: they must needs be abandoned, if the army retreated.

King Robert was silent for a moment, when he heard this story, being divided between compassion for the poor woman's distress, and the consideration of the danger to which a halt would expose his army. At last he looked round on his officers, with eyes that kindled like fire: "Ah, gentlemen!" he exclaimed, "never let it be said that a man who was born of a woman, and nurtured by a woman's tenderness, left a mother and her infant to the mercy of barbarians. In the name of God, let the odds and the risk be what they will, I will fight rather than have these poor creatures left behind me. Let the army, therefore, draw up in a line of battle, instead of retreating."

The story had a singular conclusion; for the English general, seeing that Robert Bruce halted and offered him battle, and knowing the Scottish king to be one of the best generals then living, supposed that he must have received some large supply of forces, and was afraid to attack him. Thus Bruce had an opportunity to send off the poor woman and her child, and to retreat at his leisure, without suffering any inconvenience from the halt.

LIFE AND DEATH.

"Death is Life, and Life is death," said Euripides; and so said Plato, and so said the Eastern Sages. If then Death be Life, as the wise and virtuous of all ages have believed, the question recurs, what is Life?

Life, says the Beauty, is admiration and gay attire;—it is dice and dash, says the Spendthrift;—it is gain, says the Merchant and the Miser;—it is power, says the Prince. Yet the Alchemist looks for it in an elixir. But Death dethrones the Prince—breaks the Merchant and Miser—out-dashes the Spendthrift and the Belle, and spills the elixir of Life.

Life is action, says the Cricketer; it is a feast, says the Glutton; it is a bubble, says the Philosopher: but Death bursts the Philosopher's bubble, gormandizes the Glutton, and bowls out the Cricketer.

It is fees, says the Physician; it is judgement and execution, says the Judge; it is all vanity, says the Parson: but Death humbles the Parson's vanity, executes the Judge and his judgements, and takes fee of the Physician and his Patients too!

Thou art then a very Proteus, Death, at once a Miser, a Merchant, and a Prince,—thou art a Game, a Glutton, and a Bubble,—thou art Justice to the injured, a Physician to the sick, and an humbler of Vanity,—thou art Master of the Ceremonies of Life, sporting with it in every form, and we have sported with thee!

Thus, view them however we may, Life and Death are endless paradoxes; the love of the one, and the fear of the other, are unquestionably imprinted in our nature for wise purposes—they gain and lose strength, they rise and fall—and in all their movements they dance together.

EDITORIAL DIARY.

May 31. Saint Petronilla; Saints Cantius, Cantianus, and Cantianilla.—1769, the general court of Massachusetts convened at Boston, and immediately petitioned governor Bernard to remove the military parade which surrounded the state house. After some equivocation on the part of the governor, he frankly acknowledged that he had no authority over the king's troops,—expressly proving that the military was set above the civil authority. The governor suffered them to sit several weeks, during which they were peremptorily determined to do no business, until relieved from the insulting and noisy evolutions of military discipline, intended to interrupt their solemn deliberations; nor to allow even their choice of speaker, and other acts of organization to be valid,—protesting against their being considered as a precedent in any future emergency,—because they could not consider their deliberations free, when cannon were planted at the very doors of the state house.—1778, colonel Ethan Allen arrived among his friends after being three years a prisoner. The news of his arrival gave so much joy that it was announced by the discharge of cannon.

JUNE.
Summer is yemen in;
Loud sing cuckoo;
Grow with seed,
And bloweth mead,
And springeth the weed new.

OLD SONG.

True it is that "summer is yemen in;" but has it not often come, and gone, and come again, like the generations that have filled the earth, leaving behind them scarcely a mark of remembrance? It is true, indeed, that heroes have achieved glorious as well as infamous deeds, which stand upon the page of the chronological annals. The wars of the elements, and the great events which sometimes follow the ordinary steps of nature, have also their seasons, which memory cheerfully hails; and we attach the respect or the regret with which we commemorate the event to the anniversary period. But these are no part of the real and happy beauties of June. We do not commemorate the opening of the piony, the coming of the cuckoo, the springing of the young maize, nor the ripening of the strawberry, with all the festivity of a naval victory, or the birth of a great man. But let the unbiassed heart answer;—is there in the whole catalogue of glorious events, a deed of man to be compared with the work which during this month, comes in such rich profusion from the glorious hand of nature? Who ever walked into the fields, and pulled, one by one, the miracles of her handy-work, without a thought of human vanity, when compared to divine perfection? for here is that perfection taught. Man may destroy; but God alone can create;—create too, in beauty and in light, so simple and so lovely, that in our inspection of his works, we stop and wonder, at a loss which to admire most, the skill of the Creator, or the simple beauty of his creation. We could cite the authority of eminent poets to prove that there is an inspiration, bordering on enthusiasm, in every trait of nature, during this month; but to mention poetry in the presence of nature, is a kind of impiety. There is in fact no poetry like that which is felt; and when we read the book of nature, "every man is his own poet for the time being."

June. 1. Saints Justin Martyr, Pamphylus, Caprias, Peter of Pisa, Wistan, and Nicomede. TRINITY SUNDAY. This is observed as a festival in the Catholic, and several other churches, with peculiar services, to commemorate the Trinity in Unity, as the other festivals commemorate the Unity in Trinity.—1794, Lord Howe, obtained a great victory over the French fleet.—1813, the United States' frigate Chesapeake, of 36 guns, Captain Lawrence, was captured by the British frigate Shannon, of 38 guns. The brave Lawrence was killed during the engagement, and forty of his crew. The Shannon, according to the British account had twenty-six killed. The battle was fought within sight of the Boston light house.—1814, lieutenant colonel Pearson, with 250 North-Carolina militia, and seventy indians, took 922 indians prisoners, on the banks of the Alabama.

June 2. Saints Pothinus, Sanctus, Attalus, &c.—1780, the Protestants, to the number of 50,000, went in a body to the house of commons, to petition for the repeal of an act passed in favour of the Catholics.—1734, John Roussey, of the isle of Distrey, Scotland, died at one hundred and thirty years of age. The son who inherited his estate was born in his hundredth year.—1817, the market of Saint Germain, in Paris, was formally blessed, by the rector of Saint Sulpice, accompanied by the clergy of the parish.

June 3. Saints Cecilius, Clotilda, Coemgen, Lifard, and Genesis.—1611, the lady Arabella Seymour, whose relation to the blood royal had caused so much uneasiness to queen Elizabeth, and cost Sir Walter Raleigh his head, escaped from imprisonment, where she had been placed, through the same sentiments of jealousy in James I.

June 4. Saints Quirinus, Optatus, Walter, Petroc, Breaca, Burian, and Nenoc.—1789, George III. born.—1814, Louis XVIII. gave the French a new constitution.—1815, the French legislature held their first session after the return of Buonaparte from Elba.—1813, Commodore Decatur driven into New-London with the two frigates, United States and Macedonian, and the sloop of war Hornet.

June 5. Saints Boniface, Dorotheus, and Illidius.—1826, Carl Maria Von Weber, the eminent musical composer, died in London, of a pulmonary affection.—1806, Louis Buonaparte was proclaimed king of Holland.

June 6. Saints Norbert, Philip the deacon, Gudwell, and Claude.—1762, Lord Anson, the navigator, died at Moorpark, near Rickmansworth, Herts, aged sixty-two.—1813, Generals Chandler and Winder, taken prisoners by surprise, at Forty-mile creek; but the British were compelled to retreat in haste, and with considerable loss.

We notice the proceedings of Apollo Lodge, in Troy, at a meeting held on the 23d inst. Resolutions appropriating the sum of twenty-five dollars, and a circular addressed to the several lodges of the state, inviting them to contribute towards redeeming from execution the furniture and library of our Past Grand Master, De Witt Clinton, have been published in several papers. While we are compelled to regret that something of this kind has not been effectually done before, we are happy to see that something like propriety is started at this late period. We fear however that these exertions are too late to save any part of the library, as the sale has advanced too far already for a recovery. Some part of the furniture and other articles of personal property may be purchased according to the proposed plan; but the library being partly disposed of to individuals, literally by the volume, it is not to be expected that they can be redeemed. Too much cannot be tried, however, and if only a part is spared from a total dispersion, it may be an act which the contributors shall hereafter look back with self-approbation. It is to be regretted that something had not been attempted long ago, and that too without the publicity which must necessarily attend any effort that can now be made. Though it becomes the charitable at all times to "let not their left hand know what the right hand doeth," it is much more proper at a time when so many are ready to sacrifice every principle of honour and justice, rather than allow the masonic fraternity an opportunity to do an act of benevolence.

FIRES IN NEW-YORK. It is to be feared that an extensive and daring conspiracy exists in the city of New-York. The papers of that city, of Saturday last, stated that there had been no less than five actual fires in the upper part of the city during the previous forty-eight hours. There were also two alarms on Saturday, making six fires and twelve alarms within a week. On Monday evening a more destructive fire broke out in the Bowery. It commenced in the stable of Chambers and Underhill, in Bayard-street, at about a quarter past six o'clock. The south-west wind soon extended it to the adjacent buildings, and among the rest, the Bowery theatre was totally destroyed. The buildings being filled with ardent spirits and other combustibles burned rapidly, and completely baffled the utmost skill of the firemen. At one period during the conflagration, the gas in the pipes which supplied the theatre took fire, and the effect on distant spectators was like that of lightning. It is already understood that measures are taken to rebuild this theatre, on a larger and more complete plan. Excepting the wardrobe, which is a dead loss to the actors, the insurance is nearly enough to cover the loss.

Since this, fires have succeeded each other in such quick succession, as to render it barely possible to enumerate them. Two fires broke out near each other on the morning of Wednesday last, soon after midnight. The first broke out in a building which had been partly destroyed in a previous fire, but was now repairing. It was extinguished without much damage. But another, only two hours after, broke out in Charlton-street very near the former, which consumed in spite of the utmost labour of the firemen, nearly or quite a dozen buildings. Six horses perished in a stable. These were without doubt the work of an incendiary. Two have since occurred; one in Church-street, directly in the rear of Saint Paul's church, with the evident design of destroying a range of wooden buildings adjoining the stable in which it was discovered; the wind blowing in that direction. The other was in a grocery in Fulton-street; but happily both were extinguished without doing much damage.

It is impossible to describe the alarm occasioned by these apparent attempts to destroy the city. ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS are offered by twenty-one insurance offices for the apprehension of any person who may have set fire to any of the premises lately burned, or who may set fire to any building for three months to come.

FOREIGN NEWS. By recent arrivals at Boston and New-York, we have London dates to the 28th of April. French papers received state, under date of Vienna April 12, that the English cabinet had informed the other powers of Europe, that in case of a rupture between Russia and Turkey, she will remain neutral; but, that in concert with France, she will persist in the execution of the treaty of July 6. This may be received as a pledge for a continuance of peace between the powers. Russia has also repeatedly avowed, that she has not in view any increase of territory. The Great Walnut Tree, which made so much noise in our large cities for a long time, has arrived at London. The news of the Russian declaration of war, reached Constantinople on the 24th of March. The news, though not official, caused great sensation, and was generally believed. The Emperor of Russia was at Petersburg as late as the 9th of April.

TABLE TALK.

Par-ia Par-ibus. Dr. Parr being at a dinner where "Church and State" was drunk, refused to join; but being urged by those about him, he said—"Well then, gentlemen, 'Church and State,' it was once the toast of Jacobites, now it is the toast of Incendiaries. It means a Church without the Gospel, and a King above the law."—Jack Ketch superseded. The grand council of the Valais, in Switzerland, has published a decree abolishing the punishment of death.—Let us Editors alone, then! In Ohio William Evans has been fined ten dollars and cost of prosecution, and ten days imprisonment, to be fed on bread and water, for cowskinning Mr. Howard, editor of the National Historian.—Hereditary Tin Work. Mr. William Howe of Boston, advertises that his "real old stand" has been occupied for the manufacture of tin ware and coffin furniture, by successive generations of the same family for more than a century. The building was erected in 1701, and bears on the front an antique and curious inscription.—Huzza for Pedagogues! Mr. Brougham, the great English orator, in one of his last speeches in the British parliament, stated it as his belief that a school master with a primer, would accomplish more in the present age, than a soldier with a bayonet!—Cruel War. The king of the Netherlands, by a decree of the 25th of November, has ordered that, in one year, all the rabbits in the provinces of Holland shall be exterminated, on account of the injury they do the dykes.—American System. A Connecticut paper states, that the firm of Allyn, Marsh, & Co. of Hartford, have been married to Miss Elizabeth Cornish. The firm we should presume from this are extensively engaged in domestic manufactures. How will they register the parentage of the children in the parish records?—Experimental. In Warwick, Orange county, Nehemiah Finn, a coloured man, died by hanging himself in the way of experiment.—Burglary. In Burke county, Georgia, a "free-drinker," known by the name of old John Martin, broke into a distillery, and drank himself to death from a whiskey barrel.—Crim. Con. Married, in Warren, Herkimer county, Mr. David Crim to Miss Eve Crim.—A Monument. The Raleigh Register notices the recent death of a gentleman, who had been a subscriber to that paper for twenty-eight years, without having been in arrear more than six months at any one time. What an eulogy to be inscribed on a man's tomb!—Bachelor's Opinion. "I consider an unmarried lady declining into the vale of years," says Goldsmith, "as one of those charming countries bordering on China, that lies waste for want of proper inhabitants. We are not to accuse the country, but some of its neighbours, who are insensible of its beauties, though at liberty to enter and cultivate the soil."—General Foy's landed. A "scientific Englishman," by the name of Foy, announces himself in the New-York papers as "the celebrated Bed Bug Killer, from London, and offers his services to the public, pledging himself to destroy effectually those troublesome vermin." He says one trial will be a sufficient proof, not wishing to descend over much in his own favour.—New Standard for Time. The bye laws of the Fall river Institution for Savings, contain the following provision—"time as kept by Joseph Gooding, esq. shall be the standard of time until some different standard shall be agreed upon."—Robbery. A foolish and dangerous joke was played off not long since upon two gentlemen going to a party, upon the banks of the Schuylkill. A few miles above the city, the gentlemen were stopped by six persons, and told to deliver up their watches, quizzing glasses, chains, seals, trinkets, &c. &c. Which they as a matter of course complied with. The same night all the articles were restored.—A ready made Citizen imported. An honest Hibernian presented himself at the poll of the fifth ward in Rochester, at a late election, to exercise his prerogative as an adopted son of this home of the oppressed, when the following dialogue took place between him and the inspector:—Inspector. Are you a naturalized citizen of this country? Hibernian. Sure I am, your honour. Inspector. How long is it since you were naturalized? Pat looked with some astonishment at the inspector, when he exclaimed, "J—s, wasn't I naturalized, long before I came to this country!"—Conscience! The chancellor of England has recently received £1,200 from an unknown person to be returned to the public funds, "for conscience sake."—Nonsense. A Baltimore paper states that "the dead point is gained, and perpetual motion is discovered, by John J. Girard, physician, of the city of Baltimore." When the time comes that a man can take hold of the waistbands of his own breeches, and by his own unaided animal strength, can lift himself from the earth and transport himself to the moon, then, and not till then, will any one discover perpetual motion.—Give the Devil his Due. The editor of the Upland Chester Union, acknowledges the receipt of a large slice of poundcake, accompanying a marriage notice, which cake was liberally distributed to those at work in the office—"allotting the Devil his portion."—Monks of the Screw. A celebrated society, under this name, partly political and partly convivial, was formed in Dublin, in 1779. J. Philpot Curran, the first Prior of the order, supplied the brotherhood with a hymn, moving them to abstinence and mortification, thus:

My brethren, be chaste, till you're tempted:
Whilst sober, be wise and discreet;
And humble your bodies by fasting,
As oft as you've nothing to eat.

—A Dollar's worth of Life. A late number of the Onondaga Register, relates a shocking and melancholy instance of death by the use of ardent spirits. A Mr. Fountain, of that town, who had long been addicted to habits of intemperance, was induced for one dollar to swallow a quart of whiskey. After taking this dram, he was carried from the store to his house, where, after lying a short time in a state of insensibility, he expired.

LITERARY NOTICES.

—Contents of the May number of Mrs. Hale's Ladies' Magazine;—ORIGINAL MISCELLANY:—Female Character; Sketch of American Character,—No. 5,—The Village School Mistress; Letters from a Mother; The deaf Girl; Legal Condition of Woman. ORIGINAL POETRY:—The Eye of the Dead; The Wife; Canzonetta; Last Thoughts; Tale of other Times; Fame and Love. CRITICAL NOTICES:—"Elia;"—"Almack's Revisited;"—"The Child's Botany;"—"Sayings and Doings, third Series." Card. Mrs. Hale, having been necessarily detained from a personal superintendence of the Ladies' Magazine, has now taken the charge of the work according to engagement. We look with confidence on the success of her labours, and can with the same confidence recommend it to such of our female readers as love to encourage merit, while they at the same time contribute to their own entertainment.

—*We have received the first number of the Western Journal of the Medical and Physical Sciences, published at Cincinnati, Ohio, and edited by Dr. Daniel Drake. The contents of this number are:—ESSAYS AND CASES. A Discourse on the Causes, Effects, and Preventives of Intemperance, from Ardent Spirits. —The Kingston Gazette and Religious Advocate, is the title of a new quarto, published at Kingston, Upper Canada, by Stephen Miles. It is devoted to Religion, General Intelligence, Politics and Literature.

—The Socialist, is a new work printed weekly by A. Greene, editor of the Berkshire American.

—The Fredonia Censor, published at Fredonia, Chautauque county, has been enlarged, and put into new type.

—The Boston Evening Bulletin, has been enlarged, and now appears in a very respectable size; without, however, any increase in the price.

—ANOTHER BANK FAILURE. We learn that the directors of the Franklin Bank in New-York, came to a resolution on Wednesday last, to suspend further payments, and discontinue all operations. On Thursday, on the application of the president of the institution, and also of Henry Astor, esq., one of the creditors, the chancellor issued his injunction, prohibiting all further transactions. Its concerns are said to be not very extensive, not having more than $20,000 in circulation.

—A CARD.—To Messrs. Goringhouse & Bates. The undersigned asks leave to inform them that he has returned to the county of Niagara, where he can be found, and is ready to transact any business they may have with him. WILLIAM KING.

—TO THE PUBLIC.—At the last court of general sessions of the peace, held in this county, an indictment was found against me, for the abduction of one William Morgan. I now solemnly declare, that I am wholly innocent of the charge, that I never had any concern, either directly or indirectly in carrying him away, or confining him, or doing him any injury whatever, in any shape or manner; neither did I ever consent to his being confined for a single moment; and I furthermore declare, that there was not one particle of evidence before the grand jury, which tended to show that I had any concern in the transaction; I therefore request the public to suspend their opinion on the subject, until an investigation can be had, before a competent tribunal. I should not dare to make the above appeal, were I not positive that what I have stated is truth. The indictment undoubtedly was either inconsiderately found, was intended to have a political effect, or obtained through malice. Every editor who shall notice the indictment found against me, will do me the act of justice by giving the above one insertion. WILLIAM HOTCHKISS. Lewiston, May 15, 1828.

—FRESH GOODS.—N. TIRRELL, No. 549, South Market street, has received and manufactured his spring stock of Brushes, Trunks, and Bandboxes, where orders from any part of the country will be received to any amount in his line of business; and as he offers the best assortment of any one in the city or its vicinity, and has had an opportunity of getting direct from the importers, the choice of their stock, he warrants his goods 15 per cent better than they have been in a number of years. Those who wish to purchase will do well to call and examine for themselves. May 31. 1828

—HARTWICK SEMINARY.—This Seminary has been established about thirteen years, in the pleasant valley of the Susquehanna, county of Otsego, situated four and a half miles from the village of Cooperstown, and seventy miles west from the city of Albany. Young gentlemen from various parts of the United States, have there received a preparatory education for entering college in this and the neighbouring states. And the subscriber believes that most of his pupils have hitherto sustained a favourable character at college, both in relation to their moral conduct, and their proficiency in the several branches of sciences in which they have been instructed.

The branches taught are the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages; French and German; Natural Philosophy; History; Mathematics in general, and particularly Surveying, both theoretical and practical; Geography; English Grammar; exercises in English composition; Arithmetic, Writing, &c.

The Rev. George B. Miller, who for a number of years past, has been successfully engaged in the tuition of youth, both in this state and the state of New-Jersey, has been appointed assistant teacher in the seminary. The present term commenced on Monday the 19th of May, to continue to the last Wednesday in August.

For further particulars and references as to the character of the institution, the subscriber would refer the public to the Rev. F. G. Mayer, of Albany; the Rev. Dr. Wackerhagen, of Clermont; the Rev. Dr. Quintman, of Rhinebeck; the Rev. Dr. Nott, President of Union College; the Rev. Mr. Shaffer, and the Rev. Dr. Geisenhauer, of New-York; to the clergy of the Lutheran Church in this and the neighbouring states in general, and to the trustees of Hartwick Seminary in particular.

Good boarding may be had in the neighbourhood of the seminary, at the moderate price of 12 or 14 shillings per week.

ERNEST L. HAZELIUS, Principal of Hartwick Seminary.

PARAPHRASE.

Ere God arranged the heavens and earth,
No form defined had matter known;
O'er viewless, barren depths of space,
A dark and misty veil was thrown;
Lifeless, scattered, stagnant—all
Waited the Almighty call.

His voice creative light obeyed;
(Upon the abyss his breath had moved);
The darkness took a deeper shade,
And separate day its radiance proved.
Evening into being came,—
Morning caught the lambent flame.

Around the Source of Light, the expanse
Spread wide for embryo worlds to rise,
While brightening fluids far beneath
Reflected first the azure skies.
Evening's space to God was known,—
Morning's bounds to him alone.

Condensing floods he gathers fast;
Earth's countless atoms joined appear;
With budding grass and seedy herbs,
Fruit-yielding trees its surface cheer.
Evening saw the waters bound,—
Morning light the verdant ground.

He made for us two greater lights,
The signs of seasons and of years,
(Bright rule of day!—pale guide of night!)—
And formed his power the distant spheres.
Evening silent music flung,—
Morning stars together sung.

Self-moving tribes, immense of light,
Swarm in the seas—soar high o'er earth—
For God designed their varying forms,
And bade the fluids give them birth;
Evening shakes the sunny throng,—
Morning wakes her birds of song.

From parent earth arose the beasts
That graze the meadows—prowl for prey—
Formed after models in his mind,
Their Maker's blessing speeds their way,
Bounding through the sunny glade,—
Prolific 'mid the forest shade.

"Let us"—he meditates—"make man"—
His own similitude are they,
Of either sex—upright in mould—
Heaven's humbler offspring own their sway,
Since light, the breath of heaven, shone,
His Maker's image man alone

"Replenish earth!" was God's command,—
"Its fruits and plants your table spread;"
The winged fowl and creeping things
With grassy herbs and weeds he fed.
Evening's work in order stood
Morning rose—and ALL WAS GOOD.

SONG.

When at the lonely midnight hour,
A light bark o'er the wave is cleaving,
Old ocean, waked to life and joy,
His brightest smiles for her is wearing.

So do I wake my smiles for thee,
When thou thy lip to mine art pressing;
Nor think how soon that joy will flee,
Now prized above all earthly blessing.

But as the glittering wave is deemed,
By that proud rover's absence shrouded;
So all the smiles that gleamed for thee,
Too soon are by thy parting clouded.

MIDSUMMER MUSINGS.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

It is the summer of the fleeting year,
On the brown sward the flowers are faint and few;
All songs are hushed; and but the clear balloo
And laram of the bird-boy reach the ear.
Through the warm air floats far the lime's perfume,
But wayside boughs have lost the rose's bloom.

The corn is golden on a thousand slopes,
All crisply rustling to the living breeze;
And 'mid the billowy sound of summer trees
I wander, pondering on departed hopes;
Nor hopes alone, but pleasant lives departed,—
I walk alone—for I am lonely hearted.

What of those blest affections have I found,
Which life should ripen like its summer corn?
Which has not from my feeble grasp been torn,
Of all the love with which young life was crowned?
Hearts, which I should seek, I know not where
To find their graves—yet have they long been there.

These fell away like leaves when life was new Smitten by that blight which to the fairest clings;
And though I have lived on through many springs,
No greenness follows where those buds first grew.
Still glows the heart, but glows without the power
To give or gain the freshness of that hour.

Yet why should I be sad?—for nature spreads
Her wealth before me daily; from her heart,
Doth joys, proud thoughts, sweet sympathies impart,
Which I drink in as one who nothing dreads.
Fearless that her's like man's weak mind should fall
Her face should darken, or her pleasures pall.

Yet why should I be sad?—for I have found
One true companion,—one dear soul is mine,
Whose converse still doth soothe, arouse, refine;
And on my hearth there is a cheerful sound
Of lightsome feet, and tones that in my ears
Ring like the hopes and joys of other years.

Then, though the false depart, the weak descend,
Though lights which seemed immortal cease to burn,
Though it be mine with bitter tears to mourn
Life's sorest sight—a soul-debased friend;
Firm is my faith in truth and virtue's lot,
Though thousands feign, and myriads feel them not.

The following spirited translation of a song, which has become national in Germany, is copied from the London Weekly Review. It concludes the first part of "Wallenstein," the triumph of Schiller's dramatic genius.

SONG OF THE CUIRASSIER.

Up, comrades! up, to horse! to horse!
And seek the field of pride,
For there man feels his native force,
And there the heart is tried.
Not asking aid from other's hands,
Defender of himself he stands.

Now freedom's flame hath fled, we find
But lords or bondsmen vile,
And falsehood filling all mankind
With coward hearted guile.
The soldier—only freeman now—
Can gaze on death with dauntless brow.

Life's thoughtful cares he casts away,
And, free from anxious fear,
He looks to fate with aspect gay.
Nor heeds her frowns how near.
To-morrow's dawn may life destroy,
Then drain to-day the cup of joy!

In heaven his noble name's enrolled,
No need has he to toil;
Let miners search the earth for gold,
And covetously toil,—
They dig and dive while life remains,
And dig their graves mid useless gains.

The bridal banquet is decreed,
And festal torches glare;
The horseman spurs his foaming steed,
Unasked, unwelcome there:

Nor gold nor vows his passion prove;
In storms he wins the prize of love!

Why mourns the maid with streaming eyes?
Away! away! away!
No spot of earth, no true love lies,
Can lure the soldier's stay;
The sport of fate's resistless wind,
He may not leave his peace behind.

Then, comrades, up! to horse! to horse!
The breast in battle swells!
Hast, quaff the life cup's sparkling force
Ere time its dew dispels!
The stake be deep—the prize is high:
Who life would win must dare to die!

From the Boston Statesman.
TO A BRIDE.

Pass thou on! for the vow is said
That is never broken;
The band of blessing hath trembling laid
On snowy forehead and simple braid,
And the word is spoken
By lips that never their words betrayed.

Pass thou on! for thy human all
Is richly given,
And the voice that claimed its holy thrall
Must be sweeter for life than music's fall,
And this side heaven
Thy lip may never that trust recall.

Pass thou on! yet many an eye
Will droop and glisten,
And the hushing heart in vain will try
To still its pulse as thy step goes by,
And we vainly listen
For thy voice of witching melody.

Pass thou on! yet a sister's tone
In its sweetness lingers,
Like some twin echo sent back alone,
Or the bird's soft note when its mate is flown,
And a sister's fingers
Will again o'er the thrilling harp be thrown.

And our eyes will rest on their foreheads fair,
And our hearts awaken,
Whenever we come where their voices are—
But oh, we shall think how musical were,
Ere of these forsaken,
The mingled voices we listened there.

Pass on! there is not of our blessings one
That may not perish—
Like visiting angels whose errand is done,
They are never at rest till their home is won,
And we may not cherish
The beautiful gift of thy light—Pass on!

EPITAPH ON A YOUTHFUL ACTOR.

BY BEN JONSON.

Weep with me, all you that read
This little story;
And know for whom a tear you shed,
Death's self is sorry.

'T was a child that did so thrive
In grace and feature,
That heaven and nature seemed to strive
Which owned the creature.

Years he numbered scarce thirteen
When fate turned cruel,
Yet three filled zodiacs had he been
The stage's jewel.

And did act, what now we moan,
Old men so duly,
As sooth, the Fates thought him one,
He played so truly.

MASONICK RECORD.

A MASONICK EULOGY.

Delivered at Worcester, Massachusetts, June 24, A. L. 5796, on the Festival of Saint John the Baptist, before the Officers and Brethren of Morning Star Lodge, in that Town, joined by Trinity Lodge, from Lancaster.

BY REV. THADDEUS MASON HARRIS.

Respected Hearers, You see before you a band of brothers, connected with each other by the firmest engagements and most affectionate ties.—Warmed with the most general philanthropy, they profess to unite their endeavours in the benevolent design of assisting the perfection of the human character, and the harmony and happiness of society. Their institution boasts its origin in the earliest ages of the world; and it retains its ancient laws uncorrupted, its venerable rites and expressive symbols unchanged, and its primeval ceremonies entire. The stupendous pyramids which were raised, the lofty obelisks inscribed, and the magnificent temples built by masonick hands, have yielded to the ravages of time; but the institution itself has survived their overthrow, and outlived their glory. It will continue still, and flourish, till

"The great globe itself,
And all which it inherits, be destroyed,
And like the baseless fabric of a vision,
Leave not a wreck behind."

Had we leisure, it would be an interesting and entertaining research to trace its progress through the various stages of society it has successively improved and adorned: to see its early honours in Egypt;* its consecration at Jerusalem; its subsequent glory; and its preservation, and extension "in ages long gone by." It is true that in recurring to some periods of its remote history, we should have occasion to lament that the unfounded and illiberal prejudices of too many which it could not soften, and their corrupt passions which it could not subdue; at times denied the craft its merited honours, opposed its cause and impeded its progress.† Like the sun, its emblem, it has at times been obscured. Clouds and darkness have overshadowed its lustre: the clouds of error and the darkness of ignorance. But from the temporary penumbra it always emerged with increased splendour. And though from low minds mists of prejudice may still arise, and dim the clearness of its horizon, before the meridian light of reason, truth and wisdom, they will quickly disappear.

In the dark ages masonry yielded only a faint and glimmering radiance: "A light that shined in a dark place." But, when the gloom of ignorance and barbarism was dispelled, it revived in its pristine consequence and glory.

* Those who have most minutely investigated ancient history, will have reason to date the origin of the Egyptian mysteries at the times of Joseph; who, not being able to subvert the idolatry and superstition of the country, and introduce his own purer faith, communicated to select friends, under suitable cautions, the knowledge of the Divine Unity and spirituality, of the immortality of the soul, and some leading truths in the patriarchal religion. These dogmas were transmitted down; but, through the lapse of ages, became somewhat obscured and corrupted.

The Eleusinian and Gentile mysteries were probably branches of this more ancient establishment; and not distinct institutions. For an account of these, consult Ælian, Var. Hist. xii. c. 21. Pausanias, x. c. 21. and Mursii Eleusinia: In tom. 7. Gronov. Antiq. Gr.

† Nor did the priests of the mysteries neglect to recommend to the brethren a spirit of friendship and the love of virtue; so pleasing even to the most corrupt minds, and so requisite to render any society respectable in its own eyes. † Gibson's obs. on the viith book of the Æneid, p. 7.

† Prepossession hurries people to condemn what they will not have patience to understand.

Happily at the present day those prejudices lose much of their pristine obstinacy. "Time has allayed the violence of party, and checked with a cool discretion the tumults of opposition. Mankind, superior to national predilection or the barriers of policy or priestcraft, begin to follow the dictates of reason, and honour the wise and the good whatever be their country or their creed."

Those who enter minutely into the history of this society, will find it eventful and interesting. Various have been the efforts wantonly used, even in later times, to disturb its tranquillity and diminish its importance. Dissatisfaction has, however, been obliged to yield to conviction; and the groundless imputations of enmity, have been silenced by a display of the virtues the institution recommends and excites, and the laudable effects it produces. Among all nations, at last, its salutary influence is felt, and its beneficial tendency acknowledged. And, (though, like the common blessing of light, unheeded in its silent operation,) men are ignorantly indebted to it, as a principle, for some of the most disinterested exertions of generosity, and some of the sweetest intimacies of endearing friendship and social life.

Freemasons have always considered liberality as a virtue of the most general obligation and diffusive nature. To administer relief to the needy, and consolation to the distressed, is their most constant wish, and their highest pride; establishing friendship and forming connexions not by receiving but conferring benefits; and diffusing the conveniences and comforts of life with that cheerful readiness and benevolent impartiality which heightens their value and sweetens their possession. Their bounty is not dissipated among those who can return the obligation; but is frequently conveyed to distant lands and foreign cities, to the naked and the hungry who see not the hand that reaches out the kind supply, and can make no acknowledgement to their unknown benefactors but the ardent benediction of gratitude.

To communicate the blessings of which we are partakers; to contribute to the successful propagation of knowledge, virtue and peace, of the sciences and the arts, and of whatever cultivates and adorns social life; and to assist the advancement of human happiness; have ever been the great objects of this venerable association. Impressed with a due sense of their obligation to the discharge of their duties, the members of it have steadily pursued such means as were apparently most conducive to the accomplishment of so desirable an end: and they hope to surmount the obstacles and discouragements which retard its more general propagation.

To reflect on the rapid progress and present general diffusion of the royal art through almost every part of the habitable world,† must be particularly agreeable to all its friends; to every one sincerely interested in the cause of humanity; the happiness of his species.

At the present, as in every former age over which it hath spread its principles, masonry constitutes the affectionate and indissoluble alliance which unites man in warm cordiality with man. It forms the most liberal and extensive connexions. No private prepossession nor national predilection, no civil policy nor ecclesiastical tyranny, no party spirit, nor dissocial passion, is suffered to prevent

* This art was called royal not only because it was originally practiced by kings and princes, who were its first professors and warmest patrons, but likewise on account of the superiority which so sublime a science gave its disciples over the rest of mankind." Smith, p. 27.

† Eumenius, speaking of the number of masons that went over to the continent, about the beginning of the fourth century, says, "even our city Antium, most devoted to your service, and in whose name I am especially to congratulate you, has been well stored with architects and masons, since your victory over the Britons, whose provinces abounded with them: so that it now rises in splendour, by the rebuilding of ancient houses, erecting public works, and the instaurations of temples. Thus the ancient name of a Roman brotherhood, which they long since enjoyed, is again restored, by having your imperial majesty for their second founder." Fanag Emp. Maximian, Aug. dict.

See "Notices of the History of Freemasonry, in all Parts of the World." 8vo. Boston, 1798.

the engagement, nor interfere with the free exercise of that brotherly love, relief and fidelity, it fails not to produce. It has for ages been lamented, that petty distinctions and partial considerations, irrational prejudices and contracted sentiments, should so much obstruct the friendly intercourse of mankind. Masonry breaks down these formidable barriers. In its solemn assembly, around its social altar, meet the inhabitants of different countries with benignant looks of esteem, and sentiments of unfeigned friendship. Around distant lands it casts philanthropy's connecting zone, and binds together in the same sympathies the whole family on earth.

By the use of the universal language of masons, members of the fraternity of all nations communicate easily and freely with each other.† On every quarter of the globe they can make known their wishes, and be sure of finding an attentive friend, a hospitable asylum, and liberal assistance.

With religion, whose sublime doctrines it cannot increase, whose noble precepts it cannot improve, and whose sanctions it dare not adjudge, masonry does not interfere. The duties of piety must be the voluntary and spiritual intercourse of man with heaven. Over them it usurps no control and claims no jurisdiction. It is satisfied with teaching all the brethren that "the Eye which seeth in secret" observes all their conduct; that they must therefore "live as seeing him who is invisible," and have their souls raised superiour to the gross indulgences of vice, and their affections refined by the sublime energies of virtue; that they must be alive to all the engaging duties of benevolence, and be attached to their fellow men by all those tender ties of friendship and good will which hold the heart in the most permanent captivity.

Such, my hearers, is the genius, the design, and tendency of this institution.

But faint and imperfect is the representation I have given. Yet I cannot but hope that, though it be but as the sun painted in the dew drop, it will be found to have the merit of reflecting something of the splendour of its original.

At the door of masonry I stand with my taper. Would you view the glories of the temple, enter in and dwell there.

The ingeniousness of nature, my brethren, kindles a blush at the praise which comes so near to ourselves. Yet, who, but one of its own members, can speak the eulogy of an establishment, all of whose regulations, and most of whose effects, are not open to general inspection, but designedly concealed from all but the initiated? Determined by his conviction, and in the cause of truth, reason, and philanthropy, indifferent alike to ridicule and censure, the speaker asserts the high utility and value of this society, for the encouragement and cultivation of those attainments and qualities which are of vital consequence to moral and social man. He honours from his soul its laws: those laws which softening nature by humanity melt nations into brotherhood. Happy would it be for the peace of the world were they more universally acknowledged. They would give quiet to the nations. They would annihilate the spirit of martial glory, and utterly debase the pomp of war. They would be instrumental in meliorating the dispositions of men; in awakening and exercising their virtues; in exalting their condition and their happiness.

† Freemasons possess what the learned have sought in vain, an invariable cypher for general communication. See Freemason's Magazine, Vol. I. p. 11. Mr. Locke's notes to the MS. Bodl.

Seek ye a pure source of joys to enliven your prosperity! Ask ye for consolation in adversity! Want ye relief from poverty? Enter our temple and share our blessings. Friendship will conduct your faltering step, virtue will strengthen your resolutions, and wisdom enlighten your mind. There, also, pity and charity will direct your benevolence, and give value to the exercise of your kindness. There hope will brighten your prospects, and glory crown your deeds.

To this commendation of our society, my beloved brethren, your knowledge and your hearts will bear willing testimony. Let the actions of your lives afford corroborative evidence. Answer the expectations of the world. While ambitious of extending the influence, neglect not to support the credit of this ancient and venerable society. May the amiable simplicity and goodness of your manners produce sentiments of esteem in others for the principles from which they arise! Disgrace not your profession by any unworthy action.* Masonry may indeed suffer awhile from the suspicions of the ignorant and the censure of its enemies, but it can be lastingly injured only by the imprudences and ill conduct of its members and friends. Let me therefore enjoin it upon you, while you treat with just indifference the insinuations and surmises of the disingenuous and the perverse, to silence the tongue of reproach by the rectitude of your conduct, and the brilliance of your virtues. Let it be seen in you that our institution produces the good effects we have so openly boasted, and the virtues we have so frequently recommended and warmly approved. Fix your eyes steadily on the important object of your association. Let it open the affectionate embrace of large philanthropy, and lift up the hands of rational devotion! Let it exalt the capacity of the mind, refine the social sympathies, and form you for the noblest purposes of reasonable life!

Right Worshipful Masters, Respected Officers, and Beloved Brethren! You this day assemble to celebrate the increased reputation and usefulness of masonry; and to pay the tribute of affectionate remembrance to its departed patrons and brethren. Let hilarity therefore be tempered with thoughtfulness. Forget not in the cheerfulness of the day to retain decorum in festivity, and innocence in mirth. Let virtue chasten your pleasures, and it will give them a higher relish.

While you commemorate the wisdom and glory of SOLOMON, the fidelity of HIRAM, and the virtues of ST. JOHN, you will join also in celebrating the valour of WARREN and the wisdom of FRANKLIN. While you praise departed worth, neglect not to honour living virtue. And add to all your songs the chorus of acknowledgement and affectionate respect to our surviving patron and brother, WASHINGTON, "the friend of masonry, of his country, and of man."

Around the altar of friendship do we thus yearly assemble, and bring our votive incense to that temple which our predecessors founded on the firm basis of virtue, and supported by the pillars of wisdom, strength and beauty. We meet not to drain the bowl of intemperance, nor to indulge the excesses of gluttony; but to renew the cordialities of friendship, the resolutions of love and good will. We assemble not to disturb the peace of mankind by the busier plans of ambition, nor to fabricate those arts of luxury which but augment the miseries of life. Our object is to enliven the kindly sensibilities of human nature, and all the sweet civilities of social intercourse.

Children of Light! The duties of your profession are interesting and important. The duties of society and of religion are also binding upon you. May you discharge them all with fidelity and honour! Then, when the events of time shall be ended, and the retributions of eternity begin, when the Morning Stars shall again sing together and the sons of God shout for joy, ye shall join the animating chorus and share the glorious triumph. Ye shall be deemed worthy to enter the doors of the celestial temple, to be adorned with jewels beautified with immortality, and advanced to glories incomparably more resplendent than any here below. So mote it be!

* In the ancient masonic charges is this injunction: "Ye shall do no villainous deed, by the craft ye may be slandered."

CELEBRATIONS.

NEW-YORK.

The festival of St. John the Baptist will be celebrated by Solon Lodge, in the village of Athens, in Greene county, New-York, on Tuesday the 24th day of June, 1823. Brethren of adjoining Chapters and Lodges and sojourning Brethren, are respectfully invited to attend.

REMEDIES FOR INDIGESTION.

Of indigestion, two of the prominent features are flatulence and acidity; and the remedies for these states are clearly indicated. They are the alkalis and magnesia; and the advantages which the latter, in the general way, possesses over the former, is this: that, as containing an alkaline principle, the stomach acidity is neutralized by its administration; and a purgative suit being formed, in some measure, by the combination, the double purpose is thus effected of a corrective and an aperient. A tea spoonful or two of magnesia, thrown into a glass of water, and taken before going to rest, will often anticipate as it were the acid formation in the stomach, which would be otherwise consequent upon a little irregularity of eating or drinking; and will destine the individual to a good, who otherwise would pass a restless uncomfortable night. When a more positive purgative is required, it will be right to combine the sulphate of magnesia (epsom salts) with the carbonate (common magnesia.) Two large tea-spoonfuls of the former, with one of the latter, will constitute a good aperient; and, for a gouty invalid, one tea-spoonful or the fluid carbonate of ammonia (sal avoile) will be found useful; or, if the habit be cold, two or three spoonfuls of tincture of rhubarb may be advantageously mixed with the salts and magnesia.

NATURAL BAROMETERS.

The following are a few of those plants which indicate changes in the weather:—Chick weed is an excellent barometer. When the flower expands fully, we are not to expect rain for several hours; should it continue in that state, no rain will disturb the summer's day. When it half conceals its miniature flower, the day is generally showery, but, if it entirely shuts up, or veils the white flower with its green mantle, let the traveller put on his great coat. The different species of trefoil always contract their leaves at the approach of a storm; so certainly does this take place, that these plants have acquired the name of the husbandman's barometer. The tulip and several of the compound yellow flowers also close before rain. There is, besides, a species of wood-sorrel, which doubles its leaves before storms and tempests. The bauhinia or mountain ebony, cassia, and sensitive plants, observe the same habit.

IGNITION OF GUNPOWDER.

Experiments have shown that gunpowder could be exploded by the strokes of iron upon iron; iron upon copper; copper upon copper; iron upon marble; and by using the balistick pendulum, by lead upon lead; and with suitable precautions even by lead upon wood. The experiments most clearly show, that, in all the manipulations of a powder manufactory, all violent shocks and percussion should be carefully avoided, since they may occasion the disengagement of sufficient heat to produce the inflammation of powder.

GRAIN.

All sorts of grain ought to be cut whenever the straw immediately below the ear is so dry that on twisting it no juice can be expressed; for then the grain cannot improve, as the circulation of the juices to the ear is stopped. It matters not that the stock below is green; every hour that the grain stands uncut, after passing this stage, is attended with loss.

[Sinclair.]

PRINCIPLE OF SUSPENSION.

A new mode of constructing suspension bridges has been recently introduced in Scotland. The chains or rods are placed below, and the weight rests on the rods by means of cast iron brackets, on which the beams are placed. The rods, which are of chain iron, are bent round the ends of the beam, and fastened with a hoop of iron to prevent springing. Buckling screws are placed on the rods near to the brackets, for the purpose of lightening the rods and raising the beams to the level, so that the whole structure can be adjusted with the greatest ease. From the construction it will be easily seen that the whole weight or pressure is exerted on the iron rods, or wires, in the direction of their length, so that they have no tendency to break or bend in a lateral direction. The amazing strength that this mode of connecting the ends of a wooden beam imparts to it may be illustrated by a very simple experiment. Let the mechanic take a piece of wood, about two or three feet long, and an inch in diameter; place the ends of it between two chairs, or stones, and attempt to stand upon it, and he will find it break instantaneously. Let him now take a similar piece of wood, and bend round the two ends, a piece of wire so much longer than the wood as to allow a small wedge, or wooden pin, two or three inches long, to be placed vertically between the wood and the wire, and he will find that he will be unable to break it, though he leap upon it with all his force. The application of this principle may be seen in all cases where brackets and trussed beams are employed, though it has been seldom perhaps, carried to the extent which it obviously admits of. [Verulam.]

BEAUTIFUL CHYMICAL EXPERIMENT.

The following beautiful chymical experiment may easily be performed by a lady, to the great astonishment of the circle of her tea party. Take two or three blades of red cabbage; cut or tear them into small bits, put them into a basin, and pour a pint of boiling water on them: let it stand an hour, then decant the liquid into a crystal bottle; it will be of a fine blue colour. Then take four wine glasses; into one put two or three drops of sulphuric acid, or five or six drops of strong vinegar, into another put five or six drops of a solution of soda, into a third put as much of a strong solution of alum, and let the fourth glass remain empty. The glasses may be prepared some time before. Fill up the glasses from the crystal bottle, and the liquid poured into the glass containing the acid will quickly change colour, and become a beautiful red, that into the glass containing the soda, a fine green, and that into the glass containing the alum, a fine purple, whilst that poured into the empty one will, of course, remain unchanged. By adding a little vinegar to the green, it will immediately change to a red; and on adding a little of the solution of soda to the red, it will assume a fine green; thus showing the action of acids and alkalis on vegetable blues.

THE SAFETY LAMP.

An interesting paper on the nature and properties of flame was read by G. Libri, at the Societe des Georgophiles (Florence), on the 3d December, 1826. The author was led to doubt the correctness of the theory or explanation given by Sir H. Davy, in order to account for the phenomenon of his safety lamp. The distinguished inventor ascribes the security which the lamp affords to the conducting power of the metallic gauze, by which it is supposed the temperature of the flame is so much lowered, as to be insufficient to ignite the inflammable mixture on the outside. Some facts known to the author were at variance with this hypothesis, and he found, upon trial, that when single rods were made to approach a flame, the latter was always reflected on all sides from the rod, as if repelled by it; and that this effect was independent of the conducting power of the rod whether good or bad. The amount of inflection, or repulsion, was directly as the mass, and inversely as the distance of the flame. It was not diminished by increasing the temperature of the rod, even to such a degree as to render it scarcely possible for it to abstract any of the calorick. In fact, when two flames are made to approach each other, there is a mutual repulsion, although their proximity increases the temperature of each, instead of diminishing it.

"From these principles," says the author, "the real theory of the safety lamp is deduced. A metallic wire, exerting, according to its diameter and its own nature, a constant repulsion upon flame, it is evident that two parallel wires, so near each other as not to exceed the distance of twice the radius of the sphere of repulsion, will not permit a flame to insinuate itself between them, unless it is impelled by a force superior to the intensity of repulsion. If to these two wires, others be added, a tissue is formed impenetrable to flame, especially when the conducting power of the wires adds its influence to that of repulsion." The author conceives, that, from the views above stated, the number of cross or horizontal wires in the Davy lamp is unnecessarily large, and that by rejecting all of these, excepting a number sufficient to secure the firmness of the tissue, the lamp would afford as great a security as at present, and at the same time diffuse a much greater light. This conclusion he is stated to have verified by actual experiment.

PHENOMENA OF VAPOUR.

M. Clement Desormes communicated on the 4th of December last, to the Royal Academy of Sciences, some singular results relative to steam. When compressed in a boiler, and issuing in a violent and hissing jet, through an orifice made in a pretty large plate of a flat disk, if metal be presented to it, at a little distance from the orifice, the disk is strongly repelled; but if it be brought near, and placed against the plate, as if to close the orifice, although the steam issues on all sides like artificial fireworks, and press against the disk more than before, not only is the disk not driven away, but it adheres to the plate, even when the jet is directed downwards. It remains suspended, in opposition to its gravity, and can be detached only by force. The same result takes place in an experiment with the wind which issues from the large bellows of a furnace.

Another fact, also curious, although already well known, is that a current of steam from a boiler in which it is very hot and much compressed, seems like a cool wind, compared with a current at one half the temperature and at one twentieth of the pressure.

From these first experiments, M. Clement concludes, that common safety valves, which consist of real disks placed upon openings in flat plates, present a danger inherent in their form. Scarcely are they raised so as to allow a thin plate of steam to escape, before it becomes impossible for them to rise higher; and if the production of vapour is too considerable for the small opening which may have obtained, and for the strength of the boiler, an explosion may take place, though the safety valve is open. This is, in fact, what sometimes happens, and which has hitherto appeared incredible. M. Clement has not time to give a full explanation of these singular phenomena. We only know that he attributes them to the vacuum which takes place in the current of steam, in consequence of the extreme swiftness of its particles, and of the conical form the current assumes between the adjacent plates. The current, from its great force, is so expanded towards the borders, as to become much less than the pressure of the atmosphere, which acts upon the moveable disk forcibly enough to the vapour.

The remedy for this danger is a good proportionate space between the orifice and their borders. The first should be large, and the others small. Besides, the addition of a conical tube to the safety valve would diminish the effect of the atmospheric pressure, and of the weight with which they are loaded. M. Desormes thinks, that experiment alone can determine what is the best modification of safety valves to remove the danger he points out, and which has been so long unnoticed. He wishes the manufacturers to make the necessary trials, agreeably to the theory he has given.

PORTUGUESE MAN-OF-WAR.

This worm, between six and eight inches in length, has seemingly the skill of an experienced navigator, and is in itself a little ship. Its evolutions are according to the winds; it raises and lowers its sail, which is a membrane provided with elevating and depressing organs. When filled with air, it is at the same time provided with a structure which furnishes it with the necessary ballast. When high winds would endanger its existence, it descends into the deep. From the underside of the body proceed tubes which extend twenty feet in length, and are so elastic and delicate, that they wind in a spiral form like a screw, serving at once as anchors, defensive and offensive weapons, pneumatic tubes and feelers. The insect has the colours of the rainbow; its crest, which performs the office of a sail, is intersected with pink and blue veins, trimmed with a rosy border, and swells with the winds, or at the animal's pleasure. The fibres contain a viscous matter, which has the property of stinging like nettles, and produces pustules. It acts so strongly, that vessels in which they have been kept for a time, must be repeatedly washed before they can be used. These fibres may be cut off without depriving them or the rest of the insect of the principle of life; and the separation takes place spontaneously, whenever the glutinous matter comes in contact with a hard surface, like the sides of a glass globe. The insect has, however, dangerous enemies in small dolphins and medusa, against which neither its nautical skill nor its poison can defend it. [North American Review.]

EGYPTIAN ARCHITECTURE.

It is somewhat surprising, that among the crowd of novelties, and very especially of attempts to depart from the received models of architecture, the Egyptian has not taken its share. It is true that some very partial attempts have been made, in the metropolis, we believe, not exceeding two; and if we add to these a school recently erected at Devonport, a mausoleum at Trentnam for the Stafford family, and an iron manufactory now erecting in Wales, we have probably enumerated the whole. Such as the examples have been, they have not spread; and, indeed, we may say, that they have scarcely attracted any notice, whether for good or evil; though the publicity and singularity of aspect of the most accessible specimen in Piccadilly might have at least been expected to distinguish it, in the general eye, from the buildings which surround it. As to the public, we find no difficulty in accounting for this. This style has not been pointed out to them, and they have not been desired either to admire or dislike it. Why the architects have neglected it they must themselves explain, since we believe there have been but two in that profession who have been concerned in the buildings to which we have alluded, the last named of these being an attempt of a dilettante in the art. As to the specimens where it has been thought fit to introduce the Egyptian window or doorway in churches of the Greek design, we consider the attempt faulty and censurable. This is a false and misplaced ambition after novelty, which marks far too much of what has recently been effected in our new churches. [Westminster Review.]

THE GATHERER.

PROFESSOR PORSON.

This consummate scholar was often in pecuniary difficulties. On one occasion he came with a dejected air to a friend, and said he had been walking through the streets of London all the morning, thinking how strange it was that not one of all the crowds he met should know as much about Greek tragic verse as himself, and yet that he could not turn his knowledge into a hundred pounds. In these moments he often talked of retiring to the wilds of America, where formed a plan of living in solitary happiness, without a book or a friend.

EPIGRAM.

Lord Erskine at woman presuming to rail,
Calls a wife "a tin canister tied to one's tail."
And fair Lady Anne while the subject he carries on,
Seems hurt at his lordship's degrading comparison.
But wherefore degrading? considered aright.
A canister's polished and useful and bright,
And should dirt its original purity hide,
That's the fault of the surry to whom it is tied.

ANCESTRY OF FIELDING.

The immortal Fielding, says Gibbon in the history of his own life, was of the younger branch of the earls of Denbigh, who draw their origin from the courts of Habsburgh, the lineal descendants of Eltrico, in the seventh century, duke of Alsace. Far different have been the fortunes of the English and German divisions of the house of Habsburgh. The former, the knights and sheriffs of Leicestershire, have slowly arisen to the dignity of a peerage; the latter, the emperors of Germany, and the kings of Spain, have threatened the liberties of the old, and invaded the treasures of the new world. The successors of Charles the fifth may disdain their brethren of England; but the romance of Tom Jones, that exquisite picture of human manners, will outlive the palace of the Escorial, and the Imperial Eagle of the house of Austria. [Lord Sheffield's Life of Gibbon.]

STRONG MEN.

A Turkish porter will run along carrying a weight of 600 pounds; and Milo, of Crotons, is said to have lifted an ox, weighing upwards of 1,000 pounds. Hallow mentions that he saw an instance of a man, whose finger being caught in a chain at the bottom of a mine, by keeping it forcibly bent, supported by that means the weight of his body, 150 pounds, till he was drawn up to the surface, a height of 600 feet. Augustus II. King of Poland, could, with his fingers, roll up a silver dish like a sheet of paper, and twist the strongest horse shoe asunder; and a lion is said (Phil. Trans. No. 310) to have left the impression of his teeth upon a piece of solid iron. [London Weekly Review.]

THE ARK OF NOAH.

The Rabbins make the giant Gog, or Magog contemporary with Noah, and convinced by his preaching, so that he was disposed to take the benefit of the ark. But here lay the distress; it by no means suited his dimensions. Therefore, as he could not enter in, he contented himself to ride upon it astride. And though you must suppose that, in that stormy weather, he was more than half boots over, he kept his seat, and dismounted safely, when the ark landed on Mount Ararat. Image now to yourself this illustrious cavalier mounted on his hackney; and see if it does not bring before you the church, bestrid by some lumpish minister of state, who turns and winds it at his pleasure. The only difference is, that Gog believed the preacher of righteousness and religion. [Bishop Warburton.]

LISTON'S CHOICE.

Liston has married Fanny Tyrer;
He must, like all the town, admire her.
A pretty actress, charming voice!
But some, astonished at his choice
Of one, compared with him, so small
She scarcely seemed a wife at all.
Expressed their wonder: his reply
Showed that he had "good reason why."
"We needs must when the devil drives;
And since all married men say, wives
Are of created things the worst,
I was resolved I would be curst
With one as small as I could get her.
The smaller, as I thought, the better.
I need not fear to lay my fist on,
Where'er 'tis needed, Mrs. Liston:
And since, like beathen Jew or Carib,
I like a rib, but not a spare-rib,
I got one broad as she is long—
Go and do better, if I'm wrong."

MASTER M-GOING'S MAXIMS.

They who are easily flattered are always easily cheated.

The petty vexations of life are like beggars; if you treat them kindly, they "call again;" but if you kick them from your door, they will be very likely to cut your acquaintance.

Silence is the best remedy for anger. If you say nothing, you will have nothing to unsay.

A man without wisdom is like a cat without whiskers, liable to thrust his head into a hole, where he cannot draw his haunches through.

POPULAR TALES.

THE GHOST OF GRANNY HOGINS.

From Whimwhams.

It would be well if people talked less against witches and apparitions. One can not suppose that they are pleased at having hard things said of them behind their backs, any more than other folks. It is idle to think that they do not hear, because they are absent. Stone walls have ears, birds of the air carry news; and besides, who can tell when he is running on about ghosts, that they do not stand listening at his very elbow. They can distinguish sound at a marvellous distance. Many a poor ghost has lain restless in its grave, whining and whimpering at having its rest disturbed by the frivolous talk of those who were a great way off on the seas. If people dislike to have them walk o' nights, why are they mentioned so disrespectfully? Few spirits would wander about the streets in the cold, if folks did not talk about them.

The tale I am now going to relate, should make this caution lie heavily on the hearts of the serious and well disposed. The unfortunate Granny Hogins, I speak of with reverence, would never have troubled this wicked world after her demise, if her temper had not been raised by the scandal of the living. That very respectable woman had a high spirit. Her tongue was always eloquent when her good name was called in question. It lay not in the power of mortality to silence her when alive, and certainly, it was a cruel thing to take advantage of her decease, to make insinuations against her character. She would not put up with it, even in the grave. Her ghost stood right up on its legs, as firmly as a pair of tongs. She hardly paused to read her own name on the grave-stone, before she took to the streets, and never ceased to walk the rounds, until her calumniators became no better than herself.

The ghost of Granny Hogins was truly a great annoyance to the Bostonians. Few ghosts on record have been more troublesome. It was particularly unfortunate, that its feet should have happened to be clad in stout, heavy clogs, which made a tremendous clattering on the paving stones. If ghosts will keep on the trot, it were well that they should step softly. A cloven foot, on some occasions, is preferable to a clog. But in this case, even the heavy tread was nothing in comparison with the piercing shriek. In the dead of night, when the town was locked in a deep sleep, the ghost would suddenly squall out so loudly and shrilly, that people in alarm would jump from their beds to the floor, like so many frogs leaping into a mill-pond. And then, too, it set all the cats and dogs in the parish yelping. Such a ghost was, really, an intolerable annoyance.

I cannot but pause a moment to note a singular fact. It is amazing how very plentiful ghosts and witches were, when Boston was all North End! They were hopping and skating about the streets, like grasshoppers in the new-mown fields. In those days, it was venturesome to walk out after dark, except to go to a lecture. But where have they all absconded to? Will they ever return? This is an important inquiry; interesting, but of a puzzling complexion. Some people imagine they will keep on the shady side of the grave-stone, until Boston becomes in its turn, all South End. This would seem to protract the period of their reappearance, until the final completion of the South Boston Free Bridge.

But however respectable may be the number of ghosts which flourish in the annals of our early history, we read of none so very teasing as the ghost of Granny Hogins. It was abroad at all hours and all weathers. Whether the atmosphere was sharp and piercing, or moist and muggy; whether the wind howled, or the snow fell, or the rain poured, the tramp of its wooden shoes was heard on the sidewalks, clump-it-a-clump, all night long. Such an indefatigable traveller was never heard of. Other ghosts have had periodical fits of walking; have appeared at certain hours, in certain places, on certain occasions, and at certain intervals. But this exceedingly remarkable apparition, seemed to require no combination of circumstances to set it in motion, nor any season of relaxation from its labour. It was one of those troul-oping ghosts, which, if they once get on the tramp, never seem to know when to stop. Nothing but the keen snuff of the morning air, could afford any bar to its wanderings.

A locomotive power so extraordinary, excites an alarming inquiry in the mind. Do ghosts have gizzards? How else can they endure such constant toil and privation? But let us avoid getting entangled in the mazes of spectrology, where new doubts and errors spring up like phantoms at every step. Besides, the ghost of a witch might offer an exception. Let me resume my mournful narration.

In what I am constrained to relate, I seriously protest that I wish to cast no unmerited censure upon witches and ghosts in general. It is a sad and unwelcome act to speak of a witch at any time. At this solemn hour of midnight, when all is silent and solitary about me, I realize, in an eminent degree, the whole of its delicacy and danger. I write under the melancholy conviction, that the least slip of the pen may arouse the spleen of some irritable spirit, which, creeping in at the key-hole, might flutter across the room and alight on the tip of my quill. It is this cruel apprehension, that makes me pause and gaze fearfully around.

"Weaving spiders, come not here,
Hence, ye long legged spinners, hence;
Beetles black, approach not near,
Worm and snail, give no offence."

But let me proceed with my story. I study to be brief.

That Granny Hogins was a grievous witch, is a shocking certainty. Indeed, it was impossible that such a little, hump-backed, clapper-tongued old woman should be otherwise. She went peering, moping, and scolding about the town all day, and passed the nights in playing her mischievous tricks. It is past telling, how much trouble she contrived to make. There was poor Mrs. Timson's chimney blown over, and Jeremiah Greening's hen-roost un-roofed by the wind; Goody Crimp's cow would hold up her milk, and Mrs. Skimmer would churn all day without getting any butter; some one kept taking the ring out of Grizzle Sharp's hog's nose, and Deacon Crabb's calico donkey was continually laid up with the rheumatism. The fear with which she was regarded by the inhabitants, protected her for a long time, but at last their patience was exhausted. A meeting was held at Deacon Spooner's. Fifteen influential matrons proceeded to her dwelling, and simultaneously began to chide her for her scandalous mode of life. Now this was an attack upon her character; and reputation was every thing with Granny Hogins. She had a feverish sensibility upon this point; nobody could allude to her character without setting her in a flame. Character is sacred, especially with a poor, lone woman. Granny Hogins felt this keenly, and it roused all the latent energies of her tongue. She uplifted her voice, and sounded a peal that echoed over the whole town like the blast of a war-trumpet. The assailing party were glad to retreat before the storm they had raised. It is astonishing how eloquent a woman will become in defence of her character!

As one may easily conceive, this exploit sealed the fate of Granny Hogins. When fair talking will not persuade an old woman that she is a witch, there is no argument left but the gallows. Once hung, and with this notorious fact staring her in the face, she can no longer have the impudence to protest her innocence. At least, so thought people with respect to Granny Hogins. As she had been hung for being a witch, they made bold to consider her as such, and talked very volubly about the circumstance. For this, her ghost was offended, having considered it injurious to its character, and therefore haunted the streets of Boston until the inhabitants were nearly bored to death.

If ghosts were answerable to reason like other folks, and some respectable lawyer could take them privately aside, and argue the matter over coolly, they might be made to understand how unreasonable such kind of conduct appears. But they are a stiff-necked race, and as long as they dispense with wearing eyes and ears, all argument is vain. There is nothing so obstinate as a wrong-headed ghost.

But let me proceed in my story, and describe the concluding events of Granny Hogins' earthly career. The person most scandalized at her unseemly conduct, was one Mrs. Grinning, who kept a small snuff shop in Pinch Alley, and who had been foremost amongst the party that waited upon her as before related. This old crone continued to talk, and talk, against poor Granny Hogins. She would not let people take their snuff in peace, but was as noisy as a bean in a dry box, until her customers partook of her own zeal. The snuff-takers at last were excited, and the whole community soon caught the infection. "Seize the old witch," was the cry. "Roast her! scald her! drown her!" shouted a thousand voices. Poor Granny Hogins was caught up in a trice and hurried down to the water-side. A rude crane was quickly erected, which swung outwards from the wharf. Having fastened weights to her ankles, they secured her hands and adjusted the fatal cord. She was then lowered down into the deep sea like a diving bell, scolding and scrambling all the while. After she had remained under water for a space, Deacon Spooner gave the order to hoist. But no sooner did her chin appear above the surface, than her tongue was set in motion again, like the paddles of a steamboat. "Try her on dry land," was the word. A new halter was produced, but the knot slipped, and down came Granny Hogins with a bounce that made the ground tremble. Another attempt failed in the same manner. "The Granny will never hold on," said the hangman in despair.

"Take a witch
To hang a witch," shrieked a parrot from a neighbouring house. A cold shudder ran through the assembly; but the experiment was tried and proved successful. The wretched witch was burned the same day, in her mob-cap and clogs, without difficulty, and the inhabitants flattered themselves with having seen the last of Old Granny Hogins.

But people may get together, and talk about this thing and that thing, and be very wise and very cunning, and become enormously puffed up with their vanity. The second night after the Hogins affair, a knot of valorous talkers had gathered together in Mrs. Grinning's snuff shop, and were prattling quite conceitedly of the part they had acted in stringing up the old witch. All at once, their attention was aroused by the sound of a heavy step on the sidewalk. Mrs. Grinning turned as pale as a cloth. "I know that step too well," she gasped out, "it is certainly the tread of Granny Hogins." Her auditors were horror-struck. It evidently approached; they heard it tramp, tramp, tramp, toward them. The door slowly opened—"yell! yell!" shrieked a demoniac voice; but nothing was seen. They were nearly frightened out of their skins.

After this, for many a weary year, the Ghost of Granny Hogins regularly patrolled the streets of Boston, and nothing was more common at all hours of the night than the "tramp, tramp, tramp,—yell!" These tantrums previously disturbed the public peace. A party of drinkers used to gather, like flies, around Simon Grater's dram shop every night, to talk about the weather; but now, the ghost was sure to whisk in amongst them, and scatter all to the winds. Mrs. Prattle was accustomed to have weekly conversation parties, to discuss people's characters; but the ghost tramped and shrieked so much about the house, that she was obliged to give them up. Captain Coney of the Winnisimmet ferry-boat, used sometimes to venture to make a trip in the evening in bright weather; but now, if he put off, the wind was sure to rise and howl in every variety of key, and the waves would roll over and foam so fearfully, that nothing could persuade him to cast his rope from the wharf. In fine, it was generally remarked that, taking all things into consideration, Granny Hogins, the witch, was a more valuable citizen and peaceable neighbour than Granny Hogins' Ghost.

Some sagacious individuals surmise that this ghost is still thumping about the North End. A very conceited attorney, with white whiskers, and a simpering tongue, to whom I mentioned the affair, expressed a wish to have it arrested by special writ, and committed as a strolling vagabond. With this benevolent design, we lay in wait for it the other night in a watch box. It arrived to the hour of two, and nothing remarkable had occurred. Just then, we heard something approaching. Tramp, tramp, tramp, it came directly towards us. We could distinguish in the dark, a tall, spectral object muffled in a white cloak, as if to protect it from the cold. My companion sprang like a tiger and grasped it strongly by the waist, when it appeared to our no small confusion, that instead of nabbing the ghost, he had nearly throttled a watchman!

MISCELLANY.

THE LAST BOTTLE.

From Death's Doings.

The plate intended to illustrate this sketch, represents a convivial set, with goblets in their hands, seated around a table, on which stands an empty bottle, while Death stands with a screw in hand and bottle at his knee, in the act of drawing "the last cork of the last bottle." EDITOR.

And if it be the last bottle, Death is quite welcome; for then life hath run to the very dregs and lees, and there is nothing more in it which can be called enjoyment. Ah, whither have ye sped, ye jovial hours! which on bright winged glasses, far different from yon sandy remembrancer, floated away so blissfully; as the bird poised high in air, the trouble of the ascent over, glides without effort or motion, through the brilliant pleasures of yielding space. How ye sparkled and ran on, like gay creatures of the element gifted with more than magick powers! Beautiful and slight ephemera, fragile as you seemed, what mighty loads of cares did you easily bear off in your aerial flight! Ponderous debts which might weigh nations down; the griefs of many loves, enough to drown a world; the falsehoods of friends, the malice of enemies; anxieties, fears, troubles, sorrows—all vanished as drinking ye proceeded in your mystick dance! I picture ye in my fancy, now, ye hours, as sparkling, joyous, and exquisite insects, flitting past with each a burden of man's miseries on his shoulders sufficient to break the back of a camel, and borne from the lightened hearts of your true worshippers. But alas! alas! for all things mortal—we must come to the last at last.

Yet let the grim tyrant approach at any time, sith it must be so, and at what time can he approach when we should less regard his frown. Like the unconscious lamb, which "licks the hand just raised to shed its blood," we play with his bony fingers as he presents the latest draught; and let his dart be dipped in the rosy flood, we die feeling that wine gives to Death itself a pang of joy. Herodotus must have been wrong when he told us that the Maneros of the Egyptians was a mournful and wailing song; and Plutarch's is the best authority, for he says it was a joyous chant. So believed the merry party assembled in our faithful picture: their round of song, of toast, of cheer, of laughter, and of shout, was such as Plutarch paints of the wisdom of antiquity, when the figure of a dead man was shown to the convivial souls, and they melodiously joined the chorus—

Behold that breathless corpse;
You'll be like it when you die:
Therefore drink without remorse,

And be merry, merrily.

Ai-lun, Ai-lun, Ai-lun,* quo' he!

Our only night, no sky light, drink about,
quo' we.

Time they tell us waits for no man;—

Time and Tide
For no Man bide.

But here we can make Death himself a waiter, while the cup is drained and the jocund catch goes round. Hark, whose voice among the happy set is that which sings—

While here we meet, a jovial band,
No son of Discord's impious hand
Dare sting the apple, fire the brand.
To mar our social joy:
Foes, as our glorious country free,

Prospering in her prosperity,
With wine, and jest, and harmony,
We Pleasure's hours employ.

But lo, he whose face is half concealed by that arm uplifted with the sparkling glass, he has drank till the tender mood of philosophy steals over his melting soul. His maudlin eye would moisten with a tear at a tale of sorrow or a plaintive air; and it is thus he gives vent to his soothing melancholy sensations—

Death comes but once, the philosophers say,
And 'tis true, my brave boys, but that once is a cleaver:
It takes us from drinking and loving away,
And spoils at a blow the best tippler and wench.
Sing Ai-lun, thought to me very odd it is,
Yet I sing it too, as my friend quotes Herodotus.

And Death comes to all, so they tell us again,
Which also I fear, my brave boys, is no fable;
Yet the moral it teaches, to me is quite plain:
'Tis to love all we can and to drink while we're able.
Sing again, Ai-lun, thought to me odd it is;
But 'tis Greek, very good I hope, and comes from Herodotus.

The old Trojan himself tucks up his napkin under his arm, the whetting of his scythe is forgotten, and he wishes (miserable sinner) that, instead of sand, his double glass were wetted full with Burgundy. How would it refresh and revivify his dry ribs! how it would recreate and beautify his filthy skeleton form! but he must do his thankless office, while he listens to that third glee which he with a plumed bonnet trolls forth:—

Let the sparkling glass go round,
The sparkling glass where care is drowned;
For while we drink we live, we live!
Let the joyous roof ring with the measure,
The sweetest of the muses' treasure
That music's voice can give.
Thus crowned, the present beams with pleasure,
The memory of the past is lighter,
The prospect of the future brighter—
And while we drink we live, we live.
CHORUS.—We live, we live, we live, we live,
For while we drink, we live, we live.

Another cork is drawn. At the smacking sound cares, fears, pains, fly from the unruffled soul of man, as wild fowl fly from the placid lake at the report of the fowler's gun. The undulating agitation of the instant—the centrick, concentrick, elliptick, parabolick, and every imaginary shape into which its glancing bosom is broken, ripples and sparkles with light, and all then gently subside into smoothness and serenity. The calm is delicious, and the bowl becomes more and more brimmed with inspiration as the flood within it ebbs. Whose turn is it now to entertain us? What, Square-cap! thou hast stood, or rather sat the brunt of many a deep drenched table; the words of discretion must flow from thy lips so often steeped in the fountains of truth and wisdom. Oracle of the holy well—the "Trinc, trinc, trinc," of Rabelais drops from them as emphatically as upon the ear of the weary Panurge:—

Alexander and Caesar have vanished away;
And Plato and Cicero now are but clay;
The brave, and the learned, and the good, and the wise,
All come to the same simple close of "Here lies."

Then let us employ
Our moments in joy—
And before the sure end make the best use of time.
'Twere folly to pine
O'er generous wine,
Since sadness is madness, and gloom is life's crime,
"Trinc, trinc, trinc," I speak,
French words and French wines are far better than Greek.

Look along the bright beard, like a river it flows
With a liquid whose sparkling no water e'er knows;
While the banks are with friends in good fellowship crowned,
Who be the deeps, the stream and ne'er fear being drowned.
'Tis Bacchus' hour—
So let 'aim out-pour
All his treasure as, while we make the best use of time;
Frie adship and wine
Are union divine,
And when drunk, mortal drunk, mortal man is sublime!
"Trinc, trinc, trinc," I speak,
French words and French wines are far better than Greek.

Encore, encore—no more, no more: the last measure is full, the last verse is sung, the last cork has

* When the oracle of the Holy Bottle was pronounced by the trinking of the drops which fell from it, quoth Panurge, "Is this all that the Trinking Bottle's words mean? In truth I like it extremely, it went down like mother's milk." "Nothing more," returned Bacchus, "for trinc is a Panopsean word, that is a word understood, used and celebrated by all nations, and signifies Drink. See Rabelais for this adventure of Pantagruel and Panurge.

left the neck of the last bottle open. The gloomy assassin strikes—He who has been so often dead drunk, what is he now! At the next meeting there was one chair empty, one jolly dog absent—Ai-lun. And what said his disconsolate companions—they missed him, they mourned, they lamented, no doubt:—aye, and they joked too. One said he had never paid any debt till he paid the debt of Nature; another remarked that he was just wise enough to prefer a full to an empty bottle; and the third wrote his epitaph over the third bottle per man:—

HABEAS CORPUS! HIC JACET!

Here lies William Wassail, cut down by the Mower;
None ever drank faster or paid their debts slower—
Now quiet he lies as he sleeps with the Just,
He has drank his Last Bottle, and fast, fast he sped it o'er,
And paid his great debt to his principal Creditor;
And compounded with all the rest, even with Dust.

THE EFFECTS OF FRIGHT.

My hair is gray, but not with years.

BYRON.

We have heard of many instances, wherein fright, it is said, has produced very strange effects upon the human system. The following account we give, upon the authority of a highly respectable medical gentleman, resident in London.

At the time of the funeral of his late Royal Highness, the Duke of York, a gentleman well known for his antiquarian researches, whose name we withhold, descended into the Royal cemetery at Windsor, after the interment had taken place, and busily engaged himself in copying inscriptions from various coffins. While thus engaged, and absorbed in thought, he heard the door of the cemetery close with an appalling sound!—the taper fell from his hand, and he remained petrified by the knowledge of his awful situation, entombed with the dead. He had not power to pick up the taper, which was soon extinguished by the noisome damp, and he imagined that the cemetery would not be reopened until another Royal interment should take place; and that he must soon, from the effects of famine, be numbered with the dead. He swooned and lay insensible for some time. At length recovering himself, he rose upon his knees, placed his hands upon a mouldering coffin, and to use his own words, "felt strength to pray." A recollection then darted across his mind, that he had heard the workmen say, that about noon they should revisit the cemetery, and take away some plumes, &c. which they left there. This somewhat calmed his spirits. Soon after 12 o'clock he heard the doors turn upon their grating hinges, he called for assistance, and was soon conveyed to the regions of day. His clothes were damp, and a horrible dew hung upon his hair, that in the course of a few hours, turned from dark black to gray, and soon after to white. The pain which he felt in the scapula during the period of his incarceration, he described to our informant to be dreadful. This is, perhaps, the best authenticated account upon record, of a man's hair turning gray from fright.

TURKISH TREASURES.

If the following statement from a Neapolitan paper be true, MAHMOUD will not be troubled for cash to carry on the war. He might easily spare a loan to his gentle neighbour NICHOLAS, who must borrow a trifle or two from somebody, to meet the expenses of his campaign. [N. Y. Courier.

Several laws of the Koran enjoin the Mussulmans to lay by sums of money. In order to observe this precept, each Sovereign, residing in Constantinople, since Mahomet II. who made the conquest of this city in 1453, encloses in a chamber of the seraglio the gold, silver, and other riches which he intends to economize. The sum that each Sultan puts aside in this manner amounts to about £480,000, a kind of tariff fixed upon by common custom. Independently of the duty of the sovereigns in placing to this amount the sums received from the taxes, and not expended, he conceives it to be agreeable to heaven, and to the nation, in adding to this fund the presents that are made him, either in precious stones or other articles of great value. It is well known how punctilious the Turkish sovereign is in this respect; his subjects, as well as foreigners, cannot obtain what they solicit, even according to all principles of justice, unless they add to their petitions, presents, the value of which is proportioned to the object which they desire. No one can be ignorant of the extent of confiscations pronounced in an arbitrary manner by the Despot of Constantinople against private individuals, and against the Pachas: and when he has deposited these sums in his sinking fund, in his opinion the iniquity of such measures is immediately obliterated. Superstition, in the Ottoman territory, has attained to such a degree, that the people are persuaded, the more this fund increases, the more his reign will be fortunate and prosperous. This fund is, therefore, called the Sacred Treasure. History does not confirm this opinion; but the Turks care very little about history or the lessons it affords. And what becomes of this treasure accumulated in so considerable a manner by each Sultan? This is a curious question.

* Literally in the Greek, "Behold that corpse; you will resemble it after your death: drink now, therefore, and be merry." (See Herodotus and Plutarch, on the Egyptian Maneros, passim.) The fine chorus of Ai-lun "He is dwelling with the night," is, we trust, pathetically rendered.

Every year the Kishlar-Aga, the chief of the black eunuchs, makes an inventory of the riches amassed during the twelvemonth; and the operation being terminated, the Grand Signor accompanied by the principal officers of the crown, repairs in grand ceremony to the chamber of the Treasury, and places his signet upon the chest. After the death of the sovereign, there are found as many chests in his chamber as he has lived years. The chamber is then closed, and the signets of every one of the principal officers placed upon the door; and an inscription is added, indicating that in this place is the treasure of such a Sultan. His successor forms his treasury in another room of the seraglio, and after his death it is also closed, and the same circumstance occurs during each new reign. Now, as from the time of Mahomet II. Constantinople numbers forty-one sultans, there exist in the seraglio forty-one chambers, containing each the treasure of each of these sovereigns.

In order to touch any of these treasures—to dare to enter a single one of these numerous chambers—it would be necessary that the Ottoman Empire were reduced to the lowest extremity. It appears that the necessity of violating the Sacred Treasury has not hitherto been deemed necessary. The sultans, rather than have recourse to such a measure, prefer making the most cruel exactions from their subjects. Such is the financial system of economy of this nation—it is far from the acknowledged principles of civilized states.

EDITORIAL DIARY.

June 7. Saint Paul, bishop of Constantinople; Saint Robert; Saint Colman; Saint Godeschal; and Saint Meriadec.—1779, bishop Warburton died. He was born in 1698, followed the profession of an attorney, and became an eminently able and learned prelate. His writings are justly celebrated.

June 8. Saints Medard, Gildard, Maximinus, William, Clodulphus, and Syra.—1765, the house of representatives of the province of Massachusetts bay, addressed a circular, proposing a meeting of the committees from the houses of representatives, or burgesses, of the several British provinces, to consult together on the difficulties to which they were about to be reduced by the operations of the acts of parliament, levying duties and taxes on the colonies; and proposing that the place of meeting be at New-York, on the first Tuesday of the ensuing October.

June 9. Saints Primus and Felicianus; Saint Columba, or Columkille, [See American Masonick Record, Vol. I. p. 313;] Saint Vincent; Saint Pelagia; Saint Richard.—1760, Count Zinzendorf, founder of the Moravians, or United Brethren, died at Chelsea, England. He was a Saxon by birth.—1822, colonel John M'Kinstry died, at his residence a few miles from the city of Hudson, in Columbia county. He was a captain, and was taken prisoner at the battle of the Cedars, about thirty miles from Montreal, on the river St. Lawrence, in the war of the revolution, by the British and Indians. He had been twice wounded, and his bravery had rendered him alike an object of fear and resentment. His death was decreed by his savage captors, and even the more civilized British officers were too much in dread of their red allies, to attempt a rescue, until accident brought one of their number in sight of him just as his sacrifice was preparing. The sign of distress was not given in vain to the young officer; he was a mason, and immediately recognized in the brave M'Kinstry, a brother, and in jeopardy. The officer gave no answer, but immediately set himself about the task of effecting his relief. This could be done only through an appeal to the masonick honour of Brandt, a powerful chief, then in the camp. Brandt had been instructed in the mysteries and duties of the craft, and was not slow to obey its injunctions. Suffice to say, that the victim was spared, and lived, to the day of his death, a monument of masonick mercy. Brandt frequently visited him, in Columbia county, and with the true greatness of soul which marks the Indian character, held an inviolable friendship for him, seldom found among brethren of the same language and blood. It has been erroneously asserted that this appeal was made directly to Brandt; but it adds no little to the real interest of the fact to learn that M'Kinstry knew not either Brandt or the young Briton to be brethren, until his final release. Surely if the name of the latter could be learned, though only a subaltern officer at the time, it would be another reason for public notice, that such a proof of the utility of the masonick institution might be held in remembrance in common with the deservedly venerated reputation of doing a good action. Happy for the good and patriotic veteran, he has retired to the rest of the just, and has not lived to hear the venomous tongues of hypocritical dealers in cant and falsehood, which are now spitting their quathemas at the very virtues which saved his life, and gave to his country more true worth in his years of usefulness, than all its calculators could number, with their whole united score of boghood. It would not have harmonized with the honest blood of his worn out age, to hear the vilifying epithets which many young upstarts now dare to heap on the graves of the illustrious dead.

June 10. Saints Margaret, Getulius, Landry, &c.—1710, on this day the first German emigrants to America, arrived and landed at New-York.—1801, war was declared by the United States against the hashaw of Tripoli.—1806, a resolution to abolish the slave trade first passed the British house of commons.—1610, lord De la War landed at Jamestown, Virginia, bringing back the former settlers who had just put into operation the resolution to return to England. From this date we may count the first effectual settlement of Virginia.

June 11. Saint Barnabas; and the two Saints Tochnura. The feast of Saint Barnabas was once highly reputed in England. The account of the miraculous walnut tree, that grew in the church-yard at Glastonbury, on the north side of Saint Joseph's chapel, is worthy notice. This tree never put forth a bud till Saint Barnabas' day, and on that day shot forth leaves and flourished like its usual species; at least so say the chroniclers of those days. This tree has long since decayed, and its place is supplied by a very fine walnut tree, which lays no claim to any thing miraculous in its manner of vegetation. Cuts from this tree were eagerly sought by all classes as late as the time of queen Anne; even after the superstition that gave origin to the whim had been forgotten.

June 12. Saint John the hermit; Saint Basilides; Saint Cyrinus; Saint Onuphrius, &c.—1721, the duke of Berwick, second in the art of war only to the great duke of Marlborough, was killed by a cannon ball, while standing between his two sons, at the siege of Philipburgh, near Spire, in Germany. He was an illegitimate son of James II., by the lady Arabella Churchill, maid of honour to the late duchess of York.

June 13. Saint Antony of Padua; Saint Dumbanade.—1625, Henrietta Maria, youngest daughter of Henry IV. of France, landed in England, and was married to Charles I. at Canterbury, on the same day.—1633, lord Baltimore, a Roman catholic, obtained a grant from Charles I. of a tract of land on the Chesapeake bay, which he afterwards settled, by a colony of his persecuted brethren, and in honour of queen Henrietta Maria, they called it MARY-

LAND.—1798, lord Cornwallis first appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland.—1813, the British under the cover of a flag of truce, sent several barges in to the harbour of Wareham, Massachusetts, and set fire to the stores and shipping.

TABLE TALK.

A Black Design frustrated. A black fellow lately entered a store in Philadelphia, about the hour of dinner, when a young lad was left in charge of the premises. He had been seated for some time in front of a heap of rubbish, and took advantage of the momentary absence of the boy, who left the counting house to open the cellar door, to enter and break open a desk, and get hold of a book containing about two thousand dollars in bank paper. At this moment the boy returned, and seizing a poker, applied it to the arm of the black with so much force, that he dropped the book. He made his escape by jumping over a high wall in the yard. The black was bold. The boy was bolder still.—Hot to spit Cotton, or a new Cotton Gin. The Selma, Alabama, paper mentions that the process of making whiskey from cotton seed varies but little from the mode of making that beverage from other materials. The whiskey thus made, although not of the most pleasing odour and taste, never fails to make the drinkers very particularly and gloriously drunk.—A Mule added to the Nobility of Portugal. Such is the hatred of the Portuguese queen, Don Miguel, and the apostolical party, to the English (liberals and heretics), in Lisbon, that on a mule's kicking and severely bruising the leg of general Clinton, the old lady sent and had the animal purchased for her own use, to be rewarded for its merit in attacking the British commander.—A Wit's a Feather. The editor of the Middlesex Gazette, alluding to the style of some brother editor, remarks, "his thoughts are like a bag of feathers in a whirlwind—no two moving in the same direction."—Geese. One of these birds, says the Taunton Advertiser, was hatching on a hill in our neighbourhood during the late snow storm. The winds blew and the snow descended and drifted round about her, but she hung on like the toothache. And it was not until every part and parcel of her was covered except her head, that the benefit of a removal occurred to her. "She then rose, reported progress," and we believe has had "leave to sit again."—Quick to understand. An ignorant inquisitive fellow, strolling about the streets of Boston, rambled into a counting room where two gentlemen were looking over some accounts, and seemed engaged in a violent dispute. The man made his way up to them, peeped over their shoulders, and not seeing so clearly as he wished, put his hand between them. One of the gentlemen springing up, with one blow landed him across the floor. The fellow got up immediately, and rubbing himself, said, "I guess I could see full as well a little further off."—Ill gotten Gains seldom prosper. The following advertisement appears in a western paper. It is unique and pithy: Notice. The person who stole my axe on Saturday last, is hereby requested to return it. The property is mine, and unless returned, the wrongful holder of it will never prosper.—J. J. Harper.—Curious Exclusion. The editor of a paper devoted with warmth to politics, in a notice to correspondents, observes, "we have no room for Truth this week; and our remarks on Mr. Randolph's speech have necessarily excluded Justice. Fair play is inadmissible. Falsehood, No. 5, shall appear in our next."—A "Take in." It is not generally known, that the post-office law makes it a penalty of five dollars, for writing a communication on a newspaper or pamphlet. We are informed that many devices are practised to defraud the government of the little sums of postage. Letters, messages, &c., are often inclosed in newspapers, &c., many of which have been detected. Some time ago, a postmaster had the curiosity to look into a periodical work, when he found the following written on the inner margin:

There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign;

I have brought suit against Jones,
and expect to get judgement

Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain.

next court; of which my lawyer says there is no doubt;

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood,
Stand dress in living green;
unless he appeals it, when it will only delay it one term.

So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan rolled between.

Do write me soon; we are anxious to hear from you, &c. &c. &c.

The same postmaster found, in a newspaper neatly folded up, a pattern of the latest New-York fashion, for a lady's dress, with the directions neatly written on it. But another had been more ingenious, and completely evaded the law, by drafting the dress on the paper, without any writing.

—Not Slow. A brother of the editor, sixteen years of age, composed, in one day last week, between sun rising and setting, five columns of the Farmers' Advocate, (L. P.) amounting to 11,885 ems, got a proof sheet and corrected it.

—Love Unchangeable. Married, in Camden, S. C., by the Rev. Mr. Copeland, Mr. Thomas W. Love, to Miss Sarah Love, both of that district. — Powerful Awakening. A waggish personage, says the Boston Evening Bulletin, whose christian and surname, and his place of residence are told by some gentleman, being at a meeting on a Sunday, with his pockets full of green apples, it happened that many of the congregation fell asleep. The minister observing the number of his hearers to diminish very fast, came to a pause; whereupon, he with the green apples, observing the dilemma, got up in his pew, and addressing himself to the clergyman, said, "please to proceed, sir; if you will go on with your sermon I will wake them up for you," and taking a handful of apples from his pocket, let drive, first at the dreaming deacon, and then at the snoring chorister, and so round, until he had effectually secured the attention of the whole assembly. — Another Abduction. The editor of the Batavia Times among his notices to correspondents, says, "If the person who sent us the scrap of poetry, designed particularly for the Ruling Elder, and the Kitten Gazette," will send us another copy, we will be obliged to him. The copy he has sent us has been kidnapped. Very mysterious! wonder who did it! — A Puzzle for Postmasters. A day or two since, says the Berkshire American, a letter came to the North Adams post-office to be mailed, with the following superscription:

"to Mr. Henry Clark or marinda Ford to Troy & then to Newburgh take the Overgo Stage from there to Newton
and then to Jersey Shore."

— Quite Moderate! A gentleman in Havana states, that murders in that city are becoming very rare, not more than two a week having been perpetrated during the last year. — Longevity. It appears from a table of the deaths in the Russian empire, in 1827, that among the individuals deceased of the masculine sex, professing the Grecian religion, there were 818 of 100 years old; 83 above 15; 24 above 120; seven above 125; and one of 160.

— Wood will out! Mr. Macnish, who has just published a work entitled the "Anatomy of Drunkenness," says he is met with two instances—the one in a claret, the other in port. Drinker, where the moisture which exuded from the body was of a ruddy complexion, somewhat similar to the line on which their debauch had been committed. — Sharp Shot. There is a sportsman in Paisley, says a British paper, who has repeatedly laid down his double-barrelled gun loaded at his feet, thrown two penny pieces over his head, lifted the gun, turned round, and struck the penny pieces successively, right and left, before they reached the ground. The same gentleman, for a wager that he would hit, with a single-barrelled gun, loaded with ball, hit two ounces out of twenty, thrown up one by one, at the distance twenty yards, actually struck two out of the first seven that were thrown up, and thus decided the bet. — Search Scripture. Married, in Mason, New-Hampshire, Mr. As Hubbard to Miss Louisa Scripture.

Some keep the Scripture for a show,
Lettered and gilt on their bureau,
And some to dust and mites degrade it;
But Jonas took the wiser part.
He prest the Scripture to his bosom,
And even on his pillow laid it.

— One Half-penny Reward. Whereas, Francis Williams, my husband, left me on or about the 26th day of November last, and it being the eighth time he has eloped from me, I forbid all persons harbouring or trusting him on my account, as I will pay no debts of his contracting, nor do I any longer consider myself his wife. I will pay the above reward to any person who will return the above Francis to me, but no charges. Margaret Willet. Peru, (Clinton co.) May 16, 1828.

THE CLOSING SCENE. An article under this caption is published in the Philadelphia Album as original, by Alaric A. Watts. Now we should like to know whether this same poet is the editor of the London Literary Souvenir. If so he has a peculiar partiality for American periodicals, to send an article all the way over ocean to have it inserted in the Philadelphia Album!

The following appeal of colonel William King, we introduce into our columns, satisfied that it will be read with interest by all, as the whole may be said to carry its own comment wherever it is read. It is therefore needless to make the remarks which must occur to all who read with candour, and form their judgement by the help of reason.

TO THE PUBLIC.

FELLOW-CITIZENS—Believing in the disposition of the generality of my countrymen to do justice to their fellow men, and owing to the unwarrantable liberty taken with my name by individuals of whom I shall not now speak—influenced, likewise by a sense of duty to my family, my friends, and myself, I have thought proper to offer for your consideration a detail of circumstances connected with my departure and subsequent return to this state, leaving for your candour to determine with what degree of justice I have been branded as a fugitive from justice.

A few years since, I was doing the business for three United States' posts, viz: Niagara, Plattsburgh, and Mackinac. Within that time these posts have all been abandoned, and my business was entirely broken up. A family of twelve children had drawn so largely on my resources as to prevent any accumulation of property, and the business of this part of the country did not offer me, as I was then without capital, sufficient inducement to remain. I consequently left for the city Albany, where I received an appointment from the late Governor Clinton to transact some business for the state at Washington, to which place I repaired, and remained till the 7th of February, 1827. During my stay there I received from the Hon. James Barbour, Secretary of War, an appointment to do the business at Cantonment Towson, in the Arkansas territory, on the Red River about 1200 miles above its junction with the Mississippi. I left Baltimore on the 10th February—and travelled by the way of N. Orleans and Natchitoches to Cantonment Towson, where I arrived on the 1st of April, and established myself in business, which I pursued till informed by a gentleman who arrived from below, that my name was in the papers, connected with the Morgan Affair, which was the first information I had ever received to that effect. I replied to him, that I would go home as soon as I could get my business arranged; and was actually getting on with the arrangement, when, about the middle of February last, a gentleman informed me that he had overheard a conversation between three men and Captain Hyde, by which he understood that they had come from N. York after me. I instantly replied that I was perfectly willing to deliver myself into their custody, if I was suspected of having violated the laws of my country; but on being assured that Mr. Garlinghouse said that he should be compelled to put me in irons, &c., I, though willing to return, determined not to be brought from there to this state in that way, and concluded to ride to a friend's, about 10 miles off, where I remained till I was sure they had taken their departure—when I returned, put my business in the best state possible, and started for this place, a distance of nearly four thousand miles—travelling all the time nearly, night and day, to arrive here with as little delay as possible.

I arrived here on Saturday afternoon, the 17th inst., and on the following Monday went to Lewiston, where I entered bail before the first judge for $2000—myself in $1000 and two sureties in $500 each. During my absence I was continually writing to my family and friends—as for instance, I wrote from Albany, N. York, Baltimore, Washington, Natchitoches, and Cantonment Towson. From the latter place, I frequently sent letters, many of which never reached their destination, and especially one mailed on the evening of the 31st August last, directed to my family, and containing $300 for their support.

Such are briefly the circumstances connected with my departure and return, and it is for others to say whether I have evinced any disposition to escape the justice of my country, and to judge of the motives of those who have condemned me unheard, and branded me to the world as a fugitive from the laws to which I have now voluntarily surrendered myself.—And it is proper to add here, that although no means were left untried to procure a different result, nonindictment could be obtained against me beyond a quid pro quo.

In conclusion, I ask of my fellow-citizens a suspension of opinion on the prejudicial reports which have been industriously circulated at my expense. By submitting voluntarily to the laws, I have given sufficient evidence of my determination to abide the issue, to entitle me to a cessation until I shall have had my trial, of that nature with which some individuals have endeavoured to prejudice and forestall the public mind.

WM. KING.

Youngstown, May, 27th, 1828.

FORMER. As late as the 29th of April, we learn by the latest arrivals in New-York, the Russian army had not passed the Pruth. The elections in France create a wonderful interest at the present time. The New-York papers contain the speech of general Lafayette, on the abolition of the National Guard. The liberal party succeeded by amazing majorities. On the night of the 10th of April, a slight shock of an earthquake was felt at Rome. Letters of the 6th April, from Corfu, announce the arrival of the Wellesley, the Revenge, and the Ocean. They had landed 6000 British troops, taken on board at Lisbon and Gibraltar. The Notizio del Giorno, under date of Corfu April 1, states that the probable plan of the expedition into modern Greece is as follows:—the corps now at Dragomestra, after being joined by a division expected from the Peloponessus, will advance as far as Cassanochario, where it will divide into three columns; the centre will occupy that place, the right will extend to Golista, and the left to the lakes. Small vessels are fitted up for entering the Ambrasian gulf to support the left. It appears that Missolonghi and Anatolio are on the eve of surrendering to the Greeks; and Prevesa and Arta are not in a condition to hold out long. The Seraskier remains at Jannina without funds; the inhabitants of that country are humanely treated, and no war-tax has been imposed.

FRESH GOODS.—N. TARBELL, No. 549, South Market street, has received and manufactured his spring stock of Brushes, Trunks, and Bandboxes, where orders from any part of the country will be received to any amount in his line of business; and as he offers the best assortment of any one in the city or its vicinity, and has had an opportunity of getting direct from the importers; the choice of their stock, he warrants his goods 15 per cent better than they have been in number of years. Those who wish to purchase will do well to call and examine for themselves. May 31. 1827

HARTWICK SEMINARY.—This Seminary has been established about thirteen years, in the pleasant valley of the Susquehanna, county of Otsego, situated four and a half miles from the village of Cooperstown, and seventy miles west from the city of Albany. Young gentlemen from various parts of the United States, have there received a preparatory education for entering college in this and the neighbouring states. And the subscriber believes that most of his pupils have hitherto sustained a favourable character at college, both in relation to their moral conduct, and their proficiency in the several branches of sciences in which they have been instructed.

The branches taught are the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages; French and German; Natural Philosophy; History; Mathematics in general, and particularly Surveying, both theoretical and practical; Geography; English Grammar; exercises in English composition; Arithmetic, Writing, &c. The Rev. George B. Miller, who for a number of years past, has been successfully engaged in the tuition of youth, both in this state and the state of New-Jersey, has been appointed assistant teacher in the seminary. The present term commenced on Monday the 19th of May, to continue to the last Wednesday in August.

For further particulars and reference as to the character of the institution, the subscriber would refer the public to the Rev. F. G. Mayer, of Albany; the Rev. Dr. Wackerhagen, of Clermont; the Rev. Dr. Quimman, of Rhinebeck; the Rev. Dr. Nutt, President of Union College; the Rev. Mr. Shaeffer, and the Rev. Dr. Geisenhainer, of New-York; to the clergy of the Lutheran Church in this and the neighbouring states in general, and to the trustees of Hartwick Seminary in particular.

Good boarding may be had in the neighbourhood of the seminary, at the moderate price of 12 or 14 shillings per week.

ERNEST L. HAZELIUS,
Principal of Hartwick Seminary.

JOHN H. HALL respectfully informs his friends and the public that he has removed to No 454, South Market street, three doors north of the museum, where he continues to execute engravings of Book, Fancy, and Toy Cuts, Stamps, Seals, and Society Emblems; Newspaper and Handbill Heads and Ornaments; Card Ornaments and Borders; Vignettes, in all their variety; Engravings of Public Buildings; New Inventions; Patent Machines; and Devices for different Mechanical Professions and Arts. Albany, May 5, 1828. 155

BOOK-BINDING.—Sign of the Golden Leger, corner of State and North Market Streets, Albany.—WILLIAM SEYMOUR carries on the above business in all its branches; viz. Plain, Extra, and Super-Extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1-2 cents a volume. Dec. 22 475

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public, that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the best quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be given to all orders. March 9, 1827.

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

TO CALANTHE.

It is enough; I hear thy strain
Come like fresh musick from the sea,
And vacillating hope again
Tells what thou mightst have been to me.
It is enough; for in the spell
That echo casts upon mine ear
There is a sound I know too well—
A lay I love too much to hear.

And be it so;—if to mine eye
There never come a smile from thine,
If the devoted pilgrim's sigh
Must sink unanswered at his shrine,
If lips which utter thoughts that burn
Come with no answer to mine ear,
Smile, sigh and speech will all return
In that one lay I love to hear.

The world may spurn at thoughts like these;
Then never cast them from thy lip;—
Yet as the unheard, unseen breeze
Propels the ocean-girded ship,
So shall the evening echoes tell,
When that lay comes upon mine ear,
A truth thou knowest, alas! too well,—
A truth the world must never hear.

Sing then, Calanthe,—and to me
That shall be all that speech, or sigh,
Or smile, or tears have power to be;
But not to all who linger by.
To them the holy musick seems
No language of unearthly spheres;
And one alone—one madly dreams
That love is in the lay he hears!

THE PICTURE GALLERY.

I stood with a fair young girl yestreen
With a strange bewitching eye,
And lips that words might melt between,
And of their own musick die—
And she raised her lashes like clouds that pass
From stars with an easy gale,
And gazed till I could have framed myself,
And hung on a rusty nail.

And I have a kind of a dreamy sense
Of things she said were fair,
And I answered "sweet!"—but I meant her lips,
And "rich!"—but I meant her hair—
And so perhaps I shall praise them wrong
Or interpret her meaning ill,
For her memory comes up sweet but dim
Like a dream by a singing rill.

The moonlit bay of Genoa
With its nipples tipped with light—
"The shadowy sails that, one by one,
Steak to the gazer's sight—
The soft white edge of the gliding clouds,
Like clouds when the wind is south—
They never were half so beautiful
Till praised by her rosy mouth.

She liked the ease of the graceful "girl
At her devotions" drawn,
With a look of such sad gentleness
As of a dream just gone—
Like one who watches a fading cloud
As the twilight falls in June,
With thoughts half sad, half sorrowful,
Like the notes of a wawayard tune.

ere were exquisite things by Fisher,
Which will not come in rhyme—
And a lady drawn by Rembrandt's Peale
I could worship had I time—
The high-born look of Miss Caton—
The consumptive kitten by Morse—

Real ducks by Alexander,
And Dunlap's horrible horse.

If my Pegasus went forever—
If my muse were kin to Job—
If a humour of rhyme could be put on
As a man puts on a robe—
Had the beautiful school-girl crazed me less,
Or had eyes less deeply blue,
I would rhyme you "an hour by Shrewsbury clock."
As it is, I vanish—adieu! Excuse.

THE WIFE.

She spoke—and her low accents bore
A tone of thrilling sadness,
That half denied the evils she wore,
Too full of love for gladness.

She spoke, and in her quiet eye
There beamed the light of feeling,
With preface of a gentle sigh,
The full heart thus revealing.

"Sorrow and I have mingled much;—
My pallid looks declare it;
But I could brave her withering touch,
Wert thou not doomed to share it.

When heaven its precious gift recalled,
The boy we prized so dearly,
My bosom, rent yet unappalled,
But cherished thee more nearly.

And wert thou other than thou art—
Less generous, kind, confiding,
The love that lives in my true heart
Were not the less abiding.
E'en thy neglect I might sustain;
'T would chill my heart,—not break it;
Its tenderness would still remain;
Thy falsehood could not shake it.

But on thy heart should sorrow prey,
And doubt and fear assail thee,
And disappointment mark thy way,
And friends and fortune fail thee.

These tears, these foolish tears that start,
Might bring relief to me, love,
But the long sigh that rends the heart
Would only sigh for thee, love.

My bitter doom may be to twine
The shroud of death about thee,
To press thy senseless form to mine,
To live—to feel—without thee:

And even from this I would not shrink,
Should fate for this reserve me;
But on thy griefs I dare not think;
God from all ill preserve thee!

INTELLECTUAL LOVE.

Nay—answer not by burning words! my love is like a spell
That would dissolve with tenderness, my glorious Adol!
I never could retain the high Idolatry of love,
For one who had been folded to my bosom like a dove.

The heart of woman should be kept like a devoted bird,
Whose melody is only in the temple arches heard—
A spiritual idol, in its holiness enshrined,
Whose altar burneth only with the sacrifice of mind.

I met thee first beneath the stars—beneath the silver moon,
Mid the fragrance and the musick of the leafy month of June,
And thy presence fell upon my soul like the eve upon the sea,
And stilled it to a mirror of the starry host and thee.

That starry host I've worshipped as nature's light, till now,
But a severer beauty is floating on thy brow.
I bring no gift of passion to stain the altar stone,
But the pure and holy worship of my intellect alone.

My lip may oft be passionate—for human hearts will swell
At the crushing of affections that impatiently rebel—
But the smoking of the incense cup defileth not the shrine,
And the weakness of my spirit must not be felt by thine.

Then not a word of tenderness—but let my passion pass
From thine unsullied nature like the breathing from the glass;
I never could restore the high idolatry of love,
When once thou hadst been folded to my bosom like a dove.

CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

Soldier, go—but not to claim
Mouldering spoils of earth born treasure,
Not to build a vaunting name,
Not to dwell in tents of pleasure.
Dream not that the way is smooth,
Hope not that the thorns are roses;
Turn no wishful eye on youth,
Where the sunny beam reposes;
Thou hast sterner work to do,
Hosts to cut thy passage through:
Close behind thee gulfs are burning—
Forward!—there is no returning.

Soldier, rest—but not for thee
Spreads the world her downy pillow;
On the rock thy couch must be,
While around thee chafes the billow.
Thine must be a watchful sleep,
Wearier than another's waking,
Such a charge as thou dost keep
Brooks no moment of forsaking.
Sleep, as on the battle field,
Girded—grasping sword and shield:
Those thou canst not name or number,
Steal upon thy broken slumber.

Soldier, rise—the war is done;
Lo the hosts of hell are flying;
'T was thy Lord the battle won;
Jesus vanquished them by dying.
Pass the stream—before thee lies
All the conquered land of glory;
Hark!—what songs of rapture rise.
These proclaim the victor's story.
Soldier, lay thy weapons down,
Quit the sword, and take the crown;
Triumph!—all thy foes are banished,
Death is slain, and earth is vanquished.

ETERNITY.

BY FRANCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

O man! hold thou on in courage of soul
Through the stormy shades of thy worldly way.
And the billows of cloud that around thee roll
Shall sleep in the light of a wondrous day,
Where hell and heaven shall leave thee free
To the universe of destiny.

This world is the nurse of all we know,
This world is the mother of all we feel,
And the coming of death is a fearful blow
To a brain uncompassed with nerves of steel;
When all that; we know, or feel, or see,
Shall pass like an unreal mystery.

The secret things of the grave are there,
Where all but this frame must surely be,
Though the fine-wrought eye and the wondrous ear
No longer will live to hear or to see
All that is great and all that is strange
In the boundless realm of ascending change.

Who telleth a lie of unspeaking death?
Who lifeth the veil of what is to come?
Who painteth the shadows that are beneath
The wide winding caves of the peopled tomb?
Or unitteth the hopes of what shall be
With the fears and the love for that which we see?

From the New-England Review.

STANZAS.

'T were nothing did we die—'t were nought
At once from life to pass away—
But thus to wither, thought by thought,
And inch by inch, and day by day—
To watch the lingering tints of light,
As twilight o'er the sky expands,
To view the wave's receding flight,
Upon the bleak and barren sands—

To see the stars, that gem the sky
Faded one by one—to mark the leaves
Fall from the boughs all witheringly,
Through which the wintry tempest grieves—
'T is this that chills the aching heart,
That still we breathe, and feel, and live,
When all the flowers of earth depart,
And life hath not a joy to give.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered at the installation of the officers of Lafayette Encampment, No. 7, of Knights Templars and the Appendant Orders, in Hudson, October 25, 1824.

BY GEORGE HOWARD, D. G. C.

Sir knights of Lafayette Encampment, your unanimous suffrages have published to the world the names and rank of those who are to conduct the destinies of this sacred institution; an institution, based on those immortal truths which are recorded on the fair pages of the blessed gospel, and dedicated to deeds of charity and love. The solemn ceremonies of installation have been performed and the organization of your encampment is complete. In you we behold the representatives of those valiant champions, those godlike warriors, who waged an exterminating warfare upon the enemies of IMMANUEL; who tore the bloody crescent from the abhorrent front of infidelity, and who, when the cruel strife had ceased, deposited in the perfect spirit of faithful pilgrims, their trophies and their arms at the foot of a Redeeming Cross.

On this happy occasion, sir knights, companions of the altar, and brethren of the square, I hail you with transport; and greet you with the kind salutation of pure and unsophisticated friendship. Within these walls, consecrated, by the genius of masonry, as the hallowed asylum of the craft, there is a pleasing charm which rests upon the soul, a heavenly sympathy which glows with unabated ardor in each masonick breast, and tells us in Nature's strongest language, that man, divested of his sensual habits, is the fair emblem of innocence; and the heir apparent of a blessed immortality.

"Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity;

"It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments;

"As the dew of Hermon and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion, for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for evermore."

No wonder the tongue of Israel's favourite broke out in admiration of a subject so well calculated to swell the soul with heavenly pleasures—It is not astonishing that the tender sympathies should be awakened by contemplations so highly interesting; nor is it singular, that when kindred spirits meet upon the level, they should prepare their minds for the solemn duties in which they are about to engage by repeating this most grateful salutation. It is the contemplation of such important subjects, that kindles the sacred flame of fellowship within the breast, that hurls the ruder passions to repose, and softens all the cares of life.

But my brethren, human nature is composed of gross materials. Our frail bodies, which bear the lovely impress of divinity, are subject to foul disease, and we hold our grand levees in the very court where the genius of death presides. Our minds are like a mirror, upon whose impartial surface is reflected our virtues and our vices, and it is only by a firm and steadfast resolution, to persevere in the practice of virtue, that we are to avoid the anguish of a wounded conscience.

In conducting the affairs of this encampment, sir knights, you are to be governed solely by the god-like principles which adorn the meek and lowly followers of our Immortal Grand Commander. Those frenzied passions which lead to the commission of deeds unlawful and impure, those unholy fires generated by the corruption of the heart, and fed with the tears of victims sacrificed upon the altar of human pride, the dark catalogue of errors that disturb the peace and destroy the social tie which binds man to his fellow—must be driven far from this temple of Innocence, that the pure flame of brotherly love, may ascend in grateful perfume from your peaceful altars.

Does unwarrantable ambition intrude upon your sanctuary? give it to the four winds of heaven, that it may be scattered in desolation's track, and be destroyed forever.

Should Avarice rear her hideous head and attempt to paralyze the arm of charity, sever it from the unhallowed trunk, and hang it upon the mountain's towering height as a warning to the faithless and unwise.

If Discord, that fell destroyer of social intercourse, obtrude upon the labours of the craft, bury it in its own ponderous ruins and consign its hated image to endless oblivion.

If strife be permitted to exist among you, let it be generated by that nobleness of heart which urges to deeds of charity and which emanates from a desire to be conspicuous in the ranks of Philanthropy. Let the shouts of thankful indigence proclaim the happiness you have experienced in softening human woe. The rising sigh, you oft have hushed in the orphan's tender bosom, shall plead for you at the throne of majesty divine; and if, perchance, in the bewildered mazes of a misguided fancy, you may have erred, and the great page of your account shall be stained by the frailness of your nature, the tears of the lonely widow, whom you have relieved, as they fall upon the record of your transgressions, shall wash them from the book of remembrance forever.

"If angels weep in heaven, they weep for virtue in distress. Cherubim view with delight the exercise of charity and saints in rapture touch their golden harps when man performs a god-like action."

The destinies of this encampment, sir knights, are now committed to your charge. You have taken upon yourselves a responsibility which I hope and trust will be discharged in the true faith of worthy templars. You have the bright example of those illustrious chiefs who proudly triumphed over pagan hosts, those stubborn souls whom bigotry could not conquer or adversity subdue; and those christian martyrs who exchanged the agonies of the stake for a paradise of bliss; to stimulate you in the exercise of virtue. Let the finger of hope point you to the cross on Calvary's mount, and the sweet whispers of faith assure you that BY THIS SIGN YOU SHALL SURELY CONQUER.

It is with no ordinary degree of pleasure that I congratulate you upon the title you have selected for this encampment. In tracing the broad galaxy of knighthood, the eye in vain searches for a more splendid object than the STAR OF LAFAYETTE. It beams with unsullied lustre; its sparkling rays emit a thousand charms, and the sons of freedom welcome its approach as the harbinger of Happiness and Peace.

The youthful eye of Lafayette looked abroad from the quarries of superstition and his eager vision discovered the blessed light of liberty dawning in this western world—he beheld our dark plumed eagle brooding in melancholy silence over the misfortunes of her young—the groans of an oppressed nation sunk deep into his soul—distant, as was the cry of distress, it raised him far above the frowns of tyranny—he trod the rugged path which led to the temple of freedom; and pursued, with manly fortitude, its dangerous and uncertain way, until the key stone of liberty's fair arch was safely set. He is now reposing in the arms of a grateful people—the fame of his deeds is borne on every breeze; and wherever he moves, thousands of thankful voices shout, GOD BLESS HIM!

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

JEFFERSON COUNTY.

Extract from the proceedings of the lodge in Sackets Harbour, Jefferson county, on the 21st of February last:—

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted, as a testimonial of the estimation in which the lodge holds the memory of the illustrious dead.

It having pleased the all wise Disposer of events suddenly to cut down by the stroke of death, and remove to the land of our fathers, our distinguished and venerable brother, DE WITT CLINTON, governor of this state, and the members of this lodge being desirous to manifest their deep and affecting sense of the great and irreparable loss sustained by the masonick institution in this state and throughout the American union, it is therefore

Resolved unanimously, that in the death of our illustrious brother, DE WITT CLINTON, the nation has lost its brightest ornament, the state its most useful and distinguished citizen, mankind a benefactor, learning and science their ablest advocate, and the masonick institution one of its greatest and most devoted patrons, whose exertions in support of the institution and for the advancement of the grand principles of our order shall be cherished ever green in our remembrance, with sentiments of the most hallowed gratitude.

Resolved unanimously, that in testimony of the profound grief and unfeigned regret felt by the members of this lodge, on the sudden death of our worthy and lamented brother, DE WITT CLINTON, Past Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of this state, General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, Grand Master of the Grand Encampment of this state, and General Grand Commander of the General Grand Encampment of the United States, the members of this Lodge will wear the usual badge of mourning crape on the left arm for thirty days.

TENNESSEE.

Extract from the minutes of Mount Libanus Lodge, No. 59, at its regular communication in Knoxville Tennessee, March 5, 5828:—

The members of this Lodge have heard, with feelings of deep regret, of the death of their illustrious friend and brother DE WITT CLINTON, late governor of New-York. In the death of this distinguished individual, society has sustained a loss not easily to be repaired, and masonry one of its brightest ornaments and most able and efficient patrons: therefore,

Resolved, that the members of this lodge, as an evidence of their respect for the memory of their deceased brother, wear an appropriate badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, that the foregoing preamble and resolution, be published.

ANDREW McMILLAN, Sec'y.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

CANCER RURICOLA OR LAND CRAB.

From Good's Book of Nature.

This is an inhabitant of the tropical regions, and especially of the Bahama islands: it is gregarious, and associates in large bodies that preserve an orderly society, for the most part, in the recesses of inland mountains, though they regularly once a year march down to the sea-side in an army of some millions, to deposit their spawn in the ocean. The time selected for this expedition is usually the month of May, when they sally forth from the stumps of hollow trees, the clefts of rocks, and subterranean burrows, in enormous multitudes. The whole ground indeed, is covered with this reptile band of adventurers; and no geometrician could direct them to their destined station by a shorter course. They turn neither to the right hand nor to the left, whatever be the obstacles that intervene; and if they meet with a house they will rather attempt to scale the walls than relinquish the unbroken tenor of their way. Occasionally, however, they are obliged to conform to the face of the country; and if it be intersected by rivers, they pursue the stream to its fountain-head. In great dearth of rain they are compelled to halt, when they seek the most convenient encampment, and remain there until the weather changes. They make a similar halt when the sun shines with intense heat, and wait for the cool of the evening. The journey often takes them up three months before they arrive on the sea-coast; as soon as they accomplish which, they plunge into the water, shake off their spawn upon the sand, which they leave to nature to mature and vivify, and immediately measure back their steps to the mountains. The spawn, thus abandoned, are not left to perish: the soft sands afford them a proper nidus; the heat of the sun, and the water, give them a birth; when millions of little crabs are seen crawling to the shore, and exploring their way to the interior of the country, and thus quitting their elementary and native habitation, for a new and untried mode of existence. It is the marvellous power of instinct that alone directs them, as it directed the parent hosts from whom they have proceeded; that marvellous power which is co-extensive with the wide range of organic life, universally recognised, though void of sensation; consummately skilful, though destitute of intelligence; demanding no growth or development of faculties, but mature and perfect from its first formation.

The general corollary resulting from these observations is as follows; that instinct, as I have already defined it to be, is the operation of the principle of organized life by the exercise of certain natural powers directed to the present or future good of the individual; while reason is the operation of the principle of intellectual life by the exercise of certain acquired powers directed to the same object: that it appertains to the whole organized mass as gravitation does to the whole unorganized; equally actuating the smallest and the bulkiest systems; every organ and every part of every organ, whether solid or fluid, so long as it continues alive: that, like gravitation, it exhibits, under particular circumstances, different modifications, different powers, and different effects; but that, like gravitation, too, it is subject to its own division of laws, to which, under definite circumstances, it adheres without the smallest deviation; and that its sole and uniform aim, whether acting generally or locally, is that of perfection, preservation, or reproduction.

Of its mode of existence we know nothing; but as little do we know of the principle of gravitation or of mind. We can only assure ourselves that they are distinct powers, perhaps distinct essences; and we see them acting, as well separately as conjointly, for the general good. Under their accor-dant influence we behold the plastic and mysterious substance of matter, which we must be especially careful not to confound with themselves; rising from "airy nothing" into entity: ascending from invisible elements into worlds and systems of worlds; from shapeless chaos and confusion, into form, and order, and harmony; from brute and lifeless immobility, into energy and activity; into a display of instinct, feeling, perception; of being, and beauty, and happiness. One common design, one uniform code of laws, equally simple and majestic, equally local and comprehensive, pervades, informs, unites and consummates the whole. The effect then being one, the mighty cause that produced it must be one also; an eternal and infinite unity—the radiating foundation of all possible perfections—ever active, but ever at rest—ever present, though never seen—immaterial, incorporeal, ineffable: but the source of all matter, of all mind, of all existences, and all modes of existence. Whatever we behold is God—all nature is his awful temple—all sciences the porticoes that open to it; and the chief duty of philosophy is to conduct us to his altar; to render all our attainments, which are the bounteous affluents of his spirit, subservient to his glory; and to engrave on the tablet of our hearts this great accordant motto of all revealed religion, of Athens and of Antioch, of Aratus and of St. Paul, "in him we live, and move, and have our being."

HEMLOCK.

From the National Alys.

Very few of the varieties of plants whose blossoms wave by the way side or flourish on the margin of the stream, are to be avoided or can be regarded without admiration and pleasure. One however possessed most deleterious properties, and has been noted as a poison from antiquity. Its easy and certain power of destroying life have recommended it for use in prisons of arbitrary rule, from the tribunal of the Athenian Areopagus to the court of the Spanish Inquisition. Its mild and lethergick operation have established it not only as the instrument of the executioner, but the agent of the suicide. A species of this plant, emigrating from Europe, is now common about road sides and in waste grounds, especially in those parts of the country which have been long settled. The frequent instances of deplorable accidents resulting from its use, show that its deleterious properties are unknown or too often neglected. In general appearance the plant, has a resemblance to the carrot when shooting up to bear seed. It is commonly found in bunches and rises to the height of four, five or six feet and produces clusters of minute flowers of a dull, white, from June to November.

Dr. Bigelow speaks of the poisonous effects as very different on different individuals, varying with the temperament of the person, the age and place of the growth of the plant and other circumstances. Generally, dizziness, nausea, diminished power of vision, faintness and muscular weakness are described as the consequences of its operation. This plant is often eaten by children either from carelessness or ignorance. The papers on our table contain two instances where death has followed the dangerous repast. While our legislators are proposing the destruction of the vegetable enemies of the harvest, it would be well if they would take measures to exterminate these treacherous weeds creeping round the habitations of man to steal away life, and better still if they were attacked by every person who discovers them intruding on the frontiers of his possessions.

BIOGRAPHY.

GENERAL JOSEPH WARREN.

For the Masonick Record.

When it becomes our duty to delineate the character and record the deeds of one of our fellow men, we are often in a manner the creators of their fame, especially when we are the first to throw in our efforts to snatch their names from the oblivion, which, sooner or later, must be the lot of the most conspicuous in the page of earthly glory. By the aid of a fertile imagination and some feelings of fa-your or prejudice, the biographer may often tell posterity of principles which his subject never held, and make even his errors and blunders the theme of future praise. He may depict him with talents he never possessed, crimes he would have abhorred, virtues he never emulated, deeds he never aspired to, respect he never commanded, or motives he never dreamed of. All these he may do, and posterity, ever ready to take his word, will swallow it all, and give him the credit of rescuing his character from remediless insignificance. Such we say may be the case when a writer, with no other intent than to spend so many words he cares not how, sits down, and attempts to deliver his brain of a biography; and for a subject, takes hold of one of those "good sort of good for nothing kind of people," who for sheer lack of incident, never had their manes pacified by a single post obit puff, beyond the little sphere of their daily how dye do. And it is well enough for both reader and read, if not for the bookseller, that such biographies may be written. Seldom do they contain any thing calculated to wound the feelings of any being; because forsooth, he of whom it can hardly be said that he has ever done any thing, will not be likely to incur the reputation of doing much evil; and it is certainly the part of charity, if it go a little contrary to truth, to speak well at least of him of whom we can speak but little.

But the illustrious subject of our present sketch is one which will not allow the full licence of inventive fancy to operate. His life was his country's, so must be the record of his labours and his fame. They are known to all, and the least deviation from plain facts would bring down the just resentment of the guardians of his memory; and such are all who know him as a patriot, a statesman, a scholar, and a mason.

JOSEPH WARREN was the son of a respectable farmer of the town of Roxbury, near Boston, and born in the year 1739. He early discovered a taste for literature, and acquired the rudiments of knowledge at the publick grammar school in that town, which was distinguished for its successive instructors of superiour talents. In 1755 he entered college, where his industry, his genteel deportment, and personal courage and generosity, secured to him the esteem of all who knew him. On leaving college in 1759, WARREN turned his attention to the study of medicine, and when the small pox broke out in Boston in 1764; he was fortunately very successful in his method of treating the disease, which ensured him a reputation seldom acquired at the very commencement of practice, and he was both beloved and admired by all who were acquainted with his talents or his courteous and humane deportment. His fame, no doubt, would have been fixed, bright and lasting, and would have been followed with the usual attendants, wealth and influence, had he not digressed from the usual sphere of a medical practitioner; but his country—the idol of his warmest worship,—his free yet endangered country, called him away from the peaceful course of professional labour, never to return again. He entered the vortex of politics; the rights of man, and the wrongs of usurpation were his study;—the lessons of liberty fell from his tongue; and his pen was in constant employ to arouse and enlighten his oppressed fellow citizens.

It would perhaps be more difficult to distinguish one half the fruits of his pen, which were so seasonably distributed for the education of the young and ardent patriots of that day. Most who engaged their mental strength in the good cause, made their appeals over fictitious signatures or by anonymous essays. Much may have been credited to him to which he could lay no claim, and more probably a greater part of his own zealous effusions were put to the credit of other writers,—as his versatility of style was such as to deceive even his most intimate associates.

His powers of oratory were remarkably suited to the wants and tastes of his times, and the fervour of his patriotick sentiments. He perhaps was somewhat in advance of the publick opinion in some of the most essential articles of his creed, but a proper confidence on the part of the people was not slow to bring them into his track, while he seemed rather to follow than to lead; and by a seeming reciprocity of dependence he acquired an influence almost beyond credibility. It would be dangerous in our present state of national advancement to possess men of such influence. Nothing but pure patriotick virtue at that season, preserved and protected the infant genius of our country from the sad effects of a confidence beyond the bounds of common prudence.

He had delivered several orations, on the anniversary of the fifth of March, a day set apart to commemorate the massacre in King-street, Boston, in 1770, and his as well as others were marked with the most daring and energetick appeals to the people against the tyrannical measures of the mother country. In the winter of 1775, the British officers then in Boston declared that it should be at the price of the life of any man to speak of the event of March 5, 1770, on the ensuing anniversary. The soul of WARREN took fire at such a threat; and he earnestly solicited the honour of being appointed to the duty of orator for the day. It is not necessary to say that such a man would have few rivals for such a situation. He was appointed to deliver the oration, and had the courage of the enemy been equal to their apparent intentions, that day had been an era even more memorable than the nineteenth of April, the seventeenth of June, and not to be placed behind the truly glorious fourth of July. The fifth of March 1775 happened on Sunday; therefore the sixth was to be observed as a day of mournful remembrance for the evils and audacity of a standing army.

The day arrived, fair and sunny, and the Old South Meeting house was so crowded, at a very early hour, that the orator was obliged to make his entrance at the pulpit window, by means of a ladder. The British officers, armed and sneering, occupied the aisles, the pulpit stairs, and several of them were even within the pulpit. To use the words of an elegant and correct biographer of WARREN,—

"The scene was sublime; a patriot in whom the flush of youth, and the grace and dignity of manhood were combined, stood armed in the sanctuary of God, to animate and encourage the sons of liberty, and to hurl defiance at their oppressors. The orator commenced with the early history of the country, described the tenure by which we held our liberties and property—the affection we had constantly shown the parent country, and boldly told them how, and by whom these blessings of life had been violated. There was in this appeal to Britain—in this description of suffering, agony and horror, a calm and high-souled defiance which must have chilled the blood of every sensible foe. Such another hour has seldom happened in the history of man, and is not surpassed in the records of nations. The thunders of Demosthenes rolled at a distance from Philip and his host—and Tully poured the fiercest torrent of his invective when Catiline was at a distance and his dagger no longer to be feared, but WARREN'S speech was made to proud oppressors resting on their arms, whose errand it was to overawe, and whose business it was to fight."

He was in the battle of Lexington, not a casual actor, but one who had been apprised and took measures to effect the memorable discomfiture of that day. He was actively engaged, and actually had one of his locks of hair shot away by a musket ball.

He had offered him some time in June 1775, the appointment of physician general to the army then organizing; but preferring to have a station where wounds are made, rather than where they are healed, he did not accept the appointment. He was however of much service in organizing and regulating the medical department; and his advice being as promptly received, no doubt he may be said virtually to have exercised that duty. He was at this time President of the provincial Congress of Massachusetts, and was on the 14th of June unanimously appointed a major-general of their forces. He never lived to hold a command; but his exertions were equivalent to that of an actual commander, both in prudence and effect, from the first actual bloodshed to the day of his death.

On the memorable day which gave him death and immortal fame, he did not arrive on the battle ground until the enemy had begun their movements for the attack. He came to fight as a volunteer, and when, on his first appearance, the veteran colonel PRESCOTT offered to act under his directions, he replied that he came to learn the art of war from an experienced soldier, whose orders he should be happy to obey. He was armed with a musket, and stood in the ranks with the ordinary appearance of a common soldier.

When the retreat was begun, WARREN probably mortified at the event of the day, and not knowing how dearly the enemy purchased their victory, lingered reluctantly behind his companions in arms, and seemed unwilling to leave the works. He had retreated but a few steps from the works when he fell, being shot by a musket ball in the back of the head. His fame was all that frail human nature could bear, and heaven in mercy took him away lest impious man should worship him.

"His death brought a sickness to the heart of the community, and the people mourned his fall, not with the convulsive agony of a betrothed virgin over the bleeding corpse of her lover—but with the pride of the Spartan mother, who in the intensity of her grief, smiled to see that the wounds whence life had flown, were on the breast of her son—and was satisfied that he had died in defence of his country. The worth of the victim, and the horror of the sacrifice gave a higher value to our liberties, and produced a more fixed determination to preserve them."

A monument is now erecting on the battle-ground, which does honour to the taste of posterity, even if it can add none to the glorious martyrs who slumber there. The hill itself is a monument more durable than marble or brass. We are weary of quoting, but another extract from our author must be tolerated.

"This eminence has become sacred ground. It contains in its bosom the ashes of the brave who died fighting to defend their altars and their homes. Strangers from all countries visit this spot, for it is associated in their memories with Marathon and Plataea, and all the mighty struggles of determined freemen. Our citizens love to wander over this field—the aged to awake recollections, and the youthful to excite heroic emotions. The battle-ground is now all plainly to be seen—the spirit of modern improvement, which would stop the streams of Helicon to turn a mill, and cause to be felled the trees of Paradise to make a rafter, has yet spared this hallowed height."

He was a mason, high in the honours and confidence of the fraternity. At the age of thirty he was appointed by the Grand Master of Scotland, provincial Grand Master of ancient masons, which office he held with honour to himself and the brethren over whom he was placed. At his death, the great loss sustained, and the operations of war in the vicinity, suspended all masonick intercourse for many years. In 1794, King Solomon's lodge, of Charlestown erected a monument to his memory, as nearly as could be ascertained on the spot where he was slain. It was a pillar of the Tuscan order, twenty-eight feet high, surmounted with a gilt urn on which were sundry masonick devices, and the initials and age of the honoured brother. Whether the monument has been removed to make room for the splendid structure now going up, we know not.

Brethren of the immortal WASHINGTON, FRANKLIN, and WARREN! You have a just right to be proud of your relation. Let the weight of their example be ever on your motives. Let the praise of their virtues be ever on your lips. Let the wisdom of their precepts be handed down to your children;—so shall the fruit of their labours be the eternal inheritance of your country. Look with pity rather than contempt on them who despise and revile the principles they loved to cherish, and the mystick union they delighted to honour. The testimony of the glorified dead are the pillars of your temple which cannot fail, even when the hearts of the living are bought by the breath of one day's applause. They are like the rock which offers itself a sure foundation; and though the materials fail, the foundation shall last, and will be built upon for ages and ages.

People have it generally in their power to communicate their ideas to their children; but they are still better able to transfer their passions. The surest way of instilling the love of virtue into children, is for parents to set them the example.

POPULAR TALES.

THE JEW'S REVENGE.

BY A. CROWQUILL.

You, that did void your rheum upon my beard
And foot me, as you spurn a stranger cur
Over your threshold; monies is your suit.

Merchant of Venice.

During the tyrannous and turbulent reign of John, the heartless brother of the lion-hearted and romantick Richard, the Israelites who then sojourned beneath his ungrateful sway, found merry England but a melancholy refuge; for their christian brethren zealously sought every opportunity of proving their superiority by insulting and persecuting where or whensoever they encountered them.

The heresy of their persuasion placed them without the pale of the law, and the pure catholic antipathy of their oppressors destroyed, in its flaming wrath, all the tender feelings of humanity. It is true, their usurious practices and unfair dealings, in many instances, justly brought upon them the contempt and animadversion of the free and generous heart. But on the other hand, they had much to advance in extenuation of their extortions. They were compelled, by fear and necessity, to exhibit a cautious and external appearance of poverty. If by the splendid promises of the profligate and necessitous, they were induced to unlock their hidden treasure, and lend their gold, their peril was great, for they knew that justice was not only blind, but deaf to their prayers, when they pursued a refractory debtor, and offered them nothing but a halter.

The wily borrower knew, and not unfrequently took advantage of this partiality. Under such circumstances they could not surely be blamed for demanding a premium equal to the risk, as is the wont and custom in the present charitable and enlightened age, even among many worthy and money getting christians. At this period they all congregated in an obscure district of the city, where they were kindly permitted to dwell, that they might be more readily found when wanted—for even king John himself, in a time of pressing necessity, did not scruple to drag a Hebrew of reputed wealth from among his brethren to extort a considerable sum of money. The Jew in vain pleaded his inability to meet his monarch's demand, and one tooth was commanded to be extracted daily until he should consent to realize the amount required. At last, after losing several of his teeth, "his teeth of wisdom," as a lord of the presence wittily observed, "prompted him to disgorge a portion of the filthy lucre wherewith his usurious appetite had been pampered."

It was early in the forenoon of a summer's day, that two gallants, walking arm in arm, turned suddenly and cautiously into the street, well known as the dwelling place of the Jewish traders and money lenders. They appeared to be very apprehensive of being observed in such a suspicious and unfashionable quarter of the town, and no sooner had they lounged into the place than they hurried hastily forward. They were both youthful, and extremely modish in their attire—and many a grey Israelite, as they passed his poorly furnished stall or shop, winked knowingly at his neighbour; who as silently answered his sign by jocosely touching the empty palm of his left hand with the second finger of his right, thereby indicating that some pecuniary exigency had prompted the young gallants to visit their miserable quarters. A few minutes brought them to the habitation they sought, and the suspicions of the cunning Israelites were soon verified by their speech.

"Is this the den?" demanded one of the sparks, half retreating; the very odour of the ruinous fabric repelling, as it were, the refined essence of his gentility. "P faith is it," replied his companion, enjoying the expression of the other's disgust, "but 'L'apparence est trompeuse.'" "By my faith! thou'lt find this worthless casket containeth rare jewels. In, in, I pr'ythee, there's no time for bandying words now—Egad! need may drive us into a worse and more secure place than this, Basil, ere we die!" and tapping with his gold-headed baton at an inner door—"Saint Bridget grant the old sinner be in his cave of despair."

Agreeably to the impatience of the gallants, the door was quickly opened, and the "old sinner," in the form of a handsome, middle aged Jew, made his appearance. His olive complexion was shadowed by large black brows and a well trimmed beard. A black silk scalp covered the crown of his head, while his jetty hair hung on either side of his face in long crotchets or curls.

"Save ye, gentles," said he, saluting them respectfully, and having ushered them into a small, dark, and ill-furnished room, demanded their pleasure.

"Is not thy name Amalech?" asked the gallant who had acted the part of guide to his friend.

"The same."

"Then our errand is quickly told. Thou mayest readily premise that nothing short of dire necessity could have forced us to enter this infernal abode of darkness and desolation where thou art burrowed like a blind mole. Money, money, money, Amalech, we seek, and thou must provide for our wants, too, if thou robb'st thy brethren to make up the sum."

"What mayest thou want?" inquired the Jew; a slight tinge suffusing his dark countenance at the rude manner in which his succour was demanded.

"Neither more nor less than a hundred marks!" replied Basil. "I think, Montague," addressing his companion, "that will meet my present exigencies."

"A hundred marks!" repeated Amalech, thoughtfully, "'tis a round sum; but, suppose I should be able to procure it, what securities canst thou offer for the reimbursement and interest?"

These questions were as a matter of course expected, and promptly answered by Basil, who, after the discussion of a few preliminaries, executed a bond couched in terms and with considerations highly pleasurable to Amalech, and tending greatly to sweeten the bitter sneers and revilings of Montague; and both parties separated with mutual satisfaction.

A few months afterwards, Basil, with a gay and happy air, encountered his friend Montague lounging in Saint Paul's. To his eager inquiries, he replied, that the temporary embarrassments under which he had laboured had been happily removed by the seasonable loan from Amalech; that he had moreover fallen in love with a fair and wealthy heiress, had won her affections, and the reluctant consent of her father, to whom rumour had busily whispered divers tales of his gallantries and juvenile indiscretions. An earnest promise of future amendment, however, on his part, and the blushing irresistible intercession of his beloved and only daughter, had induced the father to promise he would consider of their wishes; which to the ardent lovers, was tantamount to an approval, as they enjoyed his tacit permission to meet as often as they pleased. But there was one speck, one solitary cloud in the bright horizon of his hopes: Basil had a rival, not in the affections of his adored Beatrice, but undoubtedly in the favour of his mistress's sire. In the undeviating correctness of his reformed life, however, he still firmly relied upon ultimately bearing away the prize against all opposition.

To attain this desired object he was compelled to be painfully circumspect; at the same time the reformed regularity of his life conduced greatly to the bettering of his fortune, and he now found himself in a condition to discharge the Jew's bond, and it was on this just errand he was bent, when unfortunately for Amalech, he met his quondam friend and ill-adviser Montague, who appeared to harbour an inveterate hatred towards Amalech and all his tribe.

He laughed at Basil's punctuality, and, by force of casuistry and the most poignant ridicule, dissuaded him from putting his honest intentions into execution.

It were bootless to detail the base, yet baseless arguments wherewith he fortified the wavering resolution of Basil, or the dishonourable means they employed to deprive the Jew of his money and his right of claim. Suffice it to say, that they conspired together, obtained the uncanceled bond, and left the duped Amalech without resource.

Basil certainly had some compunctious feelings, but the heartless Montague bade him remember that Amalech was a Jew and a heretick; and that, as good catholics, they were performing a duty in persecuting him by every means in their power.

Amalech did not sit down quietly under his loss, but took every opportunity of remonstrating with Basil upon the cruelty and ingratitude of his conduct, and perhaps Basil would have listened to him had not Montague invariably been at hand to smother his qualms of conscience in his caustick derision.

It was on one occasion of this kind, when Amalech's intracies were only answered by the bitterest scorn and the most cutting sarcasm, that the Jew, stung by Basil's ungenerous conduct, solemnly vowed to be avenged, and abruptly quitted the scoffing gallants with a look that effectually chilled their forced merriment.

A tavern, however, was at hand, and thither they sought for refuge from every obtrusive feeling of care.

In the height of their debauch, Gilbert D'Orlais, Basil's rival chanced to enter. The most overstrained courtesy was invariably observed by both; and the fumes of generous wine having now exhilarated the spirits of Basil, he was more than usually cordial.

At a late hour they quitted the tavern, only to repair to an adjacent gambling house; for Gilbert, with a careless, playful sort of daring, had challenged Basil to the hazardous contest. He appeared at first inclined to waive the offer, but his evil genius, Montague, vowed his dear friend should play with any man, and the too pliant disposition of Basil yielded. As they were on the point of entering the temple of chance, Basil who was in the rear, felt some one pull him slightly by the cloak, and turning round, he beheld Amalech. The Jew was about to address him, when the inebriated Basil set up a loud laugh, and called to his companions that they might participate with him in the pleasure of sporting with the money-lender. But the intended butt of their rude jests had vanished.

One hour afterwards beheld the weak and irresolute Basil the pale victim of despair.

He was utterly ruined. His rival had stripped him of every mark he possessed in the world; and his dear friend Montague had left him to his gloomy reflections.

The next day Basil was the inmate of a cell in Ludgate.* Hope now seemed forever banished from his breast.

"That accursed Jew," cried he, "is the demon that hath worked this evil chance. He vowed vengeance, and he hath taken it. 'Farewell, Beatrice, and farewell, life; for life is nothing worth deprived of thy smiles. Oh! how will my rival triumph in the ruin he hath made. That Jew and he have conspired to overwhelm me, and I am lost.'" And the thought that Gilbert D'Orlais would win his mistress, solely by his own indiscretion, almost drove him to distraction.

In two days there was to be a grand fete given by Beatrice's father. Basil's absence of course could not be excused, or pass unobserved, and he had no doubt but that his rival would take advantage of so favourable an opportunity to misrepresent him and improve his own views. His creditors were deaf to his promises and solicitations, and his friend Montague was no where to be found at this crisis, when advice and assistance would have been most valuable.

The morning of the intended fete arrived. Basil, heartless and desponding, was sitting brooding over his luckless fate, when a slight noise at the iron grating of his cell caused him to turn his head in that direction.

The swarthy features of Amalech met his sight; and Basil imagined that he saw a bitter smile of pleasure illumine the Hebrew's countenance.

"Come in," said he, in a hollow and despairing voice—"come in—my suspicions are now verified—come in, Jew, and feast upon the misery thou hast wrought. What farther vengeance dost thou seek, thou heartless monster?"

Amalech stood before the dejected Basil, gazing stedfastly upon him, with a calm and unruffled brow.

* At that period a prison for debtors.

"Christian!" cried he, in a stern and solemn voice, "thou hast wronged me without provocation—nay, I held out my hand to thee in the time of need—I raised thee up—and thou didst smite me. Returning evil for good: can I then wonder that a christian who thus openly despises the dictates of his own religion, will respect mine? 'What, tho' I am a Jew, think'st thou I have not the feelings of a man as well as thee? And shall I not avenge an insult when chance places mine enemy within my grasp?'"

"Fiend of hell!" exclaimed the maddened Basil, "and is thy vengeance not sufficiently glutted, but thou must come to taunt me in the dungeon thy villany hath provided? Away! or, by heaven! I will strike thee to the earth!"

But Amalech was unmoved at his anger, and, showing no signs of retreat, the exasperated Basil raised his hand to execute his threat—and the next moment the vigorous arm of the Jew had laid him at his feet, unharmed, and with as much facility as if he had been a mere child.

"Foolish and impetuous youth!" said Amalech, "when wilt thou learn to be guided by reason and justice? But I will teach thee a lesson that, while thou hast life, shall never be forgotten. We shall meet again!" and so saying, he hastily quitted the abashed and discomfited Basil.

A few minutes had scarcely elapsed when the keeper of the prison entered, and politely informed Basil that he was free, at the same time placing in his hands a weighty bag of marks.

"What!—who! whence comes this timely—this precious aid?" demanded the astounded Basil.

"Thy friend, sir, has discharged thy debts, and paid the fees," replied the keeper. "Know'st thou not—"

"Friend! what friend?"

"He who just now quitted thee."

"Impossible!—the Jew!—heavens! what have I done?" exclaimed Basil, and the tears filled his eyes, as he clasped his hands together, and rushed forth from the prison.

The fair Beatrice, arrayed in smiles, was dispensing pleasure and delight to the gay and motley group who were fast gathering together in her father's hospitable halls.

Gilbert D'Orlais was there; but Beatrice was insensible to his gallant attentions; for her joy was chilled by the absence of Basil, though hope still whispered to her beating heart that her lover would momentarily arrive.

The ball was, however, about to commence, and Basil had not made his appearance.

"Where, in the name of wonder," asked Beatrice's father, "is our young friend, Basil?"

Gilbert D'Orlais, with a hypocritical mournfulness in his countenance, advanced, and, with a well feigned hesitation, began, "I am sorry, sir, to inform thee that—"

"Basil is here!" exclaimed Beatrice, eagerly interrupting him, "yonder he comes!"

Gilbert shrunk back in speechless horror and dismay. His trembling limbs appeared scarcely able to support him. But the die was cast, and escape was vain.

Basil, on quitting the prison, had lost no time in seeing Amalech, and pouring forth the overflowing gratitude of his contrite heart. And to his amazement the Jew unfolded to him the particulars of a deep laid plot, which had been contrived by his rival in conjunction with the perfidious Montague, to ruin him. He had, moreover, obtained such unanswerable testimony of the conspirators' villainy, that D'Orlais and Montague precipitately fled from a public exposure; while the fortunate Basil speedily recovered the bulk of his property—was blessed by the hand and heart of the lovely Beatrice—and remembered, with gratitude, the Jew's Revenge.

LOVE AND REASON.

From the Boston Bulletin.

Old chronicles tell, that Love was originally destined to be the companion of Joy; but that certain pranks perpetrated by mortals, occasioned a change in the decree of Jupiter, and a new partner for young Love was in consequence appointed, whose name was Sorrow. The experience of mankind in all ages proves this record to be no fable—and so did that of Mr. Philip Dubois, a young gentleman of Flemish extraction, whose parents grew opulent upon the avails of a liquor establishment kept near the town pump in Cornhill some thirty years ago. Master Philip, as he waxed into manhood, was found to possess uncommon sensibility, and much tenderness of nerve. He had a soul extremely susceptible of the softer emotions, and an eye highly accommodating in all the necessary expression thereof—indeed, at certain times it was peculiarly moist and languishing. This shows the beneficial effect of novel reading. Sir Charles Grandison had been his model, and Pamela and Clarissa his constant companions: so that the very essence of refinement mingled with all his thoughts, and the most delicately fashioned phraseology flowed from his tongue. The lads of his age kept aloof from his company—he was so nice! And the misses that came to sip tea with his sister, looked upon him as a prodigy of gentility; while the young gentleman himself turned away his scrupulous countenance from their gaze—not from any unwillingness to be admired; but because he perceived symptoms of mortality lurking about their persons, altogether inconsistent with his pictured images of the sex—they absolutely ate and drank—practices never known to be performed by the super-human beauties, and transcendently pure heroines of genuine novelists!

But Philip was deeply imbued with a hope, yes, a confidence, that those benevolent powers who controul the mysterious operations of love, would one day direct him to that happy point in his fortunes, where he should encounter the being for whom his affections had long been treasured. His dreams, by night and by day, could not be for nothing. There was an angelick form continually flitting before his vision, and a pair of "cerulean" eyes beaming upon him through the mistiness of the future. Poetry began to concoct his cranium, and rhymes to couple themselves in all the ardour of smitten expectation. His conceptions were of green vales and velvet lawns, and sunny slopes, and fragrant bowers—with a presiding deity to scatter charms around the magic perspective. Thus lapsed the lonely hours, till one Monday morning, the first of May. Mr. Dubois—the young ladies called him Mr. Doughboy for shortness—undertook a very early perambulation, understanding such to be the custom of creation's fairer half on every recurrence of that cheerful anniversary—for the gathering of twigs and the cropping of dandelions. Philip had now reached his twentieth year—and the road to Malden. As he traipsed the road side, soundly wrapped in study and his best blue surtout, a being crossed his path—the exact reality of all his long cherished fancies. Heavens! but he could not speak:—

"A wicker basket on her white arm hung"— filled with "green and yellow" herbage—brush and buttercups. Agape with amazement, his eyes followed the sylph as she bounded over the five barred fences and wove her way through the tangled pines and stunted oaks that constituted a sort of forest in the back ground. He followed as by instinct—the fairy shape and the blue optics—the jack o' lanterns of his imagination—leading the way. Through brambles and underwood and bogs did he trace the enchantress, until she disappeared in a cottage, before whose door was a hillock of leather parings, smoking in the sun's broad glare.

Here was a damper! Could that seraph appertain in any sense to a shoemaker? No—it was impossible. Perfectly entranced by the vision and overwhelmed with romantick anticipations, Philip slunk into the woods, and stood staring at the cottage in a most vehement revery. Nothing transpired for the space of two tedious hours—save the chirping of some adventurous bird, or the lowing of distant cattle, grumbling at their fare upon the stingy meadow. But true love never tires—and, like charity, it suffereth long, and is modest. Doubtless, he would have remained rooted at the foot of a rotten birch until this very day, had not a wagon appeared, in which were seated his fascinating fair one, and an elderly gentleman in a grey coat with huge buttons. At a very moderate pace they jogged along the road toward the metropolis—and Philip followed, keeping in view, though on foot, without any sort of difficulty. Thus he trudged behind, until the precious deposit was lodged in a shop in Back street (so then called) of which he took note and straightway departed homeward.

Next morning—after a series of most delicious nightmares—Philip Dubois, resolved on bringing his romantick adventure to a crisis, sought out the little tenement aforesaid. It was a "ten footer," and shoes hung at the window through which he beheld the magnet of his soul. With that trepidation so easily conceivable by lovers, he lifted the latch. There she was! The very consummation of his purest visions! Thinking she might recognize his features or his figure, he approached with a trembling smirk, and faltered an interrogatory concerning her health, to which she gave a bewitching reply. He knew not what next to utter; but the shoes on the shelves furnished an expedient, and he hazarded an inquiry touching their prices. With a grace beyond description, the little fairy attended upon her extraordinary customer—and while engaged in this duty, Philip endeavoured to remind her of the events of the preceding day; of which she seemed to possess some vague recollection. That she did not confess more, was attributed to her innocence and modesty. But, with one party at least, the shoes were forgotten—and Philip actually talked of love—he even made protestations of eternal fidelity—and, bowing, prepared to take his leave, with a promise to call in the evening. As he was retiring covered with blushes, she beckoned him back—he obeyed with renewed hope—"Sir," said she, "if you won't take these shoes at seven-and-sixpence, you shall have them for six-and-nindepence!"

O, Avarice! thou smotherer of all the finer emotions of our bosoms!—Philip Dubois has ever since remained an inveterate bachelor, sighing and snivelling over the depravity of human nature!

MISCELLANY.

PETER THE GREAT'S SUMMER GARDEN.

From Hone's Table Book.

Schrader, a celebrated Swedish gardener, was employed by the czar to execute a plan he had approved of, for the gardens of his summer palace. The work was already far advanced, and among the different parts that were finished, were two large divisions adjoining to the principal avenue, opposite to each other, enclosed with a hedge, and covered with turf. The czar, who came often to see the progress of his undertaking, on observing the two grass plots, conceived the design of converting this place of mere amusement into a kind of school. "I am very well satisfied," said the czar to the gardener, "with your performance, as well as with the variety and beauty of the several divisions that are finished: however, you must not be angry if I change the form of these two spots of ground. I should wish that the persons who walk in the garden might find the means of cultivating their minds; but in what way can we contrive this?"

"Sire," said the gardener, "I know no other than to put books on the seats, protected from the rain, that those who walk in the garden may read when they sit down."

"This is not far from my meaning," said the czar, laughing, "but books in a publick garden! that will never do. Another idea has struck me. I should like to erect statues here, representing the different subjects of Æsop's fables. For this purpose the ground must be differently laid out, that the division of the several parts may correspond with the fables I am speaking of."

Schrader executed his orders with all possible intelligence and despatch, and much to the satisfaction of the emperor.

The garden consisted of four squares, with walks in the form of labyrinths leading to them. The angles were ornamented with figures, representing different subjects from Æsop's fables, with a jet d'eau concealed in a little basin, under moss or ruins, and surrounded with shells brought from lake Ilmen, or that of Novogorod. Most of the animals were as large as life, and of lead, gilt. They ejected water from their mouths, according to their various attitudes. In this way the walks were ornamented with sixty fables, forming as many jets d'eau. At the entrance was a statue of Æsop, likewise of lead, and gilt.

The czar very naturally supposed that few people would be able to discover the meaning of these figures, and that fewer would comprehend the instruction they were designed to convey. His majesty therefore ordered a post to be placed near each of them, and to these posts sheets of tin were fastened, on which the fables and their morals were written in the Russian language.

This place was the czar's favourite walk; in its shades he often passed whole hours, recreating himself among these creatures of his creation.

This garden was afterwards nearly destroyed by a terrible tempest and inundation. The trees contained were torn up by the roots, and the green hedges and figures of animals damaged, either by the fall of the timber or by the elements. The trees were raised, put into their places again, and propped up; but as it was not possible to repair the injuries done to the figures, the czar's "summer garden" ceased to be a "garden of instruction."

FAIRIES.

From the London Magazine.

For the earliest account we have of the English Fairies, we are indebted to the Imperial Chancellor Gervase of Tilbury, who gives the following particulars respecting the fairy mythology of England in the thirteenth century:—

There is (says he,) in the county of Gloucester a forest abounding in boars, stags and every species of game that England produces. In a very grovy lawn of this forest, there is a little mount, rising in a point to the height of man, on which knights and other hunters are used to ascend when fatigued with heat and thirst, to seek some relief for their wants. The nature of the place and the business is, however, such, that who ever ascends the mount must go quite alone. When alone, he was to say, as if speaking to some other person, 'I thirst,' and immediately there would appear a cupbearer, in an elegant dress, with a cheerful countenance, bearing in his out-stretched hand a large horn adorned with gold and gems, as was the custom among the ancient English. In the cup, nectar of an unknown but most delicious flavour was presented, and when it was drunk, heat and weariness fled from the glowing body, so that one would be thought ready to undertake toil, instead of having toiled. Moreover, when the nectar was taken, the servant presented a towel to the drinker, to wipe his mouth with, and then, having performed his office, he waited neither for recompense for his services, nor for question nor inquiry.

"This frequent and daily action had, for a very long period of old times, taken place among the ancient people, till one day a knight of that city, when out hunting, went thither, and having called for drink and gotten the horn, did not, as was the custom, and as in good manners he should have done return it to the cupbearer, but kept it for his own use. But the illustrious Earl of Gloucester, when he learned the truth of the matter, condemned the robber to death, and presented the horn to the most excellent King Henry the elder, lest he should be thought to have approved of such wickedness, if he had added the rapine of another to the store of his private property."

BURMAN THIEVES.

The Burmans used to approach, on dark nights, on their hands and knees, and often crawled close up to the sentinels, before they were discovered; sometimes they carried off knapsacks and arms, and went away with their booty unperceived.

A laughable instance of their dexterity took place in the Great Pagoda, on the night of the 2nd July. The soldiers, for several nights previous, had missed some arms, although a sentry was before the door, and they generally slept with their firelocks by their sides. This evening, every one was on the alert, extra sentries were posted, and every precaution taken to secure the marauders. When, on a sudden, the alarm being given, the officer on duty, who was reposing in one of the little temples, ran to the door and inquired what had occurred,—but hearing that only a knapsack had been found in the grass, and that no other traces existed of the depredators, he turned round to lie down again, and, to his infinite astonishment, found his bed had vanished! A light was in the room, and a servant sleeping near it, yet, notwithstanding, the impudent thieves had also ransacked a basket, and escaped with the contents! We since heard that the robbers were Burman soldiers belonging to the camp at Kumaroot, whither they carried their spoils. They certainly deserved infinite credit for the ingenuity they manifested, and for the manner in which they turned the laugh against us, by showing, that the very moment they chose for their depredations, was one when a strict search was making after them.

ALBANY:

EDITORIAL DIARY.

June 14. Saints Basil, Rufinus, Valerius, Methodius, Doctmael, Nennus, and Psalmodius.—1628, the government of Plymouth colony caused three Englishmen to be put to death, for the murder of an Indian, near Providence.—1645, the battle of Naseby was decided this day, in which the royalists under Charles I. were defeated and completely routed by the parliament troops under Fairfax. The king lost all his artillery and ammunition; his cabinet with all his letters fell into the hands of his enemies; and the contents were afterwards published to the world by the parliament, which contributed perhaps not a little to his subsequent sufferings, by exposing his fraudulent schemes of usurpation.—1801, Benedict Arnold, the notorious apostate, died at his lodging, Gloucester-place, London.

June 15. Saints Vitus, Crescentia, Modestus, Landelin, Bernard of Menthon, Vauge, and Gregory Lewis Barbadiago. Saint Vitus was a Sicilian martyr under Dioclesian. In the superstitious ages, fowls were offered on this festival, to avert the disease known by the name of Saint Vitus's Dance. It is not exactly known how the disease acquired this name. It is pronounced by medical men to be an affection of the limbs, resulting from nervous irritation, closely connected with a disordered state of the stomach, bowels, and other organs of the abdomen. Among the ignorant, a belief also prevailed that, as on Saint Swithun's day, rain will be repeated for a certain number of subsequent days. It may easily prove true, if the present showery weather may be taken for a conjecture of what is to come.—1775, two days before the memorable battle of Bunker's hill, the Continental Congress, then in session at Philadelphia, unanimously appointed George Washington to the chief command of the American army. He accepted the appointment with a diffidence strikingly characteristic of his prudence, and took command at Cambridge, the 2d day of the July subsequent.—1825, the corner stone of the new bridge over the Thames at London, was laid with great ceremony, by John Garratt, esq. lord mayor of London.

June 16. Saint Quirinus; Saint John Francis Regis; Saint Fargeau; Saint Aurelian.—1722, John Churchill, the great duke of Marlborough died at Windsor Lodge, in a state of idiocy. His history is too well known to need repetition at present.—1806, great eclipse of the sun.

June 17. Saint Alban; Saint Eutolph; Saint Ayy; Saint Molingus; and Saint Prior, hermit. Saint Alban was the first martyr for christianity in Britain. He was born about the middle of the third century at Verulam, near the present site of the city of Saint Albans, in Hertfordshire. He was descended from a pagan family of power and distinction, and educated in their belief. While young he went to Rome and served seven years in the armies of the emperor Dioclesian. On his return home, he became a convert to the christian faith, which he sealed by martyrdom in the year of our Lord 303. The particulars of his life are very little known, except through the ecclesiastical history of Venerable Bede. These as may be expected are interlarded with some of the miraculous legends of those superstitious times. "On his way to execution," says father Bede, "he was stopped by a river, over which was a bridge, so thronged with spectators that it was impossible to cross it; when the saint, as we are told, lifting up his eyes to heaven, the stream was miraculously divided, and afforded a passage for himself and a thousand more persons. This wonderful event converted the executioner on the spot, who threw away his drawn sword, and falling at Saint Alban's feet, desired that he might have the honour to die with him; and thus the execution being delayed until another person could be got to perform the office, Saint Alban walked up to a neighbouring hill, where he prayed for water to quench his thirst, and a fountain of water sprung up under his feet. Here he was beheaded; but the executioner is said to have been a signal example of divine vengeance; for as soon as he gave the fatal stroke, his eyes dropped out of his head."

Saint Alban was an eminent mason, and was employed to environ the city of Verulam with a wall, by the Roman governor Carausius, and also to build him a splendid palace. To reward him for his diligence in erecting these works, he was made steward of the governor's household, and appointed Grand Master of masons, to whom Carausius had given a charter to hold a general assembly. Under his patronage lodges were regularly formed, and the rights of freemasonry properly practised. About five hundred years after the martyrdom of Saint Alban, Offa, king of Mercia, built a monastery in honour of him, on the very place where he suffered, which was called at first Holmhurst, but afterwards more appropriately Saint Albans. This edifice was afterwards converted into a parochial church, and in that capacity is even now in existence. In the year 1257, about nine hundred and fifty four years after his death, some sheets of lead containing relics were found, while repairing the church, and a thick plate of lead over them, upon which was engraved the following inscription:

"In hoc mausoleo inventum est
Venerabile corpus Sancti Albani, Proto Martyris Anglorum."

—1774, the memorable battle of Bunker's hill was fought. In the night preceding this event, a redoubt was thrown up on the brow of the hill which is now known by that renowned name, and the British in the city were not a little surprised to find in the morning a fortification going on without point blank shot of their cannon. The batteries of the British were immediately opened on them, and an incessant fire kept up, until they despaired of driving them from their work by any other means than a general assault. A detachment of about three thousand men went over from Boston about noon, and immediately commenced an attack upon the Americans, and were repulsed. They were driven to a second attack, and were a second time repulsed. A third attempt was with still more difficulty made to rally the panic-struck British to the third assault, when the ammunition of the Americans became exhausted, and a retreat was ordered. It was effected with but little loss, but that little must be remembered with the most reverential feelings, for the brave, the eloquent, the pure-spirited, and the beautiful WARREN was of the number. His biography, compiled from the best authorities expressly for our columns, will be found on our third page. During the heat of the contest, the flourishing town of Charlestown was set on fire by the order of general Gage, by which private property to the value of more than half a million of dollars was destroyed.—1815, the Algerine frigate Misoda of 46 guns was captured by the United States' frigate Guerriere of 44 guns, after a running fight of twenty-five minutes, in which the Algerine had thirty killed, and the American only four wounded.

June 18. Saints Marcus and Marcellinus; Saint Marina; Saint Elizabeth; and Saint Amand.—1777, Philadelphia was evacuated by the British army.—1803, Arthur Murphy esq. author of many excellent dramatic and miscellaneous works, died.—1812, war was declared by the congress of the United States against Great Britain.—1815, the battle of Waterloo, which decided the fate of France, and terminated the power of Napoleon, was fought this day. The carnage of this battle is but feebly repaid by the change of masters which it gave to France. Yet Wellington and his associates in arms as well as in purpose, have made themselves fat with the fruits of the contest, while the survivors of those who won them are many of them destitute and despised. Not so the thousands who fell. What is it to them who reigns, so they but die, and find a glorious refuge from their toils?

And Ardenne waves above them her green leaves,
Dewy with Nature's tear-drops, as they pass,
Grieving, if aught inanimate e'er grieves,
Over the unreturning brave,—alas!
Ere evening to be trodden like the grass
Which now beneath them, but above shall grow:
In its next verdure, when this fiery mass
Of living valour, rolling on the foe
And burning with high hope, shall moulder cold and low.

Last morn beheld them full of lusty life,
Last eve in beauty's circle proudly gay,
The midnight brought the signal sound of strife,
The morn the marshalling to arms,—the day
Battle's magnificently stern array!
The thunder clouds close o'er it, which when rent,
The earth is covered thick with other clay,
Which her own clay shall cover, heaped and pent,
Rider and horse—friend—foe—in one red battle-ment

LYRON.

June 19. Saints Gervais, Protolus, Bonifacio of Russia, Juliana Falconieri, and Beolatus.—1215, the celebrated Magna Charta was signed on compulsion, by King John, at Runnymede, near Windsor.—1532, Pizarro, after completing a battle in which more than four thousand Peruvians were killed, and not a single Spaniard lost his life, made prisoner of the Inca, Atahualpa. He soon discovering the ruling passion of the Spaniards, offered to fill the apartment in which he was confined, with vessels of gold as high as he could reach. The room was twenty-two feet long, and seventeen wide. The proposal was eagerly accepted, and a line drawn to mark the height to which the treasure was to reach. Atahualpa immediately sent messages to Cuzco, Quito, and other places where the greatest quantity of gold was amassed, and his orders for the collection were promptly executed. After the vessels of gold were collected according to the terms, Pizarro compelled him to have them melted down so as to fill the room with solid gold. This immense sum, nearly seven millions of dollars, did not satisfy the brutal Spaniard, and the wretched Atahualpa was strangled at the stake. Pizarro, to complete the measure of his shameless brutality, gave him a magnificent funeral, and wore mourning for him. Such charms has hypocrisy.—1781, General Greco was repulsed in his attack on Ninety-Six, with the loss of one hundred and fifty men. Five years after this event, the same day of the month, he died at his estate not far from Savannah. His death was occasioned by what is familiarly termed a stroke of the sun.—1813, the British frigate Junon was attacked by the gun boats in the Chesapeake, and compelled to leave her station.—1815, an Algerine brig of 22 guns was chased on shore on the coast of Spain by Commodore Decatur's squadron, and protected by the Spaniards.—1820, Sir Joseph Banks, president of the royal society died, aged 77.

June 20. Saints Silverius, Gobian, Edburge, and Bain. The church of England also observe this day in honour of the removal of the relics of Edward, king of the west Saxons, from Wareham to Salisbury, three years after his murder by order of Elfrida.—1629, a nunnery of French Ursulines, was founded at Quebec. Madame de la Petrie, a pious catholic lady, devoting her person and fortune to this religious design, came over with three Ursuline nuns, attended by Le Jeune, superior of the Jesuit mission in Canada. Entering the city they were greeted with the acclamations of the people, and forthwith proceeded to the church, where Te Deum was solemnly sung for their arrival.—1671, governor Berkley of Virginia, in his official report makes use of this characteristic language:—"I thank God we have no free schools, nor printing; and I hope we shall not have them these hundred years. For learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them and libels against the best governments. God keep us from both." On the appointment of Lord Effingham to the government, in 1683, he was ordered agreeably to the prayer of Sir William Berkley, "to allow no person to use a printing press on any occasion whatever."—1751, on this day a fitch of bacon was claimed at Dunmow, Essex, England, by a man and his wife, who had the same delivered to them as a right according to ancient custom, on the ground that they had not quarrelled, nor had either repented, nor had one offended the other from the day of their marriage.—1813, the Creek Indians began their acts of hostility to the government of the United States by massacring those of their tribe who were known to be on friendly terms with the whites.

TABLE TALK.

Young to wear Breeches. A girl in man's attire, was taken from the Bowery theatre lately. On her examination it appeared that she had been driven from her home by the cruelty of a step father, and the better to make her way through life, changed her dress. She had lived out in the capacity of a servant boy, had been a clerk, followed boating on the canal, driving team, &c. She states, that situated as she is, without friends, she prefers her present dress as she is far more healthy than she formerly was and is enabled the better to gain her livelihood.—Racee Show. Married, in Russia, on the 29th ult. Councell, printer, employed in the Charleston Courier office.—Eels Caught. Married, in Cornwall, the 27th inst. by the Rev. J. Aspell, Mr. Benjamin Parkhill to Mrs. Lois Eells.—Orthography. The Master's written instruction to John Wright, to spell write right.—I hold a right to write to you, John Wright, you do not write write right when you write it write. You must not write write write, neither must you write it rite. If you are a good write, you will write write write, which will be right, so if you wish to write the word rite right, you must neither write it wright, write, nor right. The sense is known by spelling right—I will give you an example, John Wright: I write, you are right, he is a wright, we have a right, they have a rite. I have here spelt it all right. Now, John Wright, write write right.—Coy after Marriage. Married, in Tunbridge, (Vt.) Mr. John Coy to Miss Matilda Thompson.

OLD FELLOWS. A recent application to the legislature of Maryland for an act incorporating the grand lodge of Odd Fellows in that state, has given rise to some speculation and inquiry as to the origin and nature of that institution. Its name has no similitude with which we are acquainted. It stands singularly odd amid all the appellations which have distinguished other orders and associations. We have heard of the Ugly Club, the Club of Old Backs, of the society of Gapers, of Loungers, &c.; but as a distinctive appellation applicable to an order of men, gravely associated together, for other than convivial objects, we believe the Odd Fellows stand alone. It is therefore natural to inquire if such a society exists, what is its nature, tendency, or design. If, as has been distinctly avowed, and of which there can be no doubt, it offers no sacrifices at the altar of Bacchus, offends no rule, moral or divine, and interferes in no government or establishment of any kind, what does it aim to accomplish? What does it profess as its object? The history of most institutions of long standing is generally obscure. Like the origin of nations, it is too frequently buried in fable or lost in antiquity. That the institution of Odd Fellows originated in Europe, and has been transmitted to these United States, admits we believe of very little doubt. We know that several societies of this description exist in London, Liverpool, Birmingham, Manchester, and also in several parts of Ireland. Within a few years past a grand procession exceeding 3000 made its appearance in Manchester, on some public festival, and an oration was delivered explanatory of the principles of the order, and was received by the assembled multitude, who did not belong to the society, with great approbation. In France this institution is well known. Paris can boast of several societies of this description. In our own country it has been extensively patronized, for in almost every state in the union, particularly Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland and New-York, its members are numerous and respectable, and have founded many lodges. At the city of Washington, the seat of the general government, it exists we understand with great splendour. Many of the members of congress have been admitted into it, and testify much regard for the institution.

In the year 1818, a society was formed in the city of New-York, shortly after another was established in Pleasant Valley, Dutchess county, and a third in the year 1824, in the city of Albany: Since which the number has rapidly increased in this state. A grand lodge has been formed for the whole United States, and of which Mr. Thomas Wiley is grand sire. The order consists of thirteen degrees, one of which was created by Henry, Prince of Lorraine, another was derived from Lusitania, a third from the Suevia, and a fourth from the Moors. Its existence may be traced from the historical documents for more than four hundred years, but it doubtless existed for ages before. Thus much for the origin of the order. We do not profess however to give more than a brief, rapid, and therefore imperfect sketch of it, knowing that it will be filled up in a more full and perfect manner hereafter.

Of the principles of the institution we shall barely remark, that temperance, sobriety, friendship and charity are among the most conspicuous. It deprecates all those vices which enervate the body and enfeeble the energies of the mind, it encourages piety and brotherly love, it cultivates science and learning, and in fine, it is the friend and advocate of the whole circle of those virtues which humanize the heart and enlighten the understanding. Its oddity consists in its excelling in all those qualities which grace humanity. It is therefore emphatically the friend of man.

These are the general objects of the institution. Its tendency and design are therefore purely moral, and cannot be justly obnoxious to censure or criticism. On this indeed, must rest its claim to future patronage and respect, and we indulge the belief that while it continues on this basis, its claim will not be rejected.

JOHN H. HALL respectfully informs his friends and the public that he has removed to No. 454, South Market street, three doors north of the museum, where he continues to execute engravings of Books, Fancy, and Toy Cuts, Signs, Seals, and Society Emblems; Newspaper and Handbill Heads and Ornaments; Card Ornaments and Book Vignettes, in all their variety; Engravings of Public Buildings; New Inventions; Patent Machinery; and Devices for different Mechanical Professions and Arts. Albany Nov 5 1828 159

PARODY.

BY HERODOTUS NIB, ESQ.

I'd be an editor, mewed in a garret,
Where cobwebs in dusty magnificence hang,
With a steady arm chair and no rival to share it,
And a hat full of politicks, verses, and slang.
I'd never fret about talents or merit,
I'd never cowskin, nor challenge, nor flout;
I'd be an editor mewed in a garret,
Ready to wear my coat either side out.
I'd be an editor,—I'd be an editor,
Luck to the coat, be it inside or out!

O, I would pilfer the wit of my betters,
Scissors should minister all to my need;
Then would I look like a rare man of letters,
If duns did not warrant the title indeed.
He who has wealth must be watchful and wary;
He who has office, look out for his nose;
I'd be an editor, here, high and airy,
Rocked in sublimity—when the wind blows.
I'd be an editor,—I'd be an editor,
Rocked in my garret, and safe in my nose.

What though you tell me that more kicks than dollars
Fall to the venders of typical lore,
Yet are the purses of gentlemen scholars
Free to the bottom,—and who can ask more?
Some in life's winter may toil to discover
Favours from fortune which never will rust,
I'd be an editor living above her,
Seeking for nothing but glory and—trust!
I'd be an editor,—deuse take the creditor,—
Writing for glory and printing on trust!

PROSPECT HILL.

Far, far away is Prospect Hill,
Where I oft have strayed at noontide still,
Oft in that silent and sultry hour,
In the panting coolness of its bower,
Have mused on the golden visions which then
First opened like day to my fancy's ken.

Far, far away is Prospect Hill,
Where the lonely plaint of the whippoorwill
Came up on the breath of the evening air,
That whispered in silvery musick there,
As I trod its turf by the moon's pale light
And gazed on the sky of a summer night.

Lost to my sight is Prospect Hill,
Lost to my ear is the clack of the mill,
And the gush of the stream whose joyous flow
Spoke peace to the sleeping vale below,
And lost are the mountains capped with blue,
Which dim in the distance met my view.

But memory still revisits the scene,
The forest bower, the rock, and the stream.
The loved ones who lingered with me there,—
She brings them all, unchanged and fair;
And never, Oh never shall that bright spot—
Or the friends that loved it, be forgot.

INDIAN INVOCATION.

BY REV. J. W. EASTBURN.

Spirit! thou Spirit of subtlest air,
Whose power is upon the brain,
When wonderful shapes, and dread and fair,
As the film from the eyes at thy bidding flies,
To sight and sense are plain!

Thy whisper creeps where leaves are stirred;
Thou sighs: in woodland gale;

Where waters are gushing thy voice is heard;
And when stars are bright, at still midnight,
Thy symphonies prevail!

Where the forest ocean, in quick commotion,
Is waving to and fro,
Thy form is seen, in the masses green,
Dimly to come and go.
From thy covert peeping, where thou layest sleeping,
Beside the brawling brook,
Thou art seen to wake, and thy flight to take,
Fleet from thy lonely nook.

Where the moon beam has kissed the sparkling tide,
In thy mantle of mist thou art seen to glide,
Far o'er the blue waters melting away,
On the distant billow, as on a pillow,
Thy form to lay.

Where the small clouds of even are wreathing in heaven,
Their garland of roses
O'er the purple and gold, whose hangings enfold
The hall that incloses
The couch of the sun, whose empire is done,—
There thou art smiling,
For thy away is begun,—thy shadowy way,
The senses beguiling,
When the light fades away;
And thy vapour of mystery o'er nature ascending,
The heaven and the earth,
The things that have birth,
And the embryos that float in the future, is blending.

From the land on whose shores the billows break,
The sounding waves of the mighty lake;
From the land where boundless meadows be,
Where the buffalo ranges wild and free;
With silvery coat, in his little isle,
Where the beaver plies his ceaseless toil;
The land where pigmy forms abide,
Thou ledest thy train at the even tide;
And the wings of the wind are left behind,
So swift through the pathless air they glide.

Then to the chief who has fasted long,
When the chains of his slumber are heavy and strong,
Spirit! thou comest; he lies as dead,
His weary lids are with heaviness weighed;
But his soul is abroad on the hurricane's pinion,
Where foes are met in the rush of fight,
In the shadowy world of thy dominion,
Conquering and slaying, till morning light!

Then shall the hunter who waits for thee,
The land of the game rejoicing see;
Through the leafless wood, o'er the frozen flood,
And the trackless snows, his spirit goes,
Along the sheeted plain,
Where the hermit bear, in his sullen lair,
Keeps his long fast till the winter hath past,
And the boughs have budded again.
Spirit of dreams! all thy visions are true;
Who the shadow hath seen, he the substance shall view.

TELLING THE DREAM.

BY W. G. CROSBY.

'T is a most beauteous night! Ianthe, come!
Wilt thou walk forth! Oh! I am sick at heart
Of this gay revelry. Its busy hum
Falls heavy on mine ear. I cannot laugh
With these light hearted laughers, and mine eye
Is wearied with gazing. Let me fling
Thy mantle round thee.

Is 't not beautiful!

The radiance of this starry sky! How pale
And lustreless are all we've left behind,
Compared with its bright jewelry! Perchance
Chaste Dian holds her festival to-night.
See, how she smiles! On such an eve as this,
So the tale runs, she left her home in heaven,
Lured thence to meet upon the Lætanian hill
Her shepherd boy, and placed upon his lips
The kiss of immortality! Poor youth!
He only dreamed of bliss. On such a night,
The love crazed Sappho poured her latest song,
Upon Leucate's height, and swan-like, died.
She dreamed—but dreamed too madly! And perchance,
On such a night, the Roman Antony
Threw off the crown and purple, and gave up
Glory, dominion for a woman's smile!

He was a dreaming madman—was he not,
Ianthe, thus to fling his all away,
For woman's smile?

Come, rest within this bower,
And I will tell thee, though thy lips may chide,
And call me "dreaming boy." Yes I have dreamed—
Perchance am dreaming now; but thou shalt hear.

I had lain down to slumber on a bank
Sprinkled with violets. The plaintive moan
Of far off waters, mingling with the hum
Of thousand busy insects, gathering in
Each its own store of sweets, filling the air
With melody, spread its sweet influence
O'er my lulled senses, and methought that I
Was wandering here with thee! 'T was strange, Ianthe!
But then the time, the place, so like to this,
I cannot but remember. 'T was a night
Like this, save that it wore the loveliness
And richness of a dream o'er all its charms.
The sporting moonbeams twined themselves around
The leaves and branches of the overhanging trees,
Like ivy round the mouldering monument—
Half seen, half hid—and from their azure depths.
The stars were looking out with eyes that watch
O'er Nature's slumbering. We had left the hall
To lighter hearts, and arm in arm had strayed
Through the long winding mazes of the grove,
Until at length we reached this bower. One beam
Of moonlight, streaming through its trellised roof,
Fell on thy cheek; methought it never looked
One half so lovely—and indeed till now
It never did, Ianthe! And then I—
Strange that my brain should dream what my tongue fear
To utter even now! 't was but a dream,
However, and the masques are not gone,
So I'll e'en finish it. Well then, methought
I told thee, though 't was in a whispered breath,
And softer than the night wind's gentlest sigh,
How I did love—that was the word—did love,
And even worship thee! And then I swore,
By Venus, and the starry train above—
By thy bright eyes, which did outlive them—
By all love's fond remembrances, that I
Would guard and cherish thee, wouldst thou but be My own, my own Ianthe! And then—then—
Fired not my passionate dreaming—I did seal
My vow upon thy lips; and then I watched
To see them open, and to hear thy voice
Steal forth in gentle murmuring, like the tone
Of a sigh that hath found utterance. Then I twined
Mine arm around thee—thus; and placed thy cheek
Upon my bosom—thus; and bade thee tell,
Though 't were but with a glance, or place thy heart
Upon thy lips, and breathe it with a kiss,
If I might dare to love; and then thine eyes
Peered up through their dark lashes, with a look
So tender, yet so melancholy, and Thy lips just parted with a sigh—and then—
And then—

Do dreams always prove true, Ianthe?

WOMAN.

Born by Nature in her dreams,
Nursed by beauty, love, and bliss,
Woman is not what she seems—
Woman was not what she is:
Last! but fairest of creation!
Earth without her could not hold:
Shedding joy in every station—
Yet she is not as of old:
Woman's name is stamped with bliss,
But woman was not what she is!

No discord crossed her zephyr tongue
To mar the softness of her name—
No baneful passions o'er her hung,
To rob her of her spotless fame;
Still she is woman—though not Eve—
Seductive, fond, revengful, cold;
And all that's left for man's to grieve;—
Oh! woman is not—as of old!
Woman's name is stamped with bliss;
Still woman was not what she is!

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ORATION,

Delivered before King Solomon's Lodge, in Cheraw, South Carolina on the anniversary of St. John the Evangelist, December 27, 5827.

BY BR. GEORGE T. HEARSEY.

It is a custom among masons, my friends, to observe, with marks of appropriate respect, the anniversary of St. John the Evangelist. They perform this duty, because he was an eminent patron of their order; because he was a light to the path of masonry; because he was a guide in the way of life to the christian world; and because he was a patron, a light, and a guide not only to the tenets of masonry; not only of the faith of christians, but of all the intellectual and moral agencies, which, in the harmony and united energy of their operation, promote the highest interests of mankind. Masons, therefore, come to this celebration, not to claim the right of exclusive gratitude, but to acknowledge with all others, their common obligations, and to render the tribute of their respect to the memory of their common benefactor. Influenced by such feelings, we may all unite, on the return of this anniversary, in a public demonstration of regard for the principles which it is designed to perpetuate.

The great and leading principle inculcated by the life and writings of the holy personage whom we commemorate, is charity. By that principle we all profess to be governed. Those who are not, as well as those who are members of the masonick brotherhood, acknowledge with one accord, the universal and unvarying obligation to preserve, in the regulation of their intercourse, and in the discipline of their feelings, a sincere regard for that masonick & Evangelical virtue. Here, then, is common ground, upon which all may meet, and laying aside, for the moment, every distinctive appellation, and recurring only to that common principle, which we all recognize as the rule for our government, you will dismiss all unfounded prejudice against the order of masonry, and masons will confide their cause with confidence, to your judgement.

It may not, perhaps, have been recollected, that circumstances, at the present time, justify an appeal from the fraternity to the charitable feelings of the world. It is such an appeal, as at all times and under all circumstances, finds a justification in the known facts that, for purposes of social intercourse, or mutual aid, men form themselves into different communities, array themselves under various names, and though they hold many principles in common, adopt different modes and forms to render them practically useful. The history of mankind is a perpetual testimony to the truth of this position. It is corroborated by the history of every sect and party, whether of politics, religion, or philosophy; and the mutual jealousies which, at some periods, have marked their separation; and the hostilities, which, at others, have embittered their intercourse, are so many proofs that every distinctive order of men, is not only justified in asking, but that it is their duty to ask of all others, the exercise of that charity, which they, in their turn, may severally need.

It is not, therefore, because the institution of masonry depends for its existence, or its usefulness, in any particular degree, on the forbearance which is recommended; but because this institution, like all others, has prejudice and opposition to encourter; because, like all others, it has enemies, ready to seize, and able to wield every weapon that can be turned against it; and friends, perhaps, who in the fervour of misguided zeal, occasionally furnish them; and because, like all others, this institution is composed of members, subject to the common imperfections of humanity.

There is a propriety in employing the occasion which this anniversary affords us, to repeat, though it has often been said and repeated, and abundantly confirmed by the history of the order, that the masonick society holds no principles unfriendly to the peace, the safety or the happiness of mankind. And it is proper to insist again on this truth, because events, hitherto unexplained, have occurred, by which the character of the institution is supposed by some, to have been implicated. It is said that masons have shed blood. It may be so. That deed of violence which brought desolation and mourning upon the first family of mankind has often been repeated. That sin, which in the recklessness of its early strength, first crimsoned the hand of a human being with the blood of a brother, has, through all time, maintained some power in every family of man. That germ of depravity, which, by permission of unsearchable wisdom, was first planted in the heart of man, has diffused itself co-extensively with the species, and in the growth and energy of its influence, has arrayed individuals and sects, and nations, eager for the work of death, against each other, until many a plain and many an altar have been reddened with the blood of unholy sacrifice. Masons, members of the great family of mankind, and heirs of the universal corruption of their nature, may also have sinned, by taking the life of a human being. Among the vast multitude composing the great body of masons, some one, instigated, by the malice of a malignant heart, or urged by the phrenzy of fanaticism, may have struck the fatal blow. Perhaps he wanders in the stillness of the forest, and like the first slayer, flies the face of man, lest the mark of Almighty vengeance, visible on the murderers front, betray him to the hand of his pursuers. But, remember; the commission of that crime, rests hitherto, on suspicion alone. Do you find in that suspicion, ground for his condemnation? No, the poor maniac who spilled the blood of Morgan, outcast and criminal as he may be, will not be condemned, unheard and without proof. Much less will you condemn the order, of which, perhaps, he may have been a member.

This subject is not introduced for the purpose of furnishing any explanation, not warranted by an impartial examination of its merits: and the public are equally as competent as masons to form a just conclusion from the facts connected with it; because the masonick fraternity is in possession of no facts concerning it, that are not also before the public. But, let it be conceded that the perpetrators of that crime were masons. They are guilty. Can you say more? Masons do not say less. And whom besides the guilty, can you condemn? Would you charge upon a class the crimes of individuals? Or, do you suspect some secret connexion between the act of violence supposed to have been committed, and the principles taught or allowed within the walls of a lodge? There may be such a suspicion; and from that suspicion it may have arisen that an outrage, which, under ordinary circumstances, would have been distinguished only by the excitement of a village; to terminate in the vigilance of a police officer, has been held to involve a question affecting every quarter of our nation, and by which one half the citizens of our country have been virtually called to answer in their own defence to a charge of the gravest import—whether such a suspicion be well founded, can be known with absolute certainty, only to those, who, as members of the fraternity, are in possession of all the means of knowing all the principles, sanctioned by the secret doctrines and practices of the order. But, unprovided as you must be, with direct evidence on that point, you are, nevertheless, abundantly able to form a judgement, by reference to the public history of the association, and to the concurrent testimony derived from the history of all other associations which, under the various modifications of human society, since the work of civilization first began, have been employed to meliorate the social relations, or improve the moral condition of mankind.

It is the fate of a good, as well as of a bad cause, to rank among its followers and advocates, some who feel and act under the influence of the spirit of fanaticism. The cause of the Arabian impostor found its potent energies, and still finds its largest resources in that principle of the human heart—the cause of christianity has often felt the power of the same principle. Its doctrines have often been perverted, its fraternal ties have often been broken; and the harmony of its devotions, and the sanctity of its most holy places have often been disturbed and violated by the predominance of the spirit of fanaticism. Masonry claims no exemption from the common evil. Among masons, also, there may be some, who in the blindness of infuriate zeal, forget the doctrines of their order, the ties of brotherhood, and the sanctity of the principles which they, and all masons are taught to venerate as the ancient landmarks of the lodge. If such a spirit, clothed in the habiliments of masonry, have been abroad, and if a victim have fallen beneath the edge of its ferocity, masons will unite with you in lamenting another instance of the depravity of the human heart. You will unite with them in believing that such an instance, though it may prove the madness of individuals, furnishes no illustration of the principles of a class. You will rather look to the history of an institution, through a succession of ages for an exposition of its principles, than to the conduct of a few unknown individuals; just as you would expect all reasonable persons to form their opinions of all other institutions, by an unprejudiced consideration of their tendency, in relation to the happiness and welfare of mankind instead of recurring to the instances of dissensions, persecutions and bloodshed, by which they may have been sometimes distracted and disgraced.

The cultivated taste and enlightened judgement of the age, will not now permit us to infer the character of the christian religion from the excesses, of which some of its professed, and perhaps sincere votaries, have been guilty. Christianity will not now be deemed less mild in its spirit, because it has sometimes been seen embodied in the terrors of relentless persecution. It will not now be considered less heavenly in its origin, because demons have sometimes assumed its outward bearing, and scattered the brands of discord in its name;—nor less beneficent in its influence on society, nor less dear to the interest and the hopes of man, though many a page of its history be stained with the blood, or blotted with the tears of human suffering. It is from the tendency of an institution to advance the substantial interests of mankind, that its value is now estimated. By this criterion masonry is willing to be tried. And this ancient institution, consecrated as it has been, by deeds of charity throughout the world, and ennobled as it is, by the names of the wise and the good, through a long line of ages, comes to the bar of modern judgement, accused of one stain, yet uneffaced from the broad and bright surface of its fame, and asking from the world only that rule of justice, which, under similar circumstances, the world accords to its own institutions.

In defence of masonry, it may be said, that it claims no right to exercise power or influence, affecting the government, the religion or the laws of the country, where its lodges may be established. It seeks, only, by its own means, and in the mode which it has chosen to adopt, to smooth the path of life in the pilgrim's course; to heal the wounds which the asperities of the world may have inflicted, and to sustain and protect him on his way. The principles by which it is governed, and the results which it contemplates are openly professed. The means by which it works are secret, and peculiar to the order. That secrecy of operation, and not the principles or objects of masonry, has in all ages, and with various degrees of hostility, excited the animadversions of the uninitiated. During the long period through which this institution has been subjected to the observation of mankind, while curiosity added keenness to the scrutiny, and prejudice exaggerated every fault; in how many instances can the charge of having perverted its influence or its power to unworthy purposes be sustained? In what country have masons united in rebellion to subvert a lawful government? When were they known to make one effort for the political advancement of their own order? Have they ever attempted, like the Brahmins of Hindostan, to attain, and secure to themselves, the upper rank of society? or, like the Turkish Dervise, to lead the multitude by unreal professions of exalted holiness? or, like the Ecclesiastics of the middle ages; or the Jesuits of later times, to enrich their own coffers by bartering tales of superstition for purses of gold? Yet, the masonick order is not surpassed by either, in antiquity, in numbers, nor in the facilities of combined and efficient action. In what country have masons, not been found among the patrons of science, and the friends of religion and good government? When was a contest between arbitrary power an oppressed people, that masons were not seen under the flag of liberty, and foremost in the patriot ranks, contending for the rights of man? It was in virtue of this pervading principle of the order, that the injured obtained redress, and weakness found protection in the arm of chivalry. Such was the principle, when the masonick knight went forth in armour, a champion of the right cause; and such it was still, confirmed by a nation's voice, and sanctified by a nation's grief, when Warren fell.

Is the masonick institution now in peril?—that venerable edifice, whose foundations were laid in antiquity, and whose superstructure has defied the storms of ages! Is it, at last, about to yield to the increasing power of its assailants, or to the progress of its own decay? 'Tis true, such has been the fate of many institutions. The noblest efforts of human power,—the proudest monuments of human skill, proclaim, in their ruins, the brief existence of all the works of man. Ancient Babylon, with her towers of strength, and all the learning and science of her wise men, is swept from the earth;—and fragments of broken columns alone mark the spot where the renowned Persopolis stood. Rome, once 'queen of nations,' resplendent in the arts of peace and in the triumphs of her arms, lives only to exhibit the records of her own deep degeneracy by the light which yet lingers on her fall; or, in the fatuity of age, to look for a halo of glory in the last fading gleam from the brightness of her early day. Her arts, her arms, and all the institutions of her social order, have yielded to the assaults of barbarian enterprise, or to the slow corrosion of all devouring time. Her ties of brotherhood, and her relations of domestic life, are lost in the multitude of modern changes or, like the hidden lore of Egypt, or the mysteries of Eleusis, are remembered only in the legends of the elder world. Is it also the fate of the masonick institution to fall beneath the hand of power, or to wither in the decrepitude of age? Whatever may be the apprehensions of its friends,—whatever may be the hopes of its enemies,—masons, who know the reasons of their own faith, know also, that this institution, at the present time, as in all former ages, defies the power of external force; and that in all her foundations, there is no principle of decay. The hopes of masonry are interwoven with the best feelings of the human heart. Her bonds of union are multiplied in the varying wants and infirmities, incident to the constitution of our nature. Her benevolence, like a stream from exhaustless fountains, flows on through ages, and carries blessings in its course. Her strength, unimpaired by the lapse of time, seeks no support in the alliances of the world; but finds resources, ample and undiminished, in the perpetual renovation of her own early vigour; and the period of her existence upon earth is reserved for that final hour, when the wisdom of man, and all the works of his hands, shall pass away forever.

And is there a mason who does not wear the badge of his order as an honourable distinction? It is the outward sign of his connexion with one of the noblest institutions of human wisdom. It is the publick pledge of his obedience to the principles and precepts of its moral code; and of his engagement to preserve, in his intercourse, not only among masons, but with all mankind, the relations of peace and good will. He who wears, and wears worthily, that emblem of his profession, is known by the fulfilment of all the relative duties of the neighbour, the friend and the citizen; and by the practice of all the virtues that adorn and dignify the human character. Such a mason looks not to the fashion of the day for the measure of his zeal, and he shrinks not from the work allotted him to perform; and though the prejudice of ignorance, or the designs of malignity, may, for a season, excite the enmity or the reproaches of the world, still, he holds the faith, and wears the badge of his order, willing to abide the fate of its cause, and confident that the reply which will most effectually silence reproach, and the weapon by which hostility may be most surely disarmed, will be found in the single fact, that he is a good mason.

You will permit me, ladies, to observe, that the presence with which you have honoured our masonick festival, calls for an acknowledgement of that feeling of grateful obligation, which it is your prerogative to inspire. To omit that duty, were, at the same time, injustice to the principles of our order, and a sacrifice of the individual pleasure with which the fulfilment of such a duty must ever be accompanied. Among the arguments which the cause of masonry may bring to its aid, it is one, to which we recur with lively gratification, that the gentler sex have ever been its friends. You are its friends, because that intuitive facility of perception, by which a kind providence has fitted you, peculiarly, for the discovery of truth on all subjects connected with the true happiness of man, enables you to perceive and appreciate the worth of masonry; and you are its friends, because you are friends of every institution that extends the hand of charity to the afflicted. And, allow me to add, it is not one of the least incentives, among masons, to that course which will best accomplish the benevolent purposes of their institution, that your approbation is given only to those who deserve it.

NEW-YORK.

The annual communication of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York commenced in the Masonick Hall, in the city of New-York, on Wednesday, the 4th instant, and closed on Monday the 9th. The following brethren were elected officers for the ensuing year:—

M. W. Stephen Van Rensselaer, of Albany, Grand Master.

R. W. Mordecai Myers, of the city of New-York, Deputy Grand Master.

R. W. Ezra S. Cozier, of Utica, Senior Grand Warden.

R. W. Welcome Esleeck, of Albany, Junior Grand Warden.

R. W. Oliver M. Lownds, of the city of New-York, Grand Secretary.

R. W. George W. Hyer, of the city of New-York, Grand Treasurer.

R. W. and Rev. J. M. Wainwright, D.D. of the city of New-York and R. W. and Rev. John Read, D.D. of Poughkeepsie, Grand Chaplains.

W. Anthony Blanchard of Albany, W. John D. Willard of Troy, W. Thos as Walker of Utica, Dr. Ebenezer Watts of Rochester, W. Stephen K. Grosvenor of Buffalo, W. Abijah Keeler of Auburn, W. Samuel Emery of Plattsburgh, and W. David W. Bucklin of Watertown, were appointed Almoners of Charity for the country.

Officers of the Grand Encampment of Knights Templars, and the appendant orders, elected at the annual communication in the city of New-York, June 6, 1823:—

M. E. William F. Platt, M.D. of the city of New-York, Grand Commander.

E. Matthew Talcott, esq. of Utica, Deputy Grand Commander.

E. Ambrose L. Jordan, esq. of Hudson, Grand Generalissimo.

E. Orville Hungerford, esq. of Watertown, Grand Captain General.

E. Leblens Chapman, esq. of the city of New-York, Grand Recorder.

CELEBRATIONS.

DUTCHESS COUNTY.

The approaching anniversary of St. John the Baptist will be celebrated by Solomon's Lodge, No. 6, on the 25th June inst. The procession will leave the Lodge Room at one o'clock P. M. and proceed to the Episcopal Church, where an address will be delivered by the Rev. brother Brown, of Newburgh. Dinner prepared at Mr. Budd's Hotel, at 3. The brethren of adjoining lodges and sojourning brethren are hereby respectfully invited to attend.

N. P. TALLMADGE, THOS. L. DAVIES,
NEHEMIAH CONKLIN, CHAS. P. BARNUM,
JOHN J. HEBBARD, JAS. B. FREAR,
EBENEZER K. DAKIN, JOHN B. SWARTWOUT,
JOHN W. OAKLY, JOHN H. DAVIS,
Committee of Arrangements.

Poughkeepsie, June 26, 5823.

VERMONT.

Social Masters Lodge, No. 59, will celebrate the approaching anniversary of St. John the Baptist, at Williamstown, in Vermont, on Tuesday, 24th day of June inst. The lodge will meet at Mason's Hall, precisely at 9 o'clock, A. M. Brethren from neighbouring lodges are respectfully invited to attend with suitable clothing. Good accommodations will be provided for the brethren and their ladies, by D. Watson. By order of the Lodge.

W. S. BECKET, Sec'y.
Williamstown, June 9th, 5823.

The anniversary of St. John the Baptist will be celebrated at Stockbridge, Vermont by Rural Lodge, No. 52, on Tuesday, the 24th inst. The lodge will meet at half past nine, and the procession form precisely at eleven o'clock A. M. at Mason's Hall. Masons, members of other lodges, are respectfully invited to attend and participate in the exercises and ceremonies of the day. By order of the lodge. H. L. RICHMOND, Sec'y.
Rochester, June 2, 5823.

The festival of St. John the Baptist will be celebrated by Friendship Lodge, on the 24th inst. ten o'clock, A. M. at Burrill and Comstock's, in Shelburn, Vermont. Sermon by the Rev. Mr. M'Donald. The officers and brethren of the lodges of the vicinity are respectfully invited to attend. By order. LUTHER M. HAGAR, Sec'y. pro tem.
Shelburn, June 10, 5823.

MAINE.

Notice is hereby given that Meridian Splendor Lodge, in Newport, Maine, will be consecrated and its officers installed on Thursday, the 26th inst. Members of neighbouring Lodges, and of the fraternity generally, are requested to attend. By order of the R. W. Master.

THOMAS LANCEY, Sec'y.
Newport, June 6, 5823.

VIRGINIA.

In pursuance of an invitation from the building committee of the new Episcopal Church in Winchester, Virginia, Lodges No. 21 36 and 117, will unite in the ceremonies of laying the corner stone of said church, on Tuesday the 24th inst. (St. John's day.) A discourse will be delivered, and followed by other exercises appropriate to the occasion. The Lodges before mentioned, respectfully invite the brethren generally, in regular standing, to attend.

By order. WALKER HUMPHRY, G. Sec'y.
June 11.

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

EXTRACTION OF SALT.

The following is the mode of effecting this object pursued at the great Salt Works, near Bex, in Switzerland, as described by the Rev. Mr. Walter, in his "Letters from the Continent." "With regard to such of the water as is very strongly impregnated with salt, the process is very simple: It is boiled, for some time, in immense cauldrons, and run off into spacious coolers, where the salt soon forms in crystals on the sides and bottom. But there is much of the water, which contains so little salt that it is scarcely perceptible to the taste. The boiling of this would be endless, and, more than that, attended with enormous expense. In order, therefore, to get rid of the salt water, as they call it, and at the same time to retain salt, the following simple yet ingenious process is adopted. Vast sheds are constructed, about three hundred feet long, fifty wide, and one hundred high; they are open at the sides, and are erected in situations most exposed to the action of the sun and wind. The space in the centre is filled with faggots of fir-tree branches and thorns; the water is raised by means of most ingenious pumps (some twenty or thirty of which are kept in perpetual exercise by the agency of four cubic inches of water falling on a wheel forty-four feet in diameter) to the top of the building, and is there distributed with beautiful regularity over the whole surface of the faggots: through these, which, be it recollected, constitute a mass ninety feet high, and twenty wide: the water filters, drop by drop, into a basin beneath. In its progress, the earthy particles it contains, remain attached to the faggots in the form of stalactite, the soft water evaporates, and what reaches the basin is as strongly impregnated with salt as the most productive which the mountain affords; it is thence conducted by pipes to the boilers, and is treated as the first. The operation is simple, but the effect is wonderful: the reservoirs for the reception of the water from the mountain, and for that which has undergone the process of exhalation, are close together: and the two are as different in taste as river and sea water."

GOATS.

These animals are numerous on the Eastern continent, and great numbers are domesticated in Europe, especially in the mountainous parts. The French Bulletin des Sciences states that there are 730,000 in the States of the king of Sardinia; and that 17,000 are kept in one flock, near Lyons, in France. Goats are numerous in Spain, Italy, Switzerland, Wales, &c. They yield milk in large quantities, which is accounted the best milk of all animals. The goat is the poor man's cow in many parts of Europe. The unpleasant odour attending the animal, is supposed to be very beneficial to horses and on this account they are often kept in stables in England. The goat is, however, a treacherous, roving, mischievous animal.

The precious shawls, that ornament the heads and shoulders of the rich inhabitants of Persia and Turkey, are manufactured in the vale of Cashmere from the down of the Tibetan goat. These shawls were admired in France for their beauty, fineness, and elegance, and a great price was paid for them; but very few were seen there until Buonaparte defeated the Mamelukes in Egypt, and took from them many shawls. They then became an object of fashion.

The ladies could find no other stuff so light which was so capable of preserving them from the impression of the air. There was for some time a dispute among the French naturalists whether the material of these shawls was produced by the dromedary, lamb, or other animal. They are now convinced, that it is the down of the goats of Tibet. A large number of goats, called the goats of Tibet, were purchased of the Kirghis Tartars in 1819, and introduced into France, where they have greatly increased. It is believed, however, by many, that they are not Tibetan goats, and that they differ but little from the native race. The down begins to appear under the long hair, in October, and grows until spring. When it is nearly ready to fall off, it is gathered with combs; and the combing is continued three or four days. The long hair is then separated from it by hand, there being no other way. Each animal gives from 4 to 6 ounces of the down. A shawl 5 quarters square, made from this down, weighs 6 1-2 ounces.

TELESCOPE FOR YALE COLLEGE.

Dollond, of London, one of the most distinguished artists of the age, is constructing an Achromatic Telescope for Yale College, of such size and power as will render it no small acquisition to the scientific apparatus of the Institution. It has a focal distance of ten feet, and an aperture of five inches; and as appears from a description already forwarded by the artist, it will afford a commanding and magnificent view of the planets. The prime cost is 200 guineas; but the friends of science will be gratified to learn, that the expense is defrayed without drawing upon the scanty funds of the Institution, the instrument being the donation of an individual, already known as one of the most distinguished benefactors of the college.

THE OLIVE TREE.

There are on the southern borders of the Crimea, two varieties of the olive tree, which have become indigenous there. The one is pyramidal, and its fruit is perfectly oval; the branches of the other are pendent, and its fruit large, heart-shaped, and abundant. These valuable trees have resisted the injuries of centuries, and of successive nations of barbarians. In 1812, an imperial garden was formed at Nikita, (Russia,) into which the cultivation of those useful trees was introduced by means of cuttings or slips, which no extremity of cold has hitherto affected, although some olive trees brought from France, perished in the same garden in the winter of 1825-6.

MEDICINE.

Profes or Delpech, of Montpellier, asserts that six thousand soldiers, afflicted with the itch, were cured in a few days "by washing their bodies twice a day, first with soap and water, and afterwards with a solution of the sulphuret of potass (about four drachms of the sulphuret to a pint of distilled or fresh rose water.)" The professor also states, that he has discovered, by comparative trials made in the hospital at Montpellier, that olive oil, rubbed over the skin, will as speedily cure those labouring under this disease, as the most powerful sulphurous preparations in common use. He says, that one hundred soldiers were entirely cured in an average period of seventeen days by this treatment.

THE PLAGUE.

When the plague broke out at Malta, in 1813, calomel was exhibited internally, and strong mercurial frictions were had recourse to, with perhaps dubious success, after the patient was affected with this formidable malady. Very recently an English physician, at Cephalonia, has subjected to a very strong mercurial treatment, internally and externally, some persons who have been exposed to the contagion of the plague, and it has been found that all those who had undergone salivation, when the disease developed itself, escaped with only sufficient symptoms to indicate the nature of their attack: while those on whom the mercury had not produced, to the full extent, its powerful effects, sank under the infection.

THE GATHERER.

A TEACHER'S PLEASURES.

Messrs. Editors—Were you ever schoolmasters? It is one of the most bothersome, pleasing, aggravating teasing employments, that man ever undertook. "What letter is that," said I, half out of humour with a young chuckle head, who had hammered three months at the alphabet without knowing the first letter. "Why—why—it's B." "Master," cries one "Sam pinches me!" "Silence!—what letter is it!" "Why—why—it's H." "Master, call to Tom: he crowds." The devil is surely in the children, thinks I. "Thomas, come here you young rascal! what have you been at?" "Why, sir, the rest scrouged me, and I couldn't help it." "Take your seat, sir, and mind better in future—well, what letter did you call it?" "Why—I said it two times a-ready." The devil you did, thinks I. "It's, not rightly named." "Well, pray master what is it then?" "Why it is A, booby." "Ha, ha—a-booby!—why, master, you never called it that way afore." "Well, A, then." "He, he, a-then." "You numskull, A." (loud) "A." (louder.) "There—take your seat, sir—you are among the incurables."

Reading class. "Chapter thirty tenth."—"Halt, sir—who ever heard of a thirty tenth chapter?" "Why, master, the other was thirty ninth." "Very well—then call it fortieth." "Chapter forty-eight." "Stop, I said fortieth." "Yes, sir, chapter forty-et." "Master, please to let me fetch water?" "Is this my lesson?—where did I leave off last week." "Is house a verb or an adjective?" "Are there more than one states in Pennsylvania?" "God bless me!—have patience until I am done with the reading classes." "Pray, sir, is not Spitzbergen in the hundred and fortieth degree of south latitude?" "How many degrees of north or south latitude have we?" "One hundred and eighty, is there not?" "No, sir—you certainly mean longitude, which extends one hundred and eighty degrees east or west from a given meridian—which brings us in the same meridian on the opposite side of the earth. But latitude is the distance from the equator to the poles, which can never exceed ninety degrees." "Master, what does p-p-p-h-t-t-t-h-i-i-i-c-spell?" "Phthisick." "T-t-t-sick." "Master, what day of the month does the fourth of July come on next year?" "Can't tell—I have seen no new almanacks.—Who is making that noise?" "Why Billy Banters says the master dont know much, or else he could tell what day of the month the fourth of July comes."

Now, what think you of such a life as this, as it was only ten o'clock when I grew weary of noting down for you: but if you want the particulars, you must come yourself, as you have more leisure time than I have. [Pa. Argus.]

PLAIN SPEAKING.

Cord Tyrawley, a little before his death, was visited by several Englishmen, who came with a pretence of asking how he did, but in reality to see if he was dying, that they might apply for his employments. The old general, who comprehended their motives for being so solicitous about him, gave them the following answer: "Gentlemen, I know your reasons for inquiring after my health; I have but two things worth any one's having, my regiment and my girl, neither of which will fall to your lot: I'll tell you how they will be disposed of; a Scotchman will get the one, and an Irishman the other."

JUDGES OF MUSICK.

A Scotch bagpiper travelling into Ireland opened his wallet by the wood side, and set down to dinner; he had no sooner said grace than three wolves came about him. To one he threw bread, to another meat, till his provision was all gone; at length he took up his bagpipes, and began to play, at which the wolves ran away. "The Deel faw me," said Sawney, "An I had kenn'd ye loved musick so weel, ye should have had it before dinner."

POPULAR TALES.

From Death's Doings.

THE MEN OF PHYSICK.

An Eastern Tale—By the author of "Glances from the Moon."

It happened that a certain absolute and capricious despot of an eastern province, on perceiving, after a few years' domination, that the number of his subjects had considerably decreased, instead of instituting a cautious inquiry into the possible causes of this lowered population, determined to lay the whole charge, the wonder and the mischief, on the professed practisers of what was there termed the healing art, but, according to his princely suspicion, the art of poisoning and destroying. Long did he cherish, whether warranted or otherwise doth not clearly appear, this peculiar sentiment, strengthened by progressive observation, and now matured into immoveable conviction: and, indeed, as his province had neither been lately desolated by war, visited by pestilence, nor reduced by famine, it becomes possible—just possible, I mean—that the notion which this prince had conceived of the blundering ways and means exercised by the Men of Physick, might not have proved so fallacious and unjust, as, on first hearing, it should seem to threaten: the less so, because the class of these physicians, or leeches, was the only one which had escaped the late examples of extraordinary fatality; a phenomenon which was referred, for its solution, to the commonly believed fact the physician exerciseth not his art upon himself.—But let that pass.

And now, whether sanctioned by a rational probability of a successful result, or not—whether right or wrong—he determined to put the matter at issue to one grand and decisive experiment. He published an edict, ordering every practitioner of the medical craft, of whatever degree, to quit the province in the course of ten days. Remonstrance had been vain: it was the mandate of despotic authority: no appeal remained; obedience was prompt and universal; not one professor, not a single minister of physick, dared to hold back and linger within the lines of demarkation, after the expiration of the period limited by the edict.

"Now, when the news of this extraordinary decree had reached and crept into the ear of Death, his jaws were presently screwed into a contemptuous grin, while meditating his purpose. "Opposition to my power," he said, "has always proved vain in the result, though whilom ridiculously obstinate and contentious. This prince shall quickly understand how unequal is the contest which he appears rash enough and weak enough to wage with a power, known by universal experience to be paramount and irresistible."

Thus muttered the Destroyer.

Hence we pass on to the expiration of that measure of time sufficient for the ascertaining whether the expectations of the prince were well founded and supported.

Twelve months had now elapsed, when, on a numerical comparison of deaths with those of the preceding year, they were found in a ratio greatly diminished, calculating for the lessened number of souls occasioned by the absence of the leeches. The discontent of the people against their prince, and their alarm for themselves, changed into reverence and composure. His pride and self-gratulation rose in proportion—perhaps something out of proportion, a mistake committed occasionally even by sovereigns—to flattery and applause: but this prince had never enjoyed the privilege of reading the poetick works of Robert Burns, where, amidst numerous pithy hints for the correction of self-misunderstanding, he might have dropped upon, and profited by the following stanza:—

"Oh would some power the gifty gee us,
To see ourselves as others see us;
It wad frae many a blunder free us,
And silly notion;
And airts in 'rait and dress wad lea' us,
And, e'en devotion."

But so it was; time was moving on smoothly and kindly between prince and subject; each conciliated more to each, and all partaking of that increase of pleasurable feelings which is wont to accompany and improve a condition of bodily and mental health.

Thus might this happy province—happy in its delivery from the leeches—have become the asylum of health, and the promise of longevity; but—give me but and ifs, as a bold man was wont to say; and I'll fight the D—; but,—that the dark malignant spirit of the man whose "bones are marrowless," urged at length by the bitterness of disappointment into deadly wrath at the decrease of funerals and of mourners, where his depredations had long proved so extensive and so frequent, determined to bestir himself for the recovery of his business.

"I have," muttered Death, as he stalked the ground, which shrank and blackened at his tread, "two considerations to resolve: first, what promises to furnish the surest plan for the restoration of the wonted, full, and gloomy callings of my office; secondly, by what measures I shall most easily and speedily succeed in it. Touching the first consideration," said Death, "I perceive it admits of instant decision. The effects of the decree, by which I find that the leeches were my supporters, my most effective friends, serve to teach me that the decree must be unconditionally reversed; the men of physick must be recalled; they must be reinstated in all their privileges and immunities, and be let loose as heretofore upon the inhabitants of the province—of the capital more especially—in the unbridled exercise of their accustomed practices. The man of dry and naked bones received that sensation of sullen gratification, when reflecting upon his plan, which no other man could feel. A half formed smile would have passed over his ghastly countenance, significant of anticipated success, but it was repulsed and chased away from a visage so hostile to its character, by a withering and rigid grin which admitted not a glimpse of relaxation.

Still this resolution extended and embraced the first and easiest division, only, of what he intended to perform: the object of his more arduous consideration remained behind, viz: the adoption of means, sure and effectual for the execution of this purpose. It was not till after a long protracted interval that thus the destroyer counselled with himself.

"I have held a long and vast communion with the sons of men who walk this earth, and all who have disappeared from it were removed by me. This is not all; known it is to me, by ages of experience and the use of observation, that the passion of fear is among the strongest felt by mortals, and that of nothing are they so horribly afraid as of my threatenings and my power to enforce them. How is this! that the man who has courage to contemn and to oppose the requisitions of justice; to admit and to encourage the foulest offences against the charities of humanity and the consciousness of moral obligation; to cherish the corruption of, and to perpetrate the blackest crimes against, the fellowship of men! that the same identical man of flesh and blood, on whom the fear of me is so deeply impressed, should ever fail to tremble while thinking upon the crimes, the outrages, the murders he may have committed! All this must be left to the discussion of wiser skulls than mine.

"By my life," said Death, "it is most worthy of marvel and recordance, that one and the same man shall dare to commit and brave the most atrocious wickedness, no less in the face of all the world than in the secret chambers, and yet shake with horror at an accidental change of feeling in his mortal frame, not occasioned by any guilty deed that he hath done, but resulting inevitably from the established laws and conditions of that animal economy ordained to experience the enjoyments of health and the inflictions of disease; to live, and think, and act, while the movements of the nice and wonderful machine are in perfect harmony and correctness; to languish, and finally to decay, when these are interrupted and gradually stopped.

"Yes, the solution of a mystery like this must be submitted to the philosophers; enough for me, that the dread of my approach is uppermost amidst mortal fears, and that few would be found, who, when the hour of decision should arrive, would refuse to compromise, on any terms, for a longer beholding the light of the sun and of all the natural objects which it illumines and presents: yet to what do these amount; in comparison with the animated and social nature, with the world of kindred, of relatives and friends!

"Fortunate for my commanding thralldom, mankind are not conscious that the 'fear of death' abstractedly considered, 'is most in apprehension;' or that,

'Imagination's fool and error's wretch,'
Man makes a death which nature never made,
Then on the point of his own fancy falls,
And feels a thousand deaths in fearing one.'

No, no—the prince, nursed and wrapped in the splendour and luxuries of a gay and rich metropolis, has not been conversant with disquisitions of this sort; if he ever thinks upon, he shudders at the contemplation of my blow." Death paused. This was the time for taking up what he had proposed for the second consideration of his subject, viz: the mode to be adopted for securing the completion of his plan. It required not a protracted rumination. Death knew the certainty of his power, and he resolved on its early application.

It was amidst the lone and "witching time of night, when church-yards yawn," that personified "ut ejus est mos," in the attire of a human skeleton, he made his way to the palace and the dormitory of his royal enemy, as he does to the cot and pallet of the poor. He beheld the prince stretched in the blandishments and wonted security of sleep; in "the perfumed chamber," "beneath the canopy of costly state." Directly he stalked up; the hard and bony tread awakened the sleeping prince, and he beheld the horrid figure placed before him, holding a dimly burning taper in his left hand, while in his right, elevated as if to strike, was poised the shaft which never fails, and which now threatened the execution of a fatal purpose.

Confounded by the spectacle, he made an effort to spring up; but the first effect of fear is debility: he fell backward, yet with outstretched arms and clasped hands, skrinkling from the dreadful object of his vision—"I come," said the horrible appearance—fixing upon his victim the dismal cavities where eyes had been—"I come, armed as at all times, to strike and to destroy. But even beneath the shaft, and within the grasp of Death, conditions of mercy may exist. Mark! I come unto the despot, who, with violence and injustice, has expelled from their establishments and their homes, the Men of Physick, my ministers and agents, and to offer him one or the other of two things: will he consent to recall and to reinstate the said men of physick or leeches, never again to be by him disturbed, or forbidden to cultivate and to use their arts; or will he prefer that this uplifted hand discharge the arrow which he beholds, thus winged for its deadly mission, and ready to fulfil it! Your resolve!—speak!—answer, even now—or—" The prince observed the arm rising higher, and drawing a little backward: a moment, and it might be too late; in agony of haste he called out,—"Hold! spare me, spare me! I will execute thy commands: I will instantly recall the leeches; I will do whatever thou demandest: I will do it now, even now." Death lowered his arm and proceeded:—"Promises at a moment like this, have often been found faithless, and have dissolved 'into thin air;' therefore," giving to the prince a scroll—"look upon that; unfold and read: be instant—bind thy soul, as the words therein point out, to prompt the execution of my pleasure." Here he began to raise his hand of bone, still armed with the deadly missile,—"Hold! hold!" the prince ejaculated; "I swear as this scroll requires." What was written therein has never been divulged. Death well knew that flesh and blood dared not to violate the oath: He was accordingly satisfied; and now under the guise in which he had stalked into the royal chamber, he abandoned it, in malignant triumph that his purpose had succeeded, and that the recommencement and augmentation of his harvest awaited only the return of the doctors; more especially of those who should occupy their seats and exercise their crafts in the metropolis. It is there he stands in gloomy watch, or stalks about in cynick grin, delighted with the hurry, dexterity, and sleight-of-hand visits paid by the doctor to his catalogue of patients, agreeable to the situations of their residences; many of whom, after hours of languor, distress, and pain, are now startled into being from their pittance of merciful unconsciousness, by the outrageous but fashionable violence, the storm of knocking raised at the door of the wretched patient's residence, by one of Death's subordinate agents, who drops from the fore or aft of the doctor's chariot, and having done all this wanton and inhuman mischief, throws open the door for the descent, and then the introduction of that which is to follow. Thus it is manifest that Death may be detected in the personification of an outside or an inside passenger; on the box or in the chariot.

The question may be asked,—what place does Death not occupy?—what person of the drama can he not assume and fill? We have seen him blinding the eyes of physicians and the patients, and converting medicines into poisons. We may also trace this sly and rapacious fellow more insidiously introducing poisons into the wholesome nutriment of life, into our viands and our drinks. For the former, gaze upon that alarming row of red and fiery looking metal, with which our shelves whether in kitchen or elsewhere, are so frightfully supplied! The metal is copper, poisonous and deadly, as many wise housekeepers and cooks are at length beginning to believe; but which, still, in defiance of the sun, or by taking advantage of the tender light of moon or taper, they continue to use, because peculiarly conducive, in their opinions, to the good colouring and preservation of pickles and preserves. For the latter, namely, our drinks, behold and examine the professed malt and hop decoctions of our publick breweries—malt and hops! phaw!—vinegar and bullock's blood.—Once more, look, and look closely when you are about it, to your cider and perry mills, lest you should purchase your hogshead of either of these liquors from a mill, in the construction of which the metal of lead, another of Death's ministers, has been largely employed, and which, when acted upon by the juices of fruits, communicates to the liquor a poisonous quality. The effects of this carelessness, or obstinacy, have been long and seriously felt in cider countries; in the county of Devonshire more particularly, producing therein that painful disease, known by the appropriate term, Devonshire Colick, terminating in Palsy. But the time would fail were we to attempt to show this Man of Bones in all his asserted places of domination, or to bolt him from his secret lurking holes. We will leave him for the time being, in his awful and favourite retreat, an English wine-vault, the depot of foreign wines. There he sits, enthroned upon a cask of fiery sherry, which, among other pernicious combinations, he dispenses far and wide, administering all of them more or less largely as his caprice may choose to delight itself in a larger or scantier accumulation of victims.

We will proceed no further in the pursuit of a topick and a theme which would remain interminable; neither would it prove fair nor charitable to cast the Bony Man in no other character than that which, to the bulk of mankind, represents him most unwelcome, cruel and severe. By certain of the sons of men he has been received not only with resignation and composure, but his approach has been hailed as a boon and a deliverance. Besides he possesses such traits, or perhaps faculties, in his composition, as might challenge our approbation and our reverence. In the class of these we desire to rescue from oblivion his acknowledged impartiality; his frequent prevention of greater evil than he brings; his endurance of perpetual labour; his just claim to universality; his courage; snatching away the monarch, surrounded by his life guards, just as a Bengal tiger springs into a little company of men seated at their social meal upon the turf, and, seizing on his victim, drags him to the jungle.

We must recount, because it evinces an honourable and lofty sentiment, that, as he stalked away after his midnight visit to the prince whom he had terrified into an instant and shaking submission, a voice was heard through the palace, and by the sentinels, as, invisibly, he moved along:—"Coward and slave, who has consented to sell thy people's pleasant health, the term of their life, with all its consolations and enjoyments; their title, it might have been, to longevity;—that thou thyself mightest be suffered to crawl, in infamy and abhorrence, a little longer between heaven and earth!!—It well nigh grieves me that I permitted the wretch to outlive his meanness and his baseness.

"But wherefore—I desire to ask and to be answered—wherefore are the sons of men so hostile to my charter, and so fearful of its exercise?—A charter, too, of which I myself foresee and dread the expiration?"

Can none develop and explain this mystery?

MISCELLANY.

A ROMAN THEATRE ON FIRE.

From Salathiel—A Story of the Past, Present, and Future.

Rome was an ocean of flame. Height and depth were covered with red surges, that rolled before the blast like an endless tide. The billows burst up the sides of the hills, which they turned into instant volcanoes, exploding volumes of smoke and fire; then plunged into the depths in a hundred glowing cataracts, then climbed and consumed again. The distant sound of the city in her convulsion, went to the soul. The air was filled with the steady roar of the advancing flame, the crash of falling houses, and the hideous outcry of the myriads flying through the streets, or surrounded and perishing in the conflagration.

All was clamour, violent struggle, and helpless death. Men and women of the highest rank were on foot, trampled by the rabble that had then lost all respect of conditions. One dense mass of miserable life, irresistible from its weight, crushed by the narrow streets, and scorched by the flames over their heads, rolled through the gates like an endless stream of black lava.

The fire had originally broken out upon the Palatine, and hot smokes that wrapped and half blinded us, hung thick as night upon the wrecks of pavilions and palaces; but the dexterity and knowledge of my inexplicable guide carried us on. It was in vain that I insisted upon knowing the purpose of this terrible traverse. He pressed his hand on his heart in re-assurance of his fidelity, and still spurred on. We now passed under the shade of an immense range of lofty buildings, whose gloomy and solid strength seemed to bid defiance to chance and time. A sudden yell appalled me. A ring of fire swept round its summit; burning cordage, sheets of canvass, and a shower of all things combustible, flew into the air above our heads. An uproar followed, unlike all that I had ever heard, a hideous mixture of howls, shrieks, and groans. The flames rolled down the narrow street before us, and made the passage next to impossible. While we hesitated, a huge fragment of the building heaved, as if in an earthquake, and fortunately for us, fell inwards. The whole scene of terror was then open. The great amphitheatre of Statilius Taurus had caught fire; the stage, with its inflammable furniture, was intensely blazing below. The flames were wheeling up, circle above circle, through the seventy thousand seats that rose from the ground to the roof. I stood in unspeakable awe and wonder on the side of this colossal cavern, this mighty temple of the city of fire. At length a descending blast cleared away the smoke that covered the arena. The cause of those horrid cries was now visible. The wild beasts kept for the games had broke from their dens. Maddened by affright and pain, lions, tigers, panthers, wolves, whole herds of monsters of India and Africa, were enclosed in an impassable barrier of fire. They bounded, they fought, they screamed, they tore; they ran howling round and round the circle; they made desperate leaps upwards through the blaze; they were flung back, and fell only to fasten their fangs in each other, and, with their parching jaws bathed in blood, die raging. I looked anxiously to see whether any human being was involved in this fearful catastrophe. To my great relief, I could see none. The keepers and attendants had obviously escaped. As I expressed my gladness, I was startled by a loud cry from my guide, the first sound that I had heard him utter. He pointed to the opposite side of the amphitheatre. There indeed sat an object of melancholy interest; a man who had either been unable to escape or had determined to die. Escape was now impossible. He sat in desperate calmness on his funeral pile. He was a gigantick Ethiopian slave, entirely naked. He had chosen this place, as if in mockery, on the imperial throne; the fire was above him and around him; and under this tremendous canopy he gazed, without the movement of a muscle, on the combat of the wild beasts below; a solitary sovereign, with the whole tremendous game played for himself, and inaccessible to the power of man.

GREECE AND PALESTINE.

From the New-York Journal of Commerce.

At a late meeting of the four academies which form the French Institute, M. de Laborde read a very interesting paper, narrating some passages of his recent travels in the east. We translate a part for the gratification of our readers.

After an introduction, full of warmth and of domestic details of the most touching simplicity, M. de Laborde leads us to Rome, at a period when religion displays all her pomp. The next year, the same spectacle awaits him at Jerusalem; and the able traveller strikingly portrays the contrast exhibited by the same ceremonies, in these two celebrated cities, of which one was the cradle, and the other has become the centre and the principal seat of christianity.

"We passed the Holy Week at Rome; the year preceding, we had made our arrangements so as to pass the same period at Jerusalem; indeed, it is interesting to observe the contrast between these two great cities of the christian world on these solemn days; the advantage is all on the side of the 'Eternal city.' At Rome, the people and the monuments surpass, or at least equal what is brought to mind by recollections of the past; at Jerusalem they fall much below it, they enfeeble it, and strip it of ornament; we would gladly separate what we see from what we remember. The sovereign pontiff, surrounded by his clergy, and the faithful collected from all parts of the earth, giving his benediction to the city and the world, urbi et orbi, from the greatest monument of the genius of man, while the immense crowd is prostrated below in awful silence, all this bears a character of greatness, of solemnity, which is not found at Jerusalem. The holy places there are under the guard of poor monks of all sects, taken from the inferior ranks of society, very worthy people, doubtless, but generally destitute of information and of dignity, talking to each other and to strangers about nothing but their private squabbles, bringing accusations against each other daily before the Turkish authorities, who make a traffick of their hatred, make them pay a price for their animosities, and disturb, by insults and violence the most august parts of their ceremonies. The holy places, too, are disfigured by shabby ornaments and buildings in bad taste. Rome should be seen in all her pomp, but Jerusalem in all her solitude; alone with our thoughts, we should wander through her fields, to reflect on the events that she brings to mind; it is then we overleap whole centuries and contemplate in the bare rock of the manger, the cradle of Christ and of civilization, and in the stone of the Holy Sepulchre, the emblem of every sacrifice, and an example of supporting every evil in the hope of every blessing."

Some pages further on, M. de Laborde proceeds with a picturesque description of that other country, so highly favoured by nature, but widowed at present of its most illustrious inhabitants, and desolated by the un pitying sabre of the Mussulmans.

"It was with Greece we ended as well as began our journey; we had left her in distress, we found her full of hope and confidence; after having conquered oppression, she had disarmed indifference, and might already reckon upon the future.

"Thanks to the politeness of M. de Rigny, the conqueror of Navarino, we visited this fine country in national vessels, treated as friends and brothers by our brave naval officers. Hydra showed us an entire community, which after having enriched its principal citizens by commerce, now subsists upon their benevolence. At Poros, we found the admiral of the Greek fleet, Miaulis, working in person like a common labourer, to repair his ship. We entered the modest dwelling of Canaris, at Egina, and saw that intrepid man as simple, as poor as he has always been, desiring no reward, appearing at no festival, and limiting his ambition to heroism. Fabvier in his peninsula of Metara seemed to us like Robinson Crusoe on his island, making bulwarks out of marble, mills from boards, and bread from roots, compensating by fatigue for the absence of danger, and hardly able to contain a soul of fire in a body of iron. At last sad Athens received us in the midst of her ruins. Still existing after so many sieges, the victim of her triumphs as well as of her misfortunes, she has no longer a single modern building, but she exists forever in her monuments which are yet standing, like the genius of ages, which barbarism and ignorance may for a time make captive, but can never destroy.

"On leaving this city, we wished to visit the field of battle of the last affair that took place under the walls of Athens, in which inexperienced chiefs, in an open plain, commanded troops, on foot, without bayonets, without cannon, without support. We were shown the Turkish battery, established at the tomb of Philopappus, which has robbed the columns of the Parthenon of many large blocks. We were made to remark the most advanced point which was reached by those unfortunate Greeks who thought themselves on the eve of entering the place, and stretched forth their hands towards their countrymen, when the Turkish cavalry, issuing from the ravine, made a horrible carnage among them. It was by following the long range of their unburied bodies that we arrived at the camp of Phalero, from which they had sailed. But let us throw a veil over this gloomy picture; henceforward Greece is free, and can not cease to be so. The principal of political interference, which has hitherto been serviceable only to absolute power, is now about to restore a people to the liberty which it has won by its courage, and which it will one day deserve by its virtues; and whatever may be the wrongs done to the present generation elsewhere, what enlightened man is there who does not wish well to a cause which unites itself to the heroic era of the human race, and for which, even in recent years, so many heroes have fallen? What traveller is there, above all, who does not think with delight, that one day, perhaps, a happy and polished nation will receive him upon this classic ground, will do its honours to him in the language of Homer, and will preserve unharmed what still remains of the genius of Phidias and the glory of Pericles?"

EDITORIAL DIARY.

June 21. Saint Aloysius; Saint Ralph; Saint Mevenus; Saint Aaron; Saint Eusebius; and Saint Leufredus. This day the sun enters the sign Cancer, and is then at his extreme distance north of the equator. To all who live north of the Arctic circle, he does not set, but travels around keeping above the horizon. To all north of the equator this day is the longest day in the year. Before the alteration of the style, the longest day was Saint Barnabas. This reminds us of an anecdote of Sir Thomas More, who was lord chancellor of England under Henry VIII. A person of high rank, who had wronged a poor widow of a sum of money, was ordered by Sir Thomas to make restitution of the property forthwith, with the costs attending the suit. "I hope then," said the gentleman, thinking his rank somewhat derogated by the sentence, "your lordship will grant me a long day to pay it." "I will," said the chancellor; "Monday next is Barnabas's day, which is the longest in the whole year; pay it then, without fail, or I will commit you to the Fleet."—1794, the island of Corsica acknowledged the king of Great Britain as their lawful sovereign, and accepted a new constitution.—1813, battle at Arganzon, between the allies under lord Wellington, and the French. Wellington lost 5000 men, and the French 20,000 with their artillery, military chest, 415 wagons, &c.

June 22. Saint Paulinus.—1519, Cortes sailed to Saint Juan de Ulloa, where he disembarked his troops, and constructed temporary barracks. At this place he received ambassadors from Montezuma, king of Mexico, with rich presents, and a message expressing the readiness of that sovereign to render the Spaniards any necessary service; but his entire disinclination to receive any visits at his court. After repeated and mutual messages and gifts, Montezuma caused his ambassadors to declare that he would not consent that foreign troops should appear nearer his capital, nor even allow them to continue longer in his dominions. "Truly this is a great monarch, and rich," said Cortes; "with the permission of God, we must see him." The event is too well known to need a description.—1772, the following letter was written from governor Hutchinson to governor Pownall. It is gratifying to reflect how much he was mistaken in his assertions; and we cannot conceive how he could ever have suffered himself to be thus defective in his observations of the growing spirit of unity which gave such an impetus to the current of revolutionary preparation.

"Boston, June 22, 1772.

"The union of the colonies is pretty well broke; I hope I shall never see it renewed. Indeed our sons of liberty are hated and despised by their former brethren in New-York and Pennsylvania, and it must be something extraordinary ever to reconcile them."

This letter, and a number of others containing similar sentiments, and exposing the duplicity of Hutchinson, were intercepted, and afterwards published in Boston. They seemed to undeceive the people as to the real motives of the British public officers in America; and brought on a spirit of indignant resistance to their measures. Doctor Franklin was deputed to present to the lord's committee of the Privy Council, a petition for the removal of Hutchinson, and lieutenant governor Oliver, in the execution of which he was basely insulted by the counsel for the accused, respecting the means by which he had become possessed of the letters. He endured the insults firmly, and when consoled with by an American friend then in London, he was heard to say,—"his king shall pay for it!" The first procurer of these letters was Doctor Hugh Williamson, whose life has been written, and, though extensively read, not circulated so widely as it deserves.—1814, the United States' ship of the line Independence was launched from the navy yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts. The Independence was the last line of battle ship belonging to our navy since the termination of the war of the revolution.

June 23. Saint Etheldreda, and Saint Mary of Orgnies.

—1812, the British Orders in Council were revoked, not having yet heard of the declaration of war by the United States.—1813, the British, under Admiral Cockburn, were repulsed in their attack upon Craney island, in the Chesapeake bay.

June 24. The Martyrs of Rome under Nero; Saint Bartholomew. The NATIVITY OF SAINT JOHN THE BAPTIST. This anniversary is religiously observed in all parts of christendom, among almost every denomination of christians, and more particularly by the fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons. Falling upon the season of the summer solstice, it has attracted the notice more generally among the peasantry than any other festival during the month, and midsummer bonfires, rustick games, and other demonstrations of hilarity have been practiced, time immemorial, in all catholic countries, and in many protestant kingdoms likewise. Its observance by the masonick order, is already known to be in honour of one of their most worthy patrons.—1340, Edward III. gained a great naval victory over the French fleet, off Sluys, on the coast of Flanders. The French fleet consisted of four hundred vessels and forty thousand men, while Edward's armament numbered only two hundred and forty sail; yet the English took two hundred and thirty of their ships, and killed thirty thousand Frenchmen, among whom were two of their admirals. The battle was fought with bows and arrows, pikes, and other ancient weapons, fire arms not having come into use until the battle of Cressy, six years after.—1494, the island of Bonavista, on the northeast side of Newfoundland, was discovered by Cabot.—1675, the colony of Plymouth observed this day as a season of humiliation and prayer, on account of the dangers dreaded from the hostile appearances of the Indians in their vicinity. As the people of Swansea, in Bristol county, Massachusetts, were returning from public worship on this day, they were ambushed, fired upon, and one man killed and another wounded. Two men who went for a surgeon were shot, and in another part of the town six per-sons were killed.—1806, the resolution for the abolition of the slave trade was adopted by the parliament of Great Britain.—1813, colonel Boerstler, with 511 men taken prisoners by the British at the Beaver-Dam near lake Erie.

June 25. Saints Prosper, Maximinus, William, Adelbert, Moloc, Agard, and Aglibert.—1314, the battle of Bannockburn was fought, which secured the independence of Scotland, and established Robert Bruce on the throne of that kingdom.

June 26. Saints John and Paul, martyrs; Saint Maxentius; Saint Vigilus; Saint Babolen; Saint Anthelm; and Saint Raingarda.—1541, Francis Pizarro, the conqueror of Peru, was assassinated by the friends of Almagro his former associate, with whom he had quarrelled, and whom he had caused to be put to death. He was an illegitimate child of low parentage, and in his youth followed the occupation of a swine herd. He became a soldier as soon as his age would permit, and went to America where he solicited and obtained the command of an expedition for the purpose of discovery. With this expedition he conquered Peru. His crimes have made his adventures too notorious to need further mention.—1752, died cardinal Julius Alberoni. He was the son of a gardener near Parma, and by his own exertions he was enabled to take holy orders. His first act of note was to betray the granaries of his country to the duke of Vendome. This trick discovered his talent for political intrigue, and the duke appointed him to conduct a correspondence with the princess de Ursins, who governed the affairs of Spain. The fruits of this intrigue produced the marriage of Philip V. to the princess, and through the confidence of the new queen he obtained a cardinal's hat, was made a grandee of Spain, and became prime minister. His policy brought the enmity of every nation to Philip, so that Spain could obtain peace only by his banishment. He was arrested by the pope for intriguing against the Turks. The college of cardinals had him confined a year to the Jesuit's college; and afterwards he was sent by the pope a legate to Romana. Here, even at the age of seventy, he could not abandon his favourite schemes of intrigue, and he plotted the destruction of the little republic of San Marino, and was ludicrously defeated, when he imagined he had succeeded to his utmost wish. He died at the age of eighty-seven, rich and infamous.—1813, king Joseph Buonaparte was compelled to retreat into France, where he tarried till the destinies of Napoleon took a turn which compelled him to leave France. He is now an American citizen.

June 27. Saint Ladislaus I. of Hungary; and Saint John of Montier. We all know the remarkably changeable state of the weather that has heretofore marked the progress of the season; and from late observation, we have no reason to doubt that the same unsettled state of the atmosphere will continue through the whole season of haying and harvest. If this should be the case, we must foresee an immense loss to the farmer in spoiled fodder, and swelled grain. To our friends who cultivate the fields with any direct eye to the theoretical sciences, we need not speak diffidently, when we recommend the use of the barometer. It may be a considerable expense, but knowing as we do the immense quantities of property destroyed or materially damaged, and the certainty of this valuable instrument to anticipate every change of the atmosphere, we sincerely believe that the advantage of commencing operations with confidence when the apparent aspect of the weather is unfavourable, with several hours warning of any change hostile to our labours, more valuable property will be saved in one season like the present than the instrument will cost. The barometer is in fact the most appropriate instrument to the wants of the husbandman that we know of; and by keeping in plain diary of the barometer and rain gauge, with the hyrometer and vane under his daily notice, he will acquire a superiority over the uncertainty of the weather, which is invaluable. All our farmers are very close observers of indications in the air, clouds or sky; and we believe they would not only be delighted with the simple and prophetick operations of the barometer; but would acquire a practice in the application of its movements, even above most professions men.—1752, a fire broke out in Lincoln's inn new square, London. There was a great loss of publick papers and titles to newly purchased estates which were destroyed were not to be computed. The offices of many business-doing lawyers, a master in chancery, solicitor to the treasury, &c. were among the ruins. Most of the watch were asleep or drunk when the fire broke out, and the wife of a respectable dealer, whose husband left his bed to assist the sufferers, hanged herself in his absence. Insurance was not then in vogue, and what was lost was usually a dead loss to the proprietors.

THE CLINTON VASES. These beautiful specimens of art, and highly appropriate testimony of public esteem, were exposed for sale with the other personal property of the late governor, and struck off to Anthony Blanchard, esq. of this city. At the late session of the Grand Lodge of this state, a vote was passed to purchase them, and present them to colonel Charles A. Clinton, for himself and other children of our late P. G. M. Previous to this purchase, Mr. Blanchard had been offered two thousand dollars for them, with the intention of sending them to Europe. Thanks to the public spirit of our fellow citizen and brother,—our state has been saved from the obloquy of such a disgraceful event.

These vases were presented to governor Clinton by the merchants of Pearl-street, in the city of New-York, in testimony of their gratitude and respect for his public services. The form is copied from the celebrated antique vase found among the ruins of the villa of Adrian, and now in the possession of the earl of Warwick. The handles and some of the ornaments are also similar to those upon that beautiful specimen of ancient art; but all the tablets and figures in bas relief are different, and exhibit scenes upon the Grand Canal, or allegorical illustrations of the progress of the arts and sciences.

The vases are twenty-four inches in height, twenty-one inches between the extremities of the handles, and the diameter of the body in the largest part is fourteen inches; the weight of silver in each is about four hundred ounces.

Their form is circular, except that the lower part is slightly elliptical, as are also the covers, each of which is surmounted by an eagle standing upon a section of the globe, upon which is traced part of the outline of the state of New-York; he bears in one talon the arms of the state, and in the other a laurel wreath. The pedestal is square, and supported by four claws; two sides of the pedestal of the first vase are ornamented with foliage and scroll-work, with an oval medallion bearing a river Deity leaning on an inverted vase. The third contains the inscription,

"To the Honourable DE WITT CLINTON, who has Developed the Resources of the State of New-York, and ennobled her Character, the Merchants of Pearl-street offer this Testimony of their Gratitude and Respect."

The fourth exhibits a number of figures, which in connexion with those on the corresponding section of the other vase are intended to represent the progress of the Arts and Sciences from their rude origin to their present improvement. On the right of the spectator appears a pastoral group listening to the pipe of Mercury; next to these is a husbandman leaning on his spade, and gazing upon a hive, while a female figure points to the labours of the industrious bee; then appears Minerva without her helmet and shield, directing the attention of the spectator to a bust which Sculpture is chiseling. The concave belt around the middle of this vase bears six tablets in bas relief; the two centre tablets exhibit views of the Cohoes falls, and of the Little falls of the Mohawk, with the stone aqueduct and bridge, and parts of the canal. The figures on each side of the former are Fame and History; on one side of the latter is an Indian contemplating the stump of a tree recently felled, and the axe laying at its root; and on the other, Plenty with her cornucopia—a head of Neptune with his trident, dolphins and shells, is placed at each extremity of this belt, under the grape-vine handles.

On the second vase, two sides of the pedestal are ornamented with foliage, &c. as on the first: the third contains the inscription,

"To the Honourable DE WITT CLINTON, whose Claim to the Proud Title of Public Benefactor is Founded on those Magnificent Works, the Northern and Western Canals."
